This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

NATIONAL TRUSTEES, &c., CO. OF AUSTRALIA (LIMITED) v. GENERAL FINANCE, &c., CO. OF AUSTRALIA (LIMITED). (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Acting bonâ fide under legal advice—Trustee company—Victorian Trusts Act, 1901 —Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

A joint stock company, acting as trustees for reward, paid over under legal advice part of a trust fund to the wrong parties.

Held, even assuming they acted honestly and reasonably, that they were not therefore exempt from making good the breach of trust, and that the Victorian Trusts Act, 1901 (similar to the English Act 59 & 60 Vict. c. 35, s. 3), which gave the court a judicial discretion in such cases, made no difference under the above circumstances. A trustee company receiving remuneration for its services is in a different position to a private trustee.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria affirming the judgment of à Beckett, J., in the Supreme Court.

The facts are set out at length in their lordships' judgment.

H. Terrell, K.C., and V. Hawkins, for the appellants.

Warmington, K.C., and A. H. Jessel, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords DAVEY and LINDLEY, Sir FORD NORTH, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Sir FORD NORTH.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Full Court of the State of Victoria, affirming the judgment of à Beckett, J., in the Supreme Court, holding the appellants liable for breach of trust in not having paid to the respondents their share in a trust estate.

The material facts are as follows:

Roderick McDonell (who died in 1858) bequeathed his personal estate to trustees, upon trust to get in the same, and pay one clear fourth part to his wife absolutely; and to invest the residue, and pay the annual income to his daughter, Ann Howe, during her life, and after her death to hold the principal in trust for her children who should attain twenty-one, or if daughters marry, in equal shares.

Six children of Ann Howe attained vested interests, and one of them, Mary Grace Howe, intermarried with John Fraser in July, 1872.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mary Grace Fraser died in August, 1876, intestate, and administration to her estate was granted to her husband, John Fraser, who by the law of the colony as it then stood was absolutely entitled to the whole of her personal estate. She left two children only.

By an Act of the colony which came into operation on the 13th of December, 1884 (the Married Women's Property Act, 1884, 48 Vict., No. 828, s. 25), it was provided that the estate, real and personal, as to which any married woman died intestate after the commencement of the Act should, after payment of duties, and funeral administration or testamentary expenses, and debts, be distributable between her husband and her children or next-of-kin in the like manner and proportions in which the estate, real and personal, as to which a married man died intestate was distributable between his widow and his children or next-of-kin.

By an indenture dated the 6th of February, 1891, John Fraser assigned to the respondents all his share and interest in the personal estate of the testator McDonell, and in the estate of the said Mary Grace Fraser, whether as her husband, or administrator, or otherwise, by way of mortgage, for securing £650, with interest at 20 per cent. per annum.

John Fraser died intestate in June, 1894, without having paid any of the principal or interest due on the mortgage. No administration was taken out to him.

By an indenture dated the 8th of July, 1895, the appellant company (hereinafter called the Trustee Co.) and their managing director, Walter Madden, were, in exercise of a power contained in McDonell's will, appointed trustees of that will, and the investments representing the residue of his estate were transferred to the new trustees.

On the 18th of December, 1897, Anne Howe, the tenant for life, died, and the trust estate became distributable.

The Trustee Co. employed Messrs. Smith & Emmerton, a firm of high standing at Melbourne, as their solicitors in connection with McDonell's trust; and they in March, 1898, took out in the name of the Trustee Co. letters of administration de bonis non to Mrs. Fraser, with full knowledge of the actual date of her death. Notwithstanding this the solicitors by some extraordinary slip advised the Trustee Co. and their officers that the two children of Mrs. Fraser were entitled, in equal shares, to her share in McDonell's estate; as to two-thirds thereof in their own right, and as to one-third as beneficiaries under their father, assuming that he left no debts.

On the 13th of June, 1898, Mr. Joy, then acting as liquidator of the respondents, wrote to the manager of the Trustee Co. reminding them of the mortgage and warning them against distributing any part of McDonell's trust estate, as the respondents were entitled to John Fraser's proportion.

On the 30th of September, 1898, Mr. Macoboy, the secretary of the Trustee Co., who had charge of this estate under Mr. Madden, the managing director, and who was in personal communication with the solicitors on the subject, had an interview with Joy with respect to the assignment; and he states that he informed Joy that his company would get one-third and the Frasers two-thirds; and that Joy raised no question as to this. The respondents seem to have accepted this statement as to their rights without verification, though a reference to their mortgage would have shown the date of Mrs. Fraser's death.

Questions were raised by John Fraser's children as to the validity of his mortgage, and what, if anything, was due upon it; and, in consequence, one-third of Mrs. Fraser's share was, under the Colonial Act for the Relief of Trustees, paid into court by the Trustee Co. in March and August, 1899. The other two-thirds were, about August, 1899, divided between her two children. It does not appear how the money paid into court was ultimately dealt with.

It is shown by the evidence of Mr. Macoboy that the solicitors of the Trustee Co. did, at a subsequent date, discover and inform that company that they had made a mistake in advising them that J. Fraser was entitled to one-third only; but no information as to this was given to the respondents. They seem, however, to have subsequently discovered the mistake for themselves, and on the 30th of December, 1902, their solicitors wrote to the trust company that the respondent company, as Fraser's assignee, was entitled to the whole of his late wife's share, or so much thereof as would satisfy their claim, and asked for a statement of Mrs. Fraser's estate; to which, on the following day, Mr. Madden made the disingenuous answer, that the money was paid into court by the trust company in 1899. The respondents' solicitors, however, insisted upon their claim to the whole of the share in the trust funds to which Mrs. Fraser was entitled; and not having received any satisfactory reply, the respondents, on the 11th of March, 1903, issued the writ in this action to recover the amount improperly paid by the Trustee Co. to her children, and obtained judgment in their favour for £673 18s. 10d. and interest. This was affirmed on appeal and the present is an appeal from those decisions.

The appellants' counsel rested their case upon three grounds:

(1) That the trust company had paid the moneys to Mrs. Fraser's children upon the advice of competent legal advisers, and, therefore, there was no breach of trust;

(2) That the respondents were estopped by their conduct from disputing the validity of the payment; and

(3) That the trust company were protected by section 3 of the Trusts Acts, 1901.

With respect to the first point, it is clear beyond all question that John Fraser was entitled to the whole of his wife's share in the trust estate, and not to one-third only; and that the payment of two-thirds to Mrs. Fraser's children instead of to the respondents was a breach of trust. The fact that such payment was made through the bad advice of the solicitors of the trust company is no defence.

In Doyle v. Blake, 2 Sch. & Lef. 231, at p. 243, Lord Redesdale said: "I have no doubt that they" (the executors) "meant to act fairly and honestly, but they were misadvised; and the court must proceed, not upon the improper advice under which an executor may have acted, but upon the acts he has done. If, under the best advice he could procure, he acts wrongly, it is his misfortune; but public policy requires that he should be the person to suffer." And there are many similar decisions in the books.

The appellants relied on the case of Speight v. Gaunt, 32 W. R. 435, 9 App. Cas. 1, in which a trustee employed a broker to purchase certain securities for a trust. The broker said that he had done so, and produced a bought note and asked for the money to complete as next day was pay day, and the trustee gave him the necessary cheques, which the broker misapplied. In a suit to make the trustee liable, it was held that the payment to the broker was made in the usual and regular course of business, and that the trustee was not liable; in other words there was not any breach of trust. The present is a very different case.

The second point raised for the appellants was that the respondents' conduct induced them to believe that they admitted the title of Mrs. Fraser's children to the two-thirds, and that they acquiesced in and assented to the payment to them. Unfortunately for the appellants there are no facts upon which such an argument can be based. There is not a shred of evidence to show that the respondents were consulted about, or approved of, or assented to, or even were aware of, such payment being made. It is the common case of all parties that at that time everyone believed that John Fraser, and the respondents through him, were interested in one-third only, and that the application of the rest of the fund was a matter in which the respondents had no concern. Any request to them to concur in the payment of the two-thirds to the children would probably have led to an investigation of the facts, and resulted in the institution of this action some years before 1903. It is true that the respondents did not ask for more than one-third; but they had been informed by the trust company that this was all to which they were entitled, and the trust company cannot complain that the respondents accepted and acted on that statement. They did not discover the error till long afterwards. There is no evidence that they in any way misled the trust company; on the contrary, the trust company misled them.

The third point raised on the appellants' behalf was that, even if there was a breach of trust, they should be relieved therefrom by virtue of section 3 of the Trusts Act, 1901, which corresponds with section 3 of the English Act (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35). That section is as follows: "If it appears to the Supreme Court that a trustee is or may be personally liable for any breach of trust, whether the transaction alleged to be a breach of trust occurred before or after the passing of this Act, but has acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust, and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach, then the court may relieve the trustee either wholly or partly from personal liability for the same." The courts in the colony have found that the appellants acted honestly and reasonably, and their lordships are prepared to deal with the case on that footing. Mr. Terrell contended that these two things being established, the right to relief followed as a matter of course; but that is clearly not the construction of the Act. Unless both are proved the court cannot help the trustees; but if both are made out, there is then a case for the court to consider whether the trustee ought fairly to be excused for the breach, looking at all the circumstances. It is a very material circumstance that the appellants are a limited joint stock company, formed for the purpose of earning profits for their shareholders; part of their business is to act as trustees and executors; and they are paid for their services in so acting by a commission which the law of the colony authorizes them to retain out of trust funds administered by them, in addition to their costs. What they now ask the court to do is to allow them to retain a sum of money to which the respondents' title is clear, in order thereby to relieve the trust company from a loss they had incurred in the course of their business by reason of their having paid a like sum to wrong parties. The position of a joint stock company which undertakes to perform for reward services it can only perform through its agents, and which has been misled by those agents to misapply a fund under its charge, is widely different from that of a private person acting as gratuitous trustee. And without saying that the remedial provisions of the section should never be applied to a trustee in the position of the appellants, their lordships think it is a circumstance to be taken into account, and they do not find here any fair excuse for the breach of trust, or any reason why the respondents, who have committed no fault, should lose their money to relieve the appellants, who have done a wrong and have denied the respondents' title. And that is not quite all. If trustees do unfortunately lose part of a trust fund by a breach of trust, the least that can be expected of them is that they should use their best endeavours to recover the fund, or so much thereof as is practicable, for their cestui que trusts. In the present case there seems to be some ground for thinking that other proceedings were open to the trust company by which any loss to them might have been averted, at any rate to some extent; but it does not appear that the trust company have taken any such steps, or made any attempt whatever to replace the fund or relieve the respondents from loss; nor have they condescended to give the court any explanation or reason why they have abstained from doing so. It may be that the solicitors would be willing or might be compelled to make good the loss, if the trust company should find they cannot obtain relief elsewhere. The courts in the colony held that under these circumstances the appellants had not made out any case for relief under the Act; and their lordships agree with them.

Their lordships will, therefore, humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs.

KINNAIRD (LORD) v. FIELD (No. 1). (a.)

Practice—Frivolous and vexatious applications—Interlocutory applications before judgment — Order to prevent.

Where repeated frivolous and vexatious interlocutory applications have been made in an action before judgment, the court will make an order prohibiting any further application without leave of the court.

This was an appeal from a decision of Warrington, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Council of the Evangelical Alliance to enforce the carrying out of an agreement made between the council and the defendant by way of compromise to a former action. The defendant, who was conducting his case in person, defended the action and delivered a counterclaim, Before the case came on for trial the defendant made twenty-four interlocutory applications with reference to pleadings, discovery, and the like matters. Most of these applications were dismissed with costs and the remainder proved abortive owing to some irregularity in the notice of motion or because the defendant failed to appear. None of the costs incurred in these applications had been paid by the defendant. The plaintiffs took out a summons asking for an order that the defendant might not be allowed to make any further application in the action without the leave of the court first had and obtained, and that if notice of any such application should be given without such leave being obtained the plaintiffs should not be required to appear on such application, and it should be dismissed without being heard.

Warrington, J., made an order in accordance with the summons.

The defendant appealed.

The defendant in person.—Warrington, J., relied on Grepe v. Loam, 37 Ch. D. 168, 36 W. R. Dig. 151, but that case is distinguishable. The order there was to restrain repeated frivolous applications for the purpose of impeaching a final judgment. The present applications are all before judgment and for distinct and legitimate purposes.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Greenwood, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—No question can be raised as to the jurisdiction of Warrington, J., to make this order; and when one looks at the series of summonses issued by the defendant in this action and at the nature of those summonses, it is impossible to doubt that there was ample material upon which the learned judge had the liberty of exercising his discretion. Nothing has been brought to our notice which would lead us to doubt that this discretion was wisely and carefully exercised by Warrington, J. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Grepe v. Loam shows that there is jurisdiction in the court to make such an order as has been made by Warrington, J., and it is really an example of the mode by which the court interferes to prevent abuse of its process. The only question which remains is whether Warrington, J., was justified in making the order which he did. In that respect it is merely a question of discretion in the exercise of a jurisdiction which appears to me to be inherent in the court. I am unable to differ from Warrington, J., as to the merits of the case, and I think, therefore, that the appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, I have nothing to add.

EAST INDIAN RAILWAY CO. v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Annuity payable under contract—Annual sum consisting partly of capital and partly of interest—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 102—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedules C and D.

By virtue of contracts made in 1849 and 1854 between the East India Company and a railway company the Secretary of State for India had the option of purchasing the railway by payment of an annuity Before the time limited for exercising the option arrived, the Secretary of State concluded a bargain with the railway company, which was sanctioned by an Act of Parliament of 1879, as to the terms on which the purchase of the railway by payment of an annuity should be carried out. The terms contained a statement that the amount of the annuity of £5 12*s.* 6*d. into which every* £100 stock of the company was intended to be commuted at the price of £125 was calculated on the basis of £5 7*s.* 6*d., part thereof being interest at the rate of* £4 6*s. per cent. per annum on the said amount of* £125, and of a sum of 5*s. other part thereof being the amount required to be set aside for the purpose of a sinking fund.*

Held, that, notwithstanding the fact that the bargain was concluded before the time limited for exercising the option arrived, and notwithstanding the statement as to the manner in which the annuity was calculated, the principle of Secretary of State for India v. Scoble, 51 W. R. 675, [1903] A. C. 299, applied, and income tax was payable only on so much of the annuity as in accordance with that case really represented interest.

Appeal by the plaintiffs and cross-appeal by the defendant from a judgment of Jelf, J.

The action was brought for a declaration that the plaintiff company were entitled to recover a sum of £53,787 18s. 1d., the amount of sums wrongfully deducted for income tax by the Secretary of State for India in respect of certain annual payments to the plaintiffs between the years 1880 and 1903.

By a contract in writing made in August, 1849, between the East India Company and the plaintiffs, the East India Company were to provide land for a railway to be constructed by the plaintiffs in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, and on completion of the railway the East India Company were to grant to the plaintiffs a lease of the land for ninety-nine years. The East India Company were empowered at certain periods during the term to purchase the railway for a gross sum, to be ascertained as therein provided, and were given an option, instead of paying a gross sum, to pay an annuity for the residue of the term. By a subsequent contract between the parties in February, 1854, which recited that the railway commencing at Howrah, near Calcutta, and extending to Burdwan had been nearly completed, it was further agreed that the East India Company should provide land for the construction of a railway to Delhi, and that on the completion of it they should grant the plaintiffs a lease of the land under the same provisions as those contained in the contract of 1849. It was provided by the contract of 1854 that the East India Company might within six months after the expiration of the first twenty-five years of the term of ninety-nine years give notice to the railway company of their intention to purchase, and the railway was thereupon to revert to and become the property of the East India Company on account of the Government of India, and the East India Company were to pay the full amount of the value of all the shares, stock, &c., in the railway company calculated at a certain value. It was also provided that in every or any case in which, under the terms of the contract, the East India Company should before the expiration of the term of ninety-nine years become bound to repay the capital expended by the railway company, or to pay for the purchase of the railway works and stock, it should be lawful for the East India Company, instead of paying a gross sum of money in respect of the premises, to declare their option to pay an annuity to continue during the residue of the term of ninety-nine years, calculated at a certain rate of interest. The two railways were duly completed; and in 1858 the East India Company provided the land for another railway to be constructed by the plaintiffs from Mirzapore to Jubbulpore under provisions of a similar character to those contained in the previous contracts between the parties. Under the Government of India Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 106), all the powers of the East India Company under these contracts became vested in the Secretary of State for India.

In 1879, before the time limited for exercising the right of purchase arrived, the Secretary of State gave the plaintiffs notice of his intention to purchase the railway by means of an annuity terminable on the 14th of February, 1953, calculated on a rate of interest of £4 6s. per cent. on a commuted price of £125 per £100 of capital stock, which gave an annuity of £5 12s. 6d. for each £100 of capital stock so commuted at £125; and the plaintiffs and the Secretary of State entered into an agreement which was subsequently sanctioned by the East Indian Railway Company Purchase Act, 1879. That Act contained provisions for carrying out the terms agreed upon and for paying the annuity. The paid-up capital stock of the railway company was £26,200,000, and the price to be paid by the Secretary of State was, at the commuted price of £125 per £100 of capital stock, the sum of £32,750,000, and the amount of the annuity was £1,473,750. Instalments were paid half-yearly from the beginning of 1880, and the deductions for income tax were made on the total half-yearly payments. The plaintiffs claimed to recover such deductions in so far as they were made in respect of the instalments or annuities paid on account of or as part of capital.

At the trial Jelf, J., held, upon the authority of the House of Lords in Secretary of State for India v. Scoble, 51 W. R. 675, [1903] A. C. 299, that the annuity which was payable for the purchase of the railway represented in part payment of capital, and that income tax was only payable upon so much of the annuity as represented interest on the unpaid capital, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the deductions made for income tax upon the capital refunded.

The case came before the learned judge again, in pursuance of liberty to apply, in order to determine how the judgment was to be carried out. The plaintiffs contended that of the half-yearly payments made from time to time the proportion representing capital, and therefore not taxable, was continually increasing, while the proportion representing interest, and therefore taxable, was continually decreasing, inasmuch as every half-year there was less of the total capital unpaid, and therefore the interest on the unpaid capital was less. The defendant, on the other hand, contended that the interest payable each half-year was a constant unvarying amount treated as though the payment of the whole capital were postponed for seventy-three years, the remaining part of the annuity payable each half-year representing capital repaid only in the sense that it was a constant unvarying amount calculated to produce a sinking fund, which, if invested at compound interest at the specified rate, would replace the whole capital at the end of seventy-three years.

The two following tables show at a glance the contentions of the plaintiffs and defendant respectively as applied to the amount of income tax wrongly deducted to be refunded for the two half-years in respect of which the deductions were made subject to the protest of the plaintiffs:

Jelf, J., said that, in order to ascertain which of these two contentions was correct, it was necessary to ascertain the terms upon which the "annuity" was created. If those terms left it uncertain how much of the "annuity" each half-year was to be allocated to the repayment or replacement of capital and how much to the payment of interest, he thought the plaintiffs' principle of allocation might reasonably prevail. But on reference to the East Indian Railway Company Purchase Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. cxxvi.), which recited and sanctioned the terms on which the bargain was concluded, he found no uncertainty or ambiguity existing. The "memorandum of terms" recited in the Act contained the following: "That the purchase be made by means of an annuity terminable on the 14th of February, 1953, calculated on a rate of interest of £4 6s. on a commuted price of £125 per £100 of capital stock, which gives, including 4s. for redemption of capital, an annuity of £5 12s. 6d. for every £100 of capital stock so commuted at £125." The Act contained a further recital "that in the said memorandum of terms the amount of the annuity of £5 12s. 6d. into which every £100 stock of the company is intended to be commuted at a price of £125 is calculated on the basis of £5 7s. 6d., part thereof being interest at the rate of £4 6s. per cent. per annum on the said amount of £125 and a sum of five shillings, other part thereof, being the amount required to be set aside and invested half-yearly in every year at a like rate of interest, from the 1st day of January, 1880, up to the 14th day of February, 1953, in order to produce by means of a sinking fund the capital sum of £125 or thereabouts on the said 14th of February, 1953." By section 7 of the Act it was provided as follows: "For the purpose of carrying out and giving effect to the memorandum of terms which have been agreed to between the Secretary of State and the company, the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to create and shall create on or before the 1st day of January, 1880, a clear yearly annuity of £1,473,750, being at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum in respect of every £100 of stock of the company at the agreed value of £125, and yielding an annuity of £5 12s. 6d. in respect of every such £100 stock, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1880, and terminating on the 14th day of February, 1953, and the said annuity shall have all the incidents of personal estate." It was, therefore, to his mind demonstrated that each half-yearly payment represented—(1) a constant unvarying sum for interest on the whole capital sum during the seventy-three years; and (2) another constant and unvarying sum calculated by way of a sinking fund to replace the whole capital at the end of the seventy-three years (which, of course, could be used for that purpose or not, according to the will of the annuitants). If, therefore, the question was not governed by authority, he came to the conclusion that the defendants' contention was correct and the plaintiffs' incorrect. After referring to the cases of Secretary of State for India v. Scoble and Leeds Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Mallandaine, 45 W. R. 501, [1897] 2 Q. B. 402, he was of opinion that there was nothing to prevent the defendant from showing that income tax had been wrongly deducted only in respect of those portions of the "annuity" payments which did not in fact represent interest. He therefore made a declaration that the half-yearly payments by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the "annuity" were partly payments towards a sinking fund calculated, if invested at compound interest, to produce the whole price for the purchase of the railway at the end of seventy-three years, and, therefore, in the nature of capital, and partly interest on the whole of such price so to be produced at the end of such seventy-three years, and that so much of such half-yearly payment as represented capital was not liable to income tax. As to the amount recoverable in respect of wrongful deductions in the past, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the lesser sum only—viz., £2,044 2s. 3d.

The plaintiffs appealed, and the defendant gave notice of cross-appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 8.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This case comes before us on an appeal and cross-appeal by the plaintiffs and defendant respectively from a decision of Jelf, J. The plaintiffs are the holders of a "so-called annuity" (I use the phrase employed by Jelf, J., to describe it) granted by the Secretary of State for India as the purchase price of the interest of the plaintiffs in certain railways in India, a right to purchase which had been conferred on the Secretary of State upon terms settled between the plaintiffs and the East India Company prior to the construction of the railways. The action is brought to recover sums wrongfully deducted, as the plaintiffs aver, for income tax on the annual payments of the annuity.

The plaintiffs contend that the question of principle applicable to this case has been decided by the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Secretary of State for India v. Scoble (1903, A. C. 299). The question arose there with respect to an annuity granted on the purchase of the then respondents' interest in another Indian railway under a contract in all material respects identical with that which conferred the right of purchase in this case. The House of Lords there held that what was given under the name of "annuity" in return for the interest purchased was a capital sum payable by instalments with interest, and that, therefore, income tax was payable only on such part of each instalment as consisted of interest; that though called an annuity, it was not, when the substance of the transaction was looked at, the same thing that is made taxable under that name in the Income Tax Acts, which do not purport to tax capital.

It was contended for the Secretary of State that certain modifications had been introduced by negotiation into the contract in this case, which had the effect of altering the nature of the annual payments, and converting them into an ordinary annuity within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts. It was pointed out that in Scoble's case the time before which the option of purchase could not be exercised had expired when the option was declared, and that there was, therefore, in existence a debt or capital sum which had to be liquidated; whereas in this case the purchase was arranged by bargain before the time for exercising the option had actually arrived. It was also urged that in the present case the method by which the annuity was to be calculated had been a term of the bargain, and had incidentally altered its character so as to take it out of the principle of the decision in Scoble's case.

The case was twice heard before Jelf, J. On the first occasion the latter point was not taken; and he held that, notwithstanding the fact that the option had by arrangement been exercised before the appointed time, the principle of Scoble's case applied, and the transaction must still be looked at as an arrangement for payment of a capital sum with interest by instalments, and not as an annuity in the ordinary sense, and he made a declaration in the terms prayed by the plaintiffs. The matter, however, came again before the learned judge, on liberty to apply given, as to how the amounts of interest and principal were to be ascertained in each instalment; and on this occasion the method on which the annuity was calculated as recited in the agreement between the parties, which was subsequently embodied in an Act of Parliament, was strongly relied upon by the Crown as altering the whole character of the annual payments. The learned judge could not recall his judgment already given, but he has pronounced a decision reducing the sum attributable to capital in each instalment to 5s. out of every £5 7s. 6d., and leaving the residue to be treated as income and taxable as such.

Both sides appeal, the plaintiffs on the ground that the statement as to how the annual sum was calculated was merely for the purpose of showing that the sum allowed was a proper one, and could not have the effect of altering the character of the payment, and of turning that which was in truth and in fact the liquidation of a debt by instalments into that which it was held not to be in Scoble's case—a mere annuity; the Crown, on the ground that the decision ought logically to treat the whole annual sum as consisting of income only and taxable as such.

It is necessary to read the clauses dealing with the amount of the annuity and the letter which enclosed them, together with the recital in the Act which embodied them. The letter is in these terms: "The board of directors of the East Indian Railway Co. are aware that the period is approaching when, under the terms of the contracts between the East India Company and the East Indian Railway Co., of the 17th of August, 1849, and the 15th of February, 1854, the Secretary of State for India in Council may give notice of his intention to purchase the railway and works described in clauses 23 and 22 of those contracts respectively. Under the terms of the contract, dated the 21st of April, 1858, the Secretary of State in Council, as the board are likewise aware, has no such power in regard to the Jubbulpore line until after twenty-five years from that date. Being satisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the East Indian Railway have been administered under the direction of the company, the Secretary of State desires to continue a system of management of the same kind, but so as to secure to the State a larger share in the profits of the undertaking than it receives through the operation of the present contract. With this view, while prepared strictly to adhere to the terms of the contracts, in respect of the mode of purchase, the Secretary of State before formally giving notice desires to open a negotiation with the company for the simultaneous purchase of the Jubbulpore line, and for working the whole undertaking under the control of Government. I enclose a memorandum of the terms on which the Secretary of State in Council will be ready to enter into a new agreement with the company for these purposes, and which he desires to submit for their consideration.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, LOUIS MALLET." Then, "Memorandum of terms." I need only read the first of them, I think: "That the purchase be made by means of an annuity terminable on the 14th of February, 1953, calculated on a rate of interest of £4 6s. per cent. on a commuted price of £125 per £100 of capital stock, which gives, including 4s. for redemption of capital, an annuity of £5 12s. 6d. for each £100 of capital stock so commuted at £125. But that the shareholders be allowed an option of leaving in the hands of the Government, for the purposes hereafter mentioned, a proportion not exceeding one-fifth of the commuted value of the capital stock of the company." Then there is a recital which is material also: "And whereas in the said memorandum of terms the amount of the annuity of £5 12s. 6d. into which every £100 stock of the company is intended to be commuted at a price of £125 is calculated on the basis of £5 7s. 6d., part thereof, being interest at the rate of £4 6s. per cent. per annum on the said amount of £125, and a sum of 5s., other part thereof, being the amount required to be set aside and invested half-yearly in every year at a like rate of interest from the 1st of January, 1880, up to the 14th of February, 1953, in order to produce by means of a sinking fund the capital sum of £125, or thereabouts, on the said 14th day of February, 1953." In my opinion, this statement is merely made to justify the amount at which the annuity is fixed, and does not alter the fundamental character of the transaction as declared by the House of Lords in Scoble's case. I agree with the learned judge that the other fact as to the anticipation of the time for declaring the option and altering the date from which the instalments are to run does not interfere with the primary consideration that the arrangement is one for the discharge of a debt by payments extending over many years, and, therefore, requiring the addition of interest; and I cannot think that the arithmetical calculation by which the amount is fixed has had the effect of radically changing the transaction. The 5s. which is put down in that calculation as applicable to the formation of a sinking fund is not treated as an instalment of capital, but is treated as income, out of which the receiver can, if he chooses, form a sinking fund. The whole annual sum is in that view composed exclusively of income and taxable as such. If effect is to be given to the principle which declared that each instalment must be taken as including capital and income, it cannot be worked out on the lines indicated in the calculation. It can be worked out on the lines suggested in the table proposed by the plaintiffs. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs' appeal should be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

WOODALL v. CLIFTON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Long term—Option to purchase fee—Rule against perpetuities—Covenant running with land—32 Hen. 8, c. 34.

An option in a lease to purchase the fee simple is something wholly outside the relations of landlord and tenant, with which alone the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, deals, and therefore cannot be enforced as running with the land within the purview of that statute, though such a contract in a lease may be good as binding the heirs and assigns, provided it does not infringe the law against perpetuities.

Decision of Warrington, J. (53 W. R. 203), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Warrington, J. (reported 53 W. R. 203).

The action raised the question whether an option given to a lessee by the lease to purchase the freehold at any time during the term of ninety-nine years at a fixed price was valid, or was void as creating an executory interest in land to arise on a future event which might not happen within the limits of the rule against perpetuities—i.e., within a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards.

The material portions of the documents and facts giving rise to this question were shortly as follows:

By a lease of July, 1867, some six acres of land at Chislehurst were demised by the then owner to the lessee for a term of ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £142. This lease contained the following clause:

"Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that in case the lessee, his heirs or assigns, shall at any time during the said term become desirous of purchasing the fee simple of and in the said lands and premises hereby demised, or any portion thereof not being less than one acre, at and after the rate of £500 per acre, and such further sum for the timber thereon as shall be ascertained by a fair valuation thereof, and upon receipt of the amount of the purchase-money for the same, the lessor, his heirs or assigns, shall and will execute a conveyance or other assurance of the said land and premises with the timber thereon, in favour of the lessee, his heirs or assigns, upon the same terms as to title and otherwise as the lessee and other purchasers of portions of the Camden Park estate have hitherto completed their purchases."

By a lease of July, 1869, some four other acres of land in Chislehurst and Bromley were demised to the same lessee for a term of ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £112, with an option to purchase similar in its terms to that contained in the 1867 lease, except that the option was reserved to the lessee, his "executors, administrators, and assigns," instead of to his "heirs and assigns," and that the price per acre was to be £600. The lands and premises comprised in and demised by these two leases were now vested in the plaintiff for the residues now unexpired of the terms thereby granted, and he claimed that as assignee of these terms he was entitled to the benefit of both of the options if the same were valid and subsisting options. Subject to the leases and the options therein contained, the defendants were the owners in fee simple of the lands comprised in the leases. Notices to purchase the whole of the premises demised by the two leases had, in pursuance of the terms of the options, been given by the plaintiff to the defendants, but the defendants, who were trustees, having been advised that the options were invalid as against them, declined to complete the purchase. The plaintiff thereupon commenced the present action against the defendants, and by his writ claimed a declaration that the two options to purchase were valid and subsisting options which had been duly exercised by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit thereof and to enforce the same against the defendants.

Warrington, J., held that the option clause in question did in terms create an estate or executory interest in land which might arise on an event which might occur after the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities; and, if so, it was void as obnoxious to the rule, on the authority of London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 321, 20 Ch. D. 562; also that the circumstance of the covenant being contained in a lease and not in a conveyance, did not make the case an exception to that rule. His lordship accordingly made a declaration that the two options were not valid and subsisting options to purchase which could be enforced against the defendants by way of specific performance.

The plaintiff appealed.

Upjohn, K.C., Cave, K.C., and Marigold, for the appellant.—A mere option does not create any estate in the land till the exercise of the option. Till such exercise it is a mere matter of contract, and there is no objection on the ground of perpetuity, as the doctrine of remoteness is part of the law of property, not contract. Further, this is a covenant in a lease, and one to which the doctrine of perpetuity has no application.

Rowden, K.C., and Beaumont, for the respondent.—An option to purchase unrestricted in point of time is bad as a perpetuity. This covenant does not run with the land. It destroys the relationship between landlord and tenant, and is therefore not within 32 Hen. 8, c. 34.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 6.—ROMER, L.J., delivered the following judgment of the court: A contract in a lease giving an option of purchase might be good, without regard to the provisions of the statute of Henry VIII., as binding the land in the hands of the heirs or assigns, provided it did not infringe the law as to perpetuities. It would not be the less a binding contract because it was contained in a lease. But in the present case it is clear that the plaintiff cannot succeed on such a ground. Unless the covenant or proviso giving the option of purchase could be said to run with the land by virtue of the provision of the statute, then the plaintiff must fail. Now undoubtedly the statute is in its wording very wide, but it has long been held that some limitations must be implied; as, for example, that the statute does not apply to covenants which do not touch or affect the land demised, or to assigns where the covenants relate to things not in esse, and "assigns" are not purported to be bound. The question in the present case is whether the statute was intended to cover, or can be construed as covering, such a covenant or provision as we have now to consider, so as to make the liability to perform it run with the reversion. We have come to the conclusion that that question must be answered in the negative. The covenant is one aimed at creating, at a future time, the position of vendor and purchaser of the reversion between the owner and the tenant for the time being. It is in reality not a covenant concerning the tenancy or its terms. Properly regarded, it cannot, in our opinion, be said to directly affect or concern the land, regarded as the subject-matter of the lease, any more than a covenant with the tenant for the sale of the reversion to a stranger to the lease could be said to do so. It is not a provision for the continuance of the term, like a covenant to renew, which has been held to run with the reversion, though the fact that a covenant to renew should be held to run with the land has by many been considered as an anomaly, which it is too late now to question, though it is difficult to justify. An option to purchase is not a provision for the shortening of the term of the lease, like a notice to determine or a power of re-entry; though the result of the option, if exercised, would or might be to destroy the tenancy. It is, to our minds, concerned with something wholly outside the relations of landlord and tenant with which the statute of Henry VIII. was dealing. And the results of allowing such a provision to come within the purview of the statute, and to be enforced as running with the land, would lead to very anomalous and, to our minds, most undesirable results as to perpetuities, conversion, and otherwise, which this court should not validate unless it is obliged to do so. And we cannot think that the court is so obliged on the true construction and effect of the statute. It is strange that there is no direct authority on the point. There are cases where the option has been exercised by the tenant and accepted by the landlord, and subsidiary questions have had to be decided which naturally would be dealt with on the footing that what had already been done could not or need not be questioned by the court, as, for example, the case of In re Adams and Kensington Vestry. But such cases are really of no assistance for the decision of the present case. In our judgment the appeal should be dismissed.

DE BEERS CONSOLIDATED MINES (LIMITED) v. HOWE (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Profits or gains arising from trade—"Person residing in the United Kingdom"—"Trade exercised within the United Kingdom"—Company owning mines abroad—Registration abroad—Head office abroad—Business mainly conducted in London—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

A company possessed of diamond mines in Cape Colony, and carrying on the business of diamond merchants, was registered as a limited company in Cape Colony, and had its head office at Kimberley, where the general meetings of the shareholders were held. It had also an office in London, and the majority of the directors resided in England.

Held, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, which showed that the real business of the company was conducted in London, first, that the company was resident within United Kingdom; and, secondly, that it exercised trade within the United Kingdom, so as on both grounds to be chargeable with income tax on the profits of its trade under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1853.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., on a case stated under section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, by the Income Tax Commissioners for the City of London, upon an appeal against two assessments to income tax, one for the year ending the 5th of April, 1901, and the other for the year ending the 5th of April, 1902, each in the sum of £1,557,693, in respect of the profits of the appellant company in the United Kingdom and elsewhere.

The main question raised by the case was whether the appellant company, which was a limited company registered abroad and not registered in the United Kingdom, was "residing" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853 (Schedule D).

The question was also raised whether the company exercised a trade within the United Kingdom within the meaning of the same enactment.

The following facts were found by the commissioners or admitted: The appellant company was registered in Cape Colony in 1888 as an incorporated company with limited liability. It was not registered in the United Kingdom as a joint stock company. Its authorized capital was £4,500,000, and there were also debentures to a large amount. By the articles of association it was provided that the head office of the company should be in Kimberley in Cape Colony, or at such other place either in the said colony or in such other country as the directors should from time to time consider advisable, with such branch or branches elsewhere as the directors should deem fit. The company had offices both at Kimberley and in London; but the head office was at Kimberley, and all meetings of shareholders were held at Kimberley. The company owned or was interested in extensive diamond mines and mining and other property in South Africa and investments in English Government securities and shares in an English joint stock company. The profits of the company were chiefly made by the raising and sale of diamonds to a syndicate composed of six or seven firms of diamond merchants, with whom the company had had a series of contracts since 1895, including one made on the 2nd of December, 1901. These contracts were negotiated and executed in London, and the firms composing the syndicate were all described as of London. The contracts, which varied greatly in detail, provided for the purchase by the syndicate (with delivery at Kimberley) of the produce of the mines up to a specified amount, with provisions for the sharing by the company in the profits made by the syndicate on resale, and other provisions designed to control the output and sale of diamonds from the company's mines. It was admitted that the company was liable to income tax in respect of its share under the above agreement of the profits made by the syndicate. The object and effect of these arrangements by the company, who practically controlled the diamond trade of the world, was to regulate and support the market for diamonds, and the negotiation and maintenance of such arrangements was an essential part of the company's business. The management of the business and the control of the company was vested in three life governors or permanent directors and sixteen ordinary directors, and the articles of association provided that four at least of the directors should reside in England. Weekly meetings of directors were held at the London offices, and also at the Kimberley offices, proceedings being regulated by bye-laws which had been drawn up in London. These provided as follows, inter alia: (1) That the course of business as respected the technical management of the company's work at the mines and the expenditure there in wages, &c., should be determined by the directors for the time being in Kimberley, who, however, were to consult the London directors on matters of exceptional importance; (2) all other expenditure exceeding £25,000 was to be determined by the majority of all the directors of the company; (3) the policy of the board (a) as respected the disposal of its diamonds or other assets, (b) in connection with the working or development of the mines and the output of the diamonds, (c) as respected the application of the profits, and (d) as respected the appointment of elected directors and the filling up of casual vacancies in the board was to be determined by the majority of all the directors of the company, the chairman having a casting vote; (4) matters to be determined by a majority of all the directors were to be determined by resolutions to be submitted to meetings of the directors in London and Kimberley, and the votes recorded in both places to be added together as if taken at one meeting; (5) except as above provided, the London and Kimberley boards were to have equal and concurrent authority, including authority to incur expenditure not exceeding £25,000. The chairman (the Right Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes) attended various meetings of the directors in London when important business was to be transacted or the policy of the board to be determined, and the general manager, who resided half the year in South Africa and the other half in London, had also attended meetings in the latter place. A large number of the directors were resident in London, the largest attendance at a board meeting there had been fifteen, the largest in Kimberley being eight, and the average attendance in London was largely in excess of the average attendance in Kimberley. Matters falling within clause 3 of the bye-laws were always dealt with at meetings of the directors in London and then communicated to Kimberley. There was no instance of the vote of the Kimberley directors turning a minority in London into a majority or negativing the decision of the London board. It was admitted that the majority of the directors had always given their votes on any important matter to be determined under the bye-law numbered (4) at the meetings of the directors in London. The directors in London appointed four committees—viz., the finance, the diamond, the machinery, and the dynamite committees—to act in London. The finance committee was entrusted, inter alia, with the final carrying out of the scheme for the conversion of the company's debentures, under which £3,500,000 5 per cent. mortgage debentures were issued in London in 1894, and it was required to make weekly reports to the directors in London as to the finances, including the payment and discounting of bills. The diamond committee directed and controlled the disposal of diamonds received in London, and submitted for the approval of the directors in London the terms under which the company's production of diamonds was disposed of to the Diamond Syndicate referred to above. The machinery committee executed in London all orders from Kimberley for the purchase of machinery and plant. It acted only on requisitions from Kimberley, and never initiated any policy relating to machinery. Its function was control. The dynamite committee accepted tenders and made contracts for the purchase of dynamite. It also acted only in pursuance of requisitions from Kimberley, never initiating any policy, but merely exercising the function of control. Various other transactions of considerable magnitude, enumerated in the case, were arranged and carried out by the London directors and their committees—e.g., the approval, signing, and sealing in London with the common seal of the company of an agreement with the British South Africa Company as to advances to that company. The case stated that the transactions were always subject to confirmation at Kimberley, but this was only true in the sense that the majority of the directors did not use their power as such majority without formal communication with their colleagues in Kimberley. It was admitted that an absolute majority of all the directors if present in London could not have been overruled by the directors at Kimberley, and further, that as a matter of fact no conflict ever arose, everything decided at meetings in London, at which the Right Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes was present, being accepted without demur. No case was shown in which the directors at Kimberley ever overruled the decision of the directors in London. The general meetings of the company were always held at Kimberley. The general accounts of the company kept at Kimberley, and the balance-sheets, including the audited returns of the London office, were drawn up there and then submitted to all the directors of the company for approval. The minutes showed that the directors in London, who had always been a majority of the board, exercised a controlling influence over the accounts. The dividends, which were always announced in London and Kimberley simultaneously, were arrived at as the result of communications between the directors in London and Kimberley.

The appellant company contended that it was not resident in the United Kingdom and that it did not exercise any trade within the United Kingdom, and was not subject to income tax.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended that the operations of the company were controlled from London, and that London was the real seat of its business regarded as a whole, and that the company was resident here and liable to income tax on the whole profits wherever made.

It was further contended as an alternative that as the whole produce of the mines had been habitually disposed of under contracts made in England with the Diamond Syndicate, the appellant company exercised a trade or business within the United Kingdom.

The commissioners came to the conclusion: (1) That the company's trade or business constituted one trade or business, and was carried on within the United Kingdom, at their London office; (2) that the head and seat and directing power of the affairs of the company were at the London office, from whence its chief operations both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere were in fact controlled, managed, and directed. They determined that the company was a person residing in the United Kingdom and liable to be assessed under section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853 (Schedule D), paragraph 1, on the whole of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing from its trade, whether carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. They accordingly confirmed the assessments.

Phillimore, J., came to the conclusion, upon the facts, that the direction and control of the policy and important operations of the company were exercised in London, and he held that the company was "resident" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 2, Schedule D, of the Income Tax Act, 1853, and was assessable to income tax upon the whole of its profits, wherever made.

The company appealed.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Phillimore, J., holding that the appellant company are chargeable with income tax under the terms of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1853. Those terms are as follows: "For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of such profits or gains; and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of such profits or gains." The learned judge held that the appellant company were resident within the United Kingdom, and he also held that they exercised their trade within the United Kingdom. On either one ground or the other, therefore, he allowed the claim of the Crown that the appellants ought to be assessed to income tax on the profits of their trade.

The most material question, according to Mr. Cohen, is whether the appellants are resident within the United Kingdom. The Attorney-General, on the other hand, says that that question is not so important as Mr. Cohen contends, because, if the appellants carry on business within the United Kingdom, the effect in the circumstances of this case will be the same. His argument is that the appellants have only one business, and they carry on that business within the United Kingdom, and therefore, whether they are resident within the United Kingdom or not, the Crown is entitled to the tax claimed. I will deal with both points. In my opinion the inferences to be drawn are inferences of fact, and there is no real dispute, except with regard to one point, as to the principles of law applicable to the case.

First, then, is this company resident within the United Kingdom? Mr. Cohen met that question in limine. He cited certain American authorities in reliance on which he affirmed that a foreign company cannot have any residence outside the country under whose laws it is incorporated. The dicta to that effect seem to be based on the idea that a company can have only one domicil, but it is admitted that it is possible by the comity of nations for a foreign company to carry on business in a country other than its own, and to that extent to have its existence recognized outside its own country. Whether it ought to be said that this is merely by the comity of nations, or whether the foreign company ought to be called an entity having a real existence in the other country, the result seems to be that, according to the authorities relied on, a company can carry on business in a foreign jurisdiction. However that may be by American law, at any rate it is clear that by our law a foreign corporation can reside in this country. In Carron Iron Co. v. Maclaren, 3 W. R. 597, 5 H. L. C. 416, Lord St. Leonards laid it down that a corporation can have more than one domicil. At p. 449 he said: "I think that this company may properly be deemed both Scotch and English. It may, for the purposes of jurisdiction, be deemed to have two domicils. Its business is necessarily carried on by agents, and I do not know why its domicil should be considered to be confined to the place where the goods are manufactured. The business transacted in England is very extensive. The places of business may, for the purposes of jurisdiction, properly be deemed the domicil. The corporation cannot have the benefit of its place of business here without yielding to the persons with whom it deals a corresponding advantage. The claim of the company is in respect of dealings here. Service on one member of a corporation is good service. Upon general reasoning, I think that the company may, for the purposes of the suit in Chancery, be treated as within our jurisdiction." And further on, at p. 458, he said: "I have been unable to discover which is the particular residence of this company. The money of the appellants is made by returns coming from England. They manufacture in Scotland. The members of this corporation do not make the iron; they do not reside in the house. They are nobody; in fact, they are represented by their seller, but they are not, in other respects, persons dealing as individuals. Their business is carried on in London just as much as it is carried on in Scotland. It is not, therefore, a question of attacking the agent as agent. If the service upon the agent is right, it is because, in respect of their house of business in England, they have a domicil in England. And in respect of their manufactory in Scotland they have a domicil there. There may be two domicils and two jurisdictions; and in this case there are, as I conceive, two domicils and a double sort of jurisdiction, one in Scotland and one in England; and for the purpose of carrying on their business one is as much the domicil of the corporation as the other."

Those dicta establish that it is possible by our law for a foreign company to acquire a domicil—a residence—in this country. Though they are only dicta of Lord St. Leonards, and are not the decision of the House of Lords, they have been followed by this court in questions as to the service of writs. It is necessary to examine those cases and see what lies at the bottom of them, and what bearing they have on Mr. Cohen's contention that it is impossible for a foreign company to acquire a residence in this country. In those cases the question was whether service of a writ could be effected within the jurisdiction on a foreign corporation under ord. 9, r. 8. In order to establish the right to treat the foreign corporation as brought within the jurisdiction in those cases, it was necessary to show that a foreign corporation, none the less because it is a foreign corporation, came within the designation of those persons who under that rule can be served in the manner therein mentioned, and the first thing to be considered was whether it was resident in this country. This court decided that the rule covered a foreign corporation as well as a British corporation. They therefore decided this, that it is possible for a foreign corporation to be resident in this country. It may be that residence for the purpose of service need not be the same as residence for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts. Still, those authorities negative the existence of the hard-and-fast rule contended for by Mr. Cohen.

Assuming it is possible by our law for a foreign company to acquire a residence in this country, the question arises whether in all the circumstances of this case the appellant company can be deemed to have done so. That depends on many facts. I do not propose to go into all the facts in detail. Phillimore, J., has dealt with them, and has come to the conclusion that they show residence in this country. I will refer to a few of them. By the articles of association the head office shall be at Kimberley, in Cape Colony, or at such other place either in the said colony or in such other country as the directors shall from time to time consider advisable. That seems to me to show, not an intention that the residence of the company should be limited to the country under whose laws it had been incorporated, but an intention to allow it to be shifted. It is not inconsistent with an intention to place the head office of the company somewhere else. We are therefore justified in looking to see what has been done in fact. We find that another office has been established in London, that the majority of the directors reside in England, and that, though it is provided that a certain number of directors must reside in South Afrca, there is also a provision that enough to form a quorum must reside in England. The intention of the provisions as a whole seems to be to enable the directors in London to govern the company. In fact, the real business of the company is that of diamond merchants, and that business is conducted in London. The diamonds come from South Africa, but the real business is carried on by the directors in London, though in concert with the directors at Kimberley. The head and brains of the company are to be found in London. On all the facts of the case I come to the conclusion that the appellants are resident and carry on business in this country. I therefore think that the judgment of Phillimore, J., is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

MAY AND OTHERS v. BELLVILLE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Right of way—Reservation in deed of grant—Deed not executed by grantee—"Rights of way hitherto exercised"—Unity of title.

Where, in a contract for the sale of freehold land, the sale was expressed to be subject to a reservation in favour of the vendor and others, the owners and occupiers of certain adjoining lands, of certain rights of way "hitherto exercised" over the land sold, and the conveyance contained words reserving such rights, but was not executed by the purchaser,

Held, that the purchaser could be compelled in an action for specific performance to carry out the terms of the contract by executing the conveyance.

Held, also, that the purchaser, or a person deriving title under him with notice of the terms of the deed of conveyance, is bound in equity to give effect to the rights intended to be reserved, and may be restrained by injunction from interfering with their exercise by the persons in whose favour the reservation was agreed to be made. This is so, notwithstanding that such rights at the date of the deed of conveyance were merely rights de facto, and that, by reason of the unity of title to the dominant and servient tenements being in the vendor at the date of the conveyance, the rights had no existence in law.

On the 25th of March, 1902, the plaintiff May purchased an estate known as the Red Lodge Estate, which included three farms known respectively as White Lodge, Coxhill, and Middle Buryhill, which had been held under one title since 1867.

In the following month, May entered into negotiations with one Jay for the sale of White Lodge, and a price was agreed upon, but Jay went abroad before the contract of sale was signed, after giving a power of attorney to one F. Probyn Dighton, under which Dighton, on the 16th of May, 1902, signed a contract on Jay's behalf for the purchase of White Lodge. This contract was in the form of the printed particulars and conditions which had been prepared for a sale by public auction, and the following words were inserted in manuscript in the particulars and initialled by Dighton: "There is also reserved to the vendor, his heirs and assigns, the owners and occupiers for the time being of Lots 24 and 33, and their servants and others authorized by them, all rights of way hitherto exercised by them in respect of such lots over any portion of this Lot 27."

Dighton approved the title on Jay's behalf, and a conveyance of the property was executed by the vendor on the 24th of June, 1902. The parcels clause in this conveyance contained the words "except and always reserved unto the said Hubert May, his heirs and assigns, the owners and occupiers for the time being of two other farms forming part of the said Red Lodge Estate, and respectively known as Coxhill Farm and Middle Buryhill Farm, and their servants and others authorized by them, all rights of way hitherto exercised in respect of such farms over any portions of the hereditaments hereinbefore described and intended to be hereby conveyed." The deed was not executed by Jay, or by Dighton on his behalf.

Jay took possession under this conveyance, and obstructed the plaintiff Ponting, who was tenant of Coxhill Farm, in the exercise of an alleged right of way over White Lodge. The defendant Mrs. Bellville was the transferee of a mortgage of White Lodge by Jay, and was in possession as such mortgagee.

This action was brought by the plaintiff May as the owner, and the plaintiffs Ponting and William and George Price as the tenants, of Coxhill and Middle Buryhill Farms, for an injunction to restrain the defendant, her servants, tenants, and agents, from locking any gates and from otherwise hindering or obstructing the plaintiffs in the free use of the right of way which was described in paragraph 4 of the statement of claim.

As regards Middle Buryhill Farm the defendant acquired, pending the action, any rights the plaintiff had in respect of that farm, and the claim in respect of that farm was therefore abandoned.

The defendant counterclaimed for an injunction restraining the plaintiffs May and Ponting (as owner and tenant of Coxhill Farm) from entering or trespassing upon White Lodge and from asserting any right of way to or from Coxhill over White Lodge, and for damages.

Astbury, K.C., and Greenwood, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled in equity to a right of way over White Lodge. It is admitted that a reservation operates at law by way of regrant and that you cannot get a legal clothing of your right without a legal grant, but in the present case the rights of way referred to must have been rights de facto; they could not have been rights de jure owing to the previous unity of title: Kay v. Oxley, L. R. 10 Q. B. 360; Bayley v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 Ch. D. 434, 440, 32 W. R. Dig. 227. The words in the contract for sale and in the conveyance are evidence as against Jay of the existence in fact of some such rights. Although the conveyance was not executed by both parties, an agreement to execute a deed operates in equity to give the same rights as if the deed were executed: Walsh v. Lonsdale, 26 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 346, 21 Ch. D. 9. The plaintiff May could have sued Jay for specific performance of his contract, and so compelled him to execute the conveyance, and the Statute of Frauds would not have afforded a defence because the taking possession by Jay was sufficient part performance of the contract.

They also referred to Sheppard's Touchstone, 80; Wickham v. Hawker, 7 M. & W. 63; and Durham and Sunderland Railway Co. v. Walker, 2 Q. B. 940, 967.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Harman, for the defendant.—There has been some user by the tenants of Coxhill of a way over White Lodge, but not constantly, and never as of right. The tenants of Coxhill had no such right under their tenancy agreements, and there is no evidence of any such agreement between the three tenants and their landlord. If the conveyance had been executed by Jay the rights which would have been reserved would be the rights, if any, previously exercised, but no such right had in fact been previously exercised, so that the reservation would have actually effected nothing. The plaintiffs cannot succeed unless they could successfully bring an action against the defendant for specific performance of an agreement to grant rights of way, but such an action must fail because the defendant, Mrs. Bellville, had no knowledge or notice of any contract as to rights of way. She had no right to call for the contract for sale which was recited in and purported to be executed by the conveyance to Jay under which she derived title, and had she called for it the production might have been refused: Leggott v. Barrett, 28 W. R. 962, 15 Ch. D. 306, at p. 309.

Astbury, K.C., in reply.—The rights of way referred to in the conveyance of the 24th of June, 1902, need not be legal rights of way, but such as had been actually enjoyed, however permissive or precarious such enjoyment might have been: International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs, 51 W. R. 615, [1903] 2 Ch. 265.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this action the plaintiffs, as owner and tenants of two farms called Middle Buryhill and Coxhill, assert as against the defendant a right of way over certain lands known as White Lodge. As regards Middle Buryhill the evidence satisfies me that the way which was claimed existed, but no decision is asked for or required as regards that, because, pending the proceedings, the defendant has acquired the rights of Middle Buryhill; she has bought the rights of the owner, and the tenant, who joined as a plaintiff in the action, has ceased to be tenant by the expiration of his tenancy, so that nothing arises as regards that. The real contest in the case arises as regards Coxhill. Coxhill lies to the east, and the way which is claimed in respect of Coxhill is a devious one which is explained accurately, as far as I can see, in paragraph 4 of the statement of claim. It is shown upon the map A B C, and I may describe it as being a way which ran north of White Lodge and south of the railway, and ultimately found its way into the Minety-road. In its course it passed the level crossing in question, and at the bar the defendant has not denied that if the tenant of Coxhill could get as far the level crossing, then he had, over the White Lodge Estate a right to go on from the level crossing towards the westward down this way, which at that point joined the way from Middle Buryhill. I only state that for the purpose of saying that it shows that paragraphs 8 and 10 of the defence and the claim in the counterclaim cannot be sustained. But that does not decide the case at all.

The evidence in this case was conducted, until Mr. Jay got into box, upon the footing that the way I am going to describe next had no existence at all; I heard of it first from him. He said that Coxhill may have had, or had, a right when it got to Davenport Bridge to cross Davenport Bridge to the north, and then, passing over the land to the north of the railway, to come south again across the level crossing and then down the way which I have described. None of the plaintiffs' witnesses were cross-examined about that way at all; it was suggested for the first time in Mr. Jay's evidence. I do not think there is anything in the evidence establishing that there was any right in Coxhill to go that way—that is to say, to cross the railway to the north and then come to the south for the purpose of getting to the level crossing, and then going on. The question is whether the plaintiffs are not right in saying that they had a right to reach the level crossing keeping always south of the railway, and then go down from the level crossing westward by the way which it is admitted they had a right to use. That is the point I am going to decide.

First, as regards the title, the matter stands thus: Down to the year 1867 there was not unity of title as regards the three farms, Coxhill, White Lodge, and Middle Buryhill. On the 28th of March, 1867, there became unity of title, because at that date the owner of Middle Buryhill and White Lodge purchased Coxhill. What existed before 1867 I do not know with any certainty. However, after 1867 there was unity of title as between the three farms; of course there could be no acquisition of a right of way by one farm as against the other. On the 25th of March, 1902, the then owner sold all three farms to May. In the same year, a month or two later, May was minded to sell, and he offered the three properties under certain conditions of sale, and a contract to buy White Lodge was signed by a Mr. Probyn Dighton for Captain Jay on the 16th of May, 1902. There are inserted in manuscript into these particulars, and intialled by Dighton, these words: [His lordship read the words given above, and continued:] Now, it seems to me that this is admissible and valuable for this purpose, that May, the owner at that time of all three farms, was asserting that White Lodge was subject to some rights of way in favour of Middle Buryhill and Coxhill. Now, as I have said, rights of way in a legal sense cannot have existed, because there was unity of title as between the three farms. It has been suggested at the bar as possible that as between tenant and tenant, whether by the insistence of the common landlord or not, the one might have been compelled or compellable to allow the other to pass over his farm. That is a possible state of things. No doubt that would be a right of way in a sense—that is to say, the tenant of White Lodge might take White Lodge upon terms imposed by his landlord that he should let the tenant of Coxhill through his grounds. If that was so, then May was asserting that he had, by the words inserted in the particulars and contract of sale, imposed such terms on his tenant. Another suggestion was that the common landlord had not imposed any such obligation on the tenant, but that in point of fact as between tenant and tenant there always had been a user by the one of a right of way over the other. If that was so, then again May was asserting that, by these words which he introduced into the particulars and conditions of sale. In any case these words show that May, the common owner, was stating that at that time there existed a right of way in favour of Coxhill over White Lodge. Jay became the buyer. His contract was in point of fact carried through by Probyn Dighton on his behalf, but nothing arises upon that. The rights, whatever they are, arise from the fact that Jay accepted a conveyance and took possession upon certain terms. The conveyance, as executed by the vendor, contained these words: [His lordship read the words as above.] That deed was not executed by Jay. The agreement of the 16th of May, 1902, had been executed by Probyn Dighton on his behalf, and had incorporated the words reserving the rights referred to. Under the conveyance Jay took possession. Was Jay entitled to say that, inasmuch as the right of way could only be created by grant and he did not execute the deed, there existed no right of way, and the reservation effected nothing? In other words, if there were "rights of way hitherto exercised in respect of" such farms, can he say that by reason of his non-execution of the deed he is not bound? In my opinion he cannot. Suppose that Jay were the defendant in this action, he is a person who has taken possession under a conveyance which shows that he is to be a grantor to a certain extent. What right has he to say that he is not bound in equity to give effect to the terms upon which he has obtained the possession? The Statute of Frauds does not apply; there is part performance, and the bargain is shown by the terms of the conveyance. He can be called upon by the plaintiff to give effect to the terms upon which he obtained possession—namely, the creation of those rights of way. The defendant is not Jay, but she derives title under Jay. She is a person who became transferee of a mortgage of the 13th of February, 1903, which was executed by Jay in favour of Donaldson for £4,500. Mrs. Bellville derives title under Jay and therefore necessarily has notice of the deed of the 24th of June, 1902, and of the reservation, which I have read, which it contained. How can she say she is not bound by the rights which existed against Jay? It has been argued that she had no notice of the contract of the 16th of May, 1902, which contained the words as to the rights of way, because that contract had been executed by the conveyance. But it seems to me that that is not so; the contract had not been executed by the conveyance, so far as it required the grant by Jay of rights of way reserved; it was still executory as regards that. She was put upon inquiry to ascertain what were the rights of way spoken of in the conveyance as being rights of way hitherto exercised in respect of certain farms. She cannot say that she took without notice of that; therefore there exists against the defendant the same rights as would have existed against Jay in respect of this matter.

That being so, I have got to see whether in point of fact there were rights of way hitherto exercised. As I have already said, no doubt there were no rights of way in the sense of legal rights of way, easements enjoyed by one property as against the other, because all these properties were in one hand. But on the principle of Kay v. Oxley, L. R. 10 Q. B. 360, and Bayley v. Great Western Railway, 26 Ch. D. 434, I am entitled to look and see whether there were rights of way exercised not as being legal rights of way, but rights of way enjoyed or exercised in fact by the one tenant over the land of the other. That is a question of fact upon which I have had a good deal of evidence, and I will state shortly how it appears to me to stand. [His lordship reviewed the evidence, and continued:] The result of all that evidence to my mind is that, whether they went by leave, whether permission was asked, or however it came about, the tenant of Coxhill did regularly and systematically use this way by the Davenport-gate always keeping south of the railway and passing White Lodge either by going north or south of it. That had gone on for thirty-five years. Then came the deed. Were there or were there not rights which in 1902 could be called rights of way hitherto exercised in respect of Coxhill over White Lodge? I think that there were. I think that this roadway from Davenport-gate by the level crossing and on to the Minety-road was a right of way in 1902 exercised in respect of Coxhill. It was not a legal right of way. Was it a right of way to which Jay under the deed of 24th of June, 1902, was bound to give effect? I answer, Yes, it was; that he could be compelled and the defendant taking under him could be compelled to give effect to it. It seems to me to follow that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with that right of way, and therefore I grant an injunction to restrain interference with that right of way, and the defendant must pay the costs.

GUARDIANS OF WOOLWICH UNION v. GUARDIANS OF FULHAM UNION. (a.)

Poor law — Settlement — Unemancipated children — Acquisition of settlement—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34 and 35.

A child under the age of sixteen cannot acquire an independent settlement, a legitimate child having the settlement of its parent and an illegitimate child the settlement of its mother.

Case stated.

On the 13th day of May, 1904, the respondents obtained an order adjudging that the parish of Charlton-next-Woolwich, in the Woolwich Union, was the place of the last legal settlement of the five children named Johnson, properly Turpin—viz., Alice, aged about fourteen, Maude, twelve, John, nine, Queenie, eight, and Dorothy, aged about six years, paupers chargeable to the parish of Fulham; and the appellants were ordered to provide for such paupers.

The following are the facts of the case:

In or about the year 1880 William Turpin married Rosa Clark. In or about the year 1884 Rosa Turpin left her husband William Turpin and cohabited with John Johnson, by whom she had the above-named children.

The above-named children lived with John Johnson and Rosa Turpin in the parish of Lambeth, where the child John was born on the 3rd of March, 1895, Queenie on the 28th of September, 1896, Dorothy on the 16th of December, 1898, and Mabel on the 12th of October, 1900.

The residence in the parish of Lambeth of John Johnson and Rosa Turpin continued without break and without relief from the guardians for a period exceeding three years. During the same period William Turpin resided for a term of three years in the parish of Charlton-next-Woolwich in the Woolwich Union in such manner and in such circumstances as made him irremovable therefrom and settled therein.

In the year 1903 the above-named paupers became chargeable to the Fulham Union, having resided there not quite a year.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the above-named paupers acquired a legal settlement in the parish of Lambeth by reason of their residence therein for upwards of three years prior to 1901 in such manner and under such circumstances as would, in accordance with the provisions of the several statutes in that behalf, render them irremovable therefrom.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the paupers took their mother's settlement, which was the settlement acquired as above stated by William Turpin in the parish of Charlton in the Woolwich Union.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts stated, the above-named children were settled in the Woolwich Union or not.

Rawlinson, K.C. (Cox-Sinclair with him), for the appellants.—The residence of the children in Lambeth enabled them to acquire a settlement: West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union, 52 W. R., pp. 30 and 513. If they did not acquire a settlement of their own they would take the settlement of their mother. That cannot be Woolwich, but the settlement of her husband in 1884: Retford Union v. Strand Union, 3 B. & S. 122. Furthermore, the husband not having contributed to the wife's support, has deserted her: Reg. v. Maidstone Union, 5 Q. B. D. 31.

Macmorran, K.C., and G. Humphreys, for the respondents.—The wife in this case is not a deserted woman. She left her husband; she therefore has the settlement of her husband and of no one else. The judgment of Lord Watson in Reigate Union v. Croydon Union, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465, is clearly in our favour. Manchester Overseers v. St. Pancras Guardians, 27 W. R. 885, 4 Q. B. D. 409, must now be taken to be overruled.

Rawlinson, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case an order has been made by justices for the removal of certain illegitimate children under the age of sixteen to the Woolwich Union, and the argument is that the order is wrong on the ground that the children have acquired a settlement elsewhere. I thought at one time that we might deal with the question under section 3 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 (Poor Removal Act, 1846), but I now think that we really have to put a construction upon sections 34 and 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. I think it is clear from the judgment of Lord Watson in Reigate Union v. Croydon Union that the Divided Parishes Act did not mean to interfere with the settlement of children under sixteen; that so far as a legitimate child is concerned it has the settlement of its mother, and that under section 71 of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, an illegitimate child has its mother's settlement up to the age of sixteen. That being so, these children have the settlement of their mother, which, as she was not a deserted woman, was her husband's settlement. It was suggested in the course of argument that the wife in this case was a deserted wife, and had therefore acquired a settlement in Lambeth in her own right, but I think there are no facts from which we should be justified in assuming that there had been desertion by the husband. If, therefore, we are not satisfied that these children have acquired an independent settlement, this order is good.

The real question we have to decide is whether the effect of sections 34 and 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, is such as to enable children under the age of sixteen to acquire a settlement in the sense that the settlement so acquired will or may affect their status before they actually attain that age. There is no doubt that section 34 purported to give a settlement to persons who had become irremovable under certain circumstances, but whether it was intended to include the case of children living with a reputed father who could not himself give them a settlement seems to me to be extremely doubtful; at any rate it is sufficient for the present purpose to say that there was a very large class of persons who had become or would become irremovable as the result of previous legislation, and who would therefore be deemed to have acquired a settlement by virtue of the operation of section 34. Unless, therefore, the word "child" in section 35, sub-section 3, is to be construed as applying to children under sixteen, the main argument of the appellants is practically cut away. I agree that the statute itself, which begins by destroying and goes on to re-enact, is difficult to construe. There is no doubt that children under sixteen are referred to in paragraph 3 of section 35 and that illegitimate children are referred to in paragraph 2, and as a mere question of construction it is difficult to say why the expression "any child" should not include all classes of children; one argument, however, has been adduced which may possibly explain the reason for the use of that expression. The fact that the section has previously dealt separately with legitimate and illegitimate children is one reason for using the words "any child" in paragraph 3. But we have the distinct opinion of Lord Watson that the provisions of the last clause of section 35 "have no application to children under the age of sixteen, and do not qualify the preceding enactment of section 35, to the effect that a legitimate, or that of 4 & 5 Will. 4, to the effect that an illegitimate, child shall continue to retain its parentage settlement until it has reached that age. The clause assumes that the children whose settlements are the subject of inquiry are not unemancipated, but are paupers in their own right and capable of acquiring a settlement for themselves." Whether Lord Watson's judgment went further than this it is not necessary to consider, his extraordinary acumen and wonderful power of crystallizing the arguments presented to him are well known, and we have here his distinct opinion that this enactment relates to paupers who are emancipated and are capable of acquiring a settlement in their own right, together with a statement that the statute does nothing to qualify the clear existing statutory enactment as to the settlement of children living with their parents.

Reliance was placed on the decision in Manchester Guardians v. St. Pancras Guardians, but I think it is clear that that decision is inconsistent with the judgment of Lord Watson, and I think that he probably had that case, among others, in his mind when he said that he would not go through the cases as they were inconsistent. Therefore, upon the construction of the sections as interpreted by the judgment of Lord Watson I think that the respondents were right in their contention that section 35 does not enable children under the age of sixteen to acquire an independent settlement.

But it is contended by the appellants that we meant to decide this very question in the case of West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union, and certain passages in the judgments of myself and my brother Wills were relied upon which taken by themselves would no doubt warrant the placing of a wider interpretation on this section. But the present point was not suggested to us during the argument of that case and we were not then dealing with the case of children under sixteen at the date of the inquiry. The West Ham case went to the Court of Appeal, but the judgments there show that the decision of that court was confined to the question of the bearing of previous residence during the unemancipated period on the status of a person who at the time of the inquiry had become emancipated. [His lordship read passages from the judgments, [1904] 2 K. B., at pp. 128, 129, 131.]

In my opinion, therefore, section 35 was not intended to deal with the settlement of children, legitimate or illegitimate, under the age of sixteen, but only with the effect of previous residence for the period necessary to give a status of irremovability in the case of emancipated children; the cases support that view, and the positive enactment that illegitimate children are to retain their mothers' settlement up to the age of sixteen is still binding upon us. It being admitted that the mother had the settlement of her husband, it follows that the order appealed from was right.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only say that notwithstanding the careful argument on behalf of the appellants their case is practically gone unless it can be made out that a child living with its parents for the period within the Act of 1876 can, even before the age of emancipation, acquire an independent settlement. Upon that point I will only say that I entirely concur in the view expressed by my lord. In my opinion no authority compels us so to hold, and a decision to that effect would be both unreasonable and inconvenient. Accepting, therefore, the somewhat difficult explanation given by so great an authority as Lord Watson of the language which the Legislature has thought proper to adopt in the third clause of section 35, and treating that language as referring only to persons who have already attained the age of emancipation, I think that this appeal falls and should be dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. It was contended that these children acquired a settlement for themselves by reason of their three years' residence with their parents in Lambeth. But all of them were unemancipated—all were under sixteen. The appellants' contention is wholly inconsistent with Lord Watson's judgment in Reigate Union v. Croydon Union, and I agree that the order appealed from was right.

Appeal dismissed.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Probate. } Feb. 27; March 9, 1905.

In the Goods of DIANAH HUBBUCK. (a.)

Will—Ambiguity—Admissibility of evidence of identification.

The testatrix appointed as executrix and legatee a person she described in her will as "my granddaughter," leaving a blank where the name should have been. At the date of the will and at the testatrix's decease the testatrix had three granddaughters.

The Court admitted evidence, the object of which was the identification of the person so intended, and admitted the will to probate.

The material part of the will of the testatrix, which was dated the 19th of September, 1900, was as follows: "I devise and bequeath unto my granddaughter my real and personal property . . . and appoint her sole executrix of this my will."

The testatrix died on the 29th of June, 1904, and at the date of the will and of the death of the deceased she had three granddaughters.

The only son and heir-at-law of the deceased moved for a grant of administration with the will annexed.

Barnard, for the applicant.—The will is void for uncertainty.

He cited Hunt v. Hort, 3 Bro. C. C. 311, and Charter v. Charter, L. R. 7 H. L. 364.

Middleton, for one of the granddaughters.—A "blank" in a will means a complete absence of description. Here there is only a partial blank, for the word granddaughter makes just the difference.

He cited In the Goods of De Rosaz, 25 W. R. 352, 2 P. D. 66, and Doe v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 363.

Barnard, in reply.

GORELL BARNES, P., in the course of a considered judgment, said it was contended on behalf of the applicant that on the face of the will the gift was void, as the blank in the will was obviously left to be filled in, and that not having been so filled in the will was inoperative for uncertainty, as the testatrix had three granddaughters. On behalf of Miss Mary Anne Hubbock it was contended that the will was operative, inasmuch as she was sufficiently indicated. There was no difficulty in the law applicable to the case; the question was whether the court was entitled to admit evidence as to the "intention" of the testatrix. The question raised was a very old one, and had been repeatedly dealt with by the court. For Bacon's Maxims, No. 23, was as follows: "Ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur"; and in Doe v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 363, it was held "there is but one case in which it appears that this sort of evidence can properly be admitted, and that is where the meaning of the testator's words is neither ambiguous nor obscure; and where the devise is, on the face of it, perfect and intelligible, but from some of the circumstances an ambiguity arises as to which of two or more things or which of two or more persons, each answering the words in the will, the testator intended to express." Lord Hannen had dealt fully with this point in the case of In the Goods of De Rosaz, 2 P. D. 66, his judgment indicating the distinction between this case and those cited in support of the motion. In his judgment Lord Hannen said: "The whole of the testator's will must be in writing, and the court is therefore confined to putting an interpretation on words actually used by him; or, as the rule is expressed by Sir J. Wigram (par. 6), 'The judgment of a court in expounding a will should be simply declaratory of what is in the instrument.' In considering, therefore, whether a particular person or thing has been sufficiently indicated by a testator there must be some words to which the required meaning may be attached. A 'complete blank' cannot be filled up by parol testimony, however strong. Thus a legacy to Mr. —— cannot have any effect given to it (Baylis v. Attorney-General, 2 Atk. 239), nor a legacy to Lady—— (Hunt v. Hort, 3 Bro. C. C. 311). But if there are any words to which a reasonable meaning may be attached, parol evidence may be resorted to to show what that meaning is. Thus a legacy to a person described by an initial, as to 'Mrs. C.,' admits of explanation as by showing that the testator was accustomed to speak of a particular person by the initial of her name (Abbott v. Massie, 3 Ves. 148, and Clayton v. Lord Nugent, 13 M. & W. 207); and, where a blank was left for the Christian name, parol evidence has been admitted to show who was intended: Price v. Page, 4 Ves. 680." Now the words "complete blank" were precisely in point, and distinguished that case from the present one. Later in his judgment Lord Hannen said: "I have dealt with the case thus far on the supposition that evidence of a testator's declarations of intention are not admissible. But in the case of Charter v. Charter, L. R. 7 H. L. 377, Cairns, L.C., says: 'The only case in which evidence of this kind can be received is where the description of the legatee, or of the thing bequeathed, is equally applicable in all its parts to two persons, or two things.' Sir J. Wigram states the proposition thus (prop. 7, par. 194): "The only cases in which evidence to prove intention is admissible are those in which the description in the will is unambiguous in its application to each of several subjects.' If these expositions of the law are to be taken without any qualification, evidence of the testator's expressed intentions could not be given in this case (In the Goods of De Rosaz), for there is here only 'one' known subject, to which the testator's language can apply. It is possibly open to question whether such a case as this was in the contemplation of Lord Cairns and Sir J. Wigram."

The question here was a perfectly plain one, and there was no doubt as to the law on the subject. The question was—Did the description fit two or more persons, so as to let in evidence of "intentions"? That was the only question. Mr. Barnard had argued the case as though it entirely depended upon the blank, and had properly conceded that but for the blank his client's contention would be a difficult one. The cases showed that a "total blank" could not be supplied, but this was not a case of a "total blank," for the description fitted three granddaughters. If there had only been one, he (the President) would certainly have considered her sufficiently identified; but, as there were three, the question was whether the person "intended" was sufficiently identified. On the principles he had indicated he was satisfied that the evidence filed with the object of identification was admissible; and, having read that evidence, there was not the slightest doubt in his mind that the testatrix had intended to benefit and appoint her granddaughter Mary Anne, and no one else. The motion must, therefore, be rejected, and the will admitted to probate by the executrix named in it. All costs out of the estate.

FITZROY v. CAVE. (a.)

Practice—Assignment of debt—Covenant by assignee to repay assignor—Intention to make debtor bankrupt—Maintenance—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6.

The plaintiff and the defendant were co-directors of a company. The plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the conduct of the defendant as a director, obtained from various creditors of the defendant an assignment of the debts owing from him to them, with the object of procuring an adjudication of bankruptcy against the defendant and of so getting him removed from the board of directors. The plaintiff covenanted with the creditors to pay over to them so much of the debts as he might be able to recover after payment of all costs necessarily incurred by him. This covenant was the only consideration for the assignment. The plaintiff having brought an action on the assignment, the defendant set up the defence that the conditions of the assignment and the purpose for which it was procured rendered it unenforceable, as evidencing a transaction which savoured of maintenance.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

Comfort v. Betts, 39 W. R. 595, [1891] 1 Q. B. 737, followed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Lawrance, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiff to recover £90 11s. 5d., being the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendant by certain tradesmen in county Cork, the debts for which were, by deed dated the 13th of October, 1904, assigned to the plaintiff.

The deed of assignment stated that the assignment was made to the plaintiff in consideration of the covenant and agreement on the part of the assignee contained in the deed. The covenant was as follows: "And the assignee hereby covenants with the assignors, and with each of them, that, in case he shall be able to recover and realize the amount of the said debts from the said Arthur Oriel Singer Cave, he will immediately thereupon pay over to them, the assignors, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the said respective amounts, or so much thereof as he may be able to recover or realize, after payment of all costs necessarily incurred by him." Notice in writing of the assignment was duly given to the defendant.

The defendant's case was that the action savoured of maintenance, and, therefore, ought not to be allowed. He alleged that the assignment transferred no interest in the debts to the plaintiff, who merely obtained it with the object of making the defendant bankrupt, and thus removing him from his position as a director of a company of which the plaintiff was also a director.

It appeared that the plaintiff had invested £2,000 in the shares of a company called the Cork Mineral Development Co., and had been made a director. The defendant was also a director of the company and the local manager. According to the plaintiff's own evidence he visited the mines of the company, and found that in consequence of the action of the defendant as a director matters were not going on satisfactorily, and he therefore, on the advice of a local solicitor, obtained the assignment in question from the creditors for the purpose of procuring an adjudication of bankruptcy against the defendant and of so getting him removed from the board of directors. The plaintiff said that he did this for the good of the company and for his own protection, and that he had no animus against the defendant.

Lawrance, J., held, though with much doubt, that as the plaintiff, having no direct personal interest in the matter, procured the creditors to assign their debts to him solely for the purpose of getting the defendant out of his position as director, the case savoured of maintenance, and that therefore the contract was not enforceable as being against public policy. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Roskill, K.C., and Raymond Asquith, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was justified in taking an assignment of these debts, and he is entitled to sue on the assignment: Comfort v. Betts, 39 W. R. 595, [1891] 1 Q. B. 737. Neither the assignment nor the action brought on it constitutes maintenance; nor do they savour of maintenance. Even if the plaintiff had been influenced by an improper motive in obtaining the assignment, the question of motive would be immaterial: Mayor, &c., of Bradford v. Pickles, 44 W. R. 190, [1895] A. C. 587. But he acted from a perfectly proper motive—viz., a desire to protect his own interest and that of other shareholders in the company.

They cited Bradlaugh v. Newdegate, 31 W. R. 792, 11 Q. B. D. 1; Alabaster v. Harness, 43 W. R. 196, [1895] 1 Q. B. 339; and Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Y. & C. Ex. 481.

Holman Gregory, for the defendant.—The whole transaction savours of maintenance, though it has been made to assume the legal form of an assignment of debts. The defendant's creditors were not proposing to take any steps, when the plaintiff, a stranger, intervened with the object of making the defendant a bankrupt. If he had simply induced them to sue the defendant with that object and had undertaken to indemnify them against costs, that clearly would have been maintenance. That is really the essence of what he has done, and he cannot, by clothing the transaction in legal form, get rid of its essence.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 9.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an action originally started under order 14, but sent to be tried in the short cause list. Lawrance, J., has given judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The facts appear from the affidavits made under order 14 and from the evidence of the plaintiff given at the trial.

The plaintiff claimed as assignee of some small debts assigned to him by various creditors of the defendant on the terms of a deed which the plaintiff had caused to be prepared under the advice of a solicitor. The plaintiff explained that his object in taking these assignments was that he was desirous of getting rid of the defendant as co-director of a company in which they were both interested, being satisfied that it was for the best interests of the company that the defendant, with whose conduct he was thoroughly dissatisfied, should be removed from the board. The defence was that the conditions of the assignment and the purpose for which it was procured rendered it unenforceable as evidencing a transaction which savoured of maintenance. The learned judge was of that opinion, and gave judgment for the defendant. There is no dispute about the facts. The plaintiff's statement in cross-examination, as appears by the judge's note, was: "I want to get him off the board and I want to make him bankrupt, and he would have to leave the board. . . . Sole object was to get right of action to make him a bankrupt." It is necessary to scrutinize the terms of the assignment. The deed, which was between five tradesmen of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, after reciting that the defendant was indebted to the five tradesmen in certain sums, and that the tradesmen had agreed to assign the said debts to the plaintiff upon the terms and for the considerations thereinafter set forth, witnessed that in pursuance of such agreement and for and in consideration of the covenant and agreement on the part of the plaintiff thereinafter contained, they, the tradesmen, thereby assigned to the plaintiff all the said debts to hold the same respectively to the plaintiff absolutely. The deed then proceeded: "And the assignee hereby covenants with the assignors, and with each of them, that, in case he shall be able to recover and realize the amount of the said debts from the said Arthur Oriel Singer Cave, he will immediately thereupon pay over to them, the assignors, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the said respective amounts, or so much thereof as he may be able to recover or realize, after payment of all costs necessarily incurred by him."

It is to be observed that no consideration is given by the assignee under the terms of this document except the undertaking to hand over so much as he may be able to recover after payment of all costs necessarily incurred by him. If nothing is realized, no costs will be payable by the assignors. It seems to me, therefore, that under this arrangement he acquired nothing but a bare right of litigation, giving him no interest in the proceeds, but enabling him to take collateral proceedings for an ulterior purpose. Had he, without taking an assignment, undertaken to find the money for the litigation to be followed up to bankruptcy, I think the case of maintenance would be quite clear in its simplest form, unless actions to recover debts are incapable of being the subject of maintenance. So long as the real transaction is the same, the form in which it is carried out ought not to alter the legal effect, and in the view of a court of equity it was not allowed to do so. Whether maintenance or not in the strictest sense, it savoured of maintenance: see Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves., at pp. 125, 126; Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Y. & C. Ex., at pp. 496 et seq.; and Harrington v. Long, 2 My. & K. 590. The terms of the assignment in this case, by which the assignor pays no costs and has to submit to a deduction for them only in the case of a sum being realized from which such deduction can be made, seem to be equivalent in this respect to the deed of indemnity to which so much importance was attached in the last of the above cases. The illustrations given in argument in that case by the defendant's counsel, both on the hearing before the Master of the Rolls and on the rehearing before Lord Brougham, seem to cover the precise facts of this case.

Assuming, therefore, that actions of debt do not stand on a different footing in this respect from all other actions, and are capable of being made the subject of maintenance, in my opinion, but for the case of Comfort v. Betts, the argument for the defendant ought to succeed. That is a decision of the Court of Appeal, and binds us, unless there is such a difference in the terms of the assignment as to distinguish it from the assignment in this case. There is nothing mentioned in the report in the Law Reports as to the provision for costs. The effect of the transaction, however, was referred to in these terms by Lord Esher, M.R.: "Large numbers of debts were assigned to debt collectors without their having any interest in such debts and merely for the purpose of their being sued for"; and we were told by the appellant's counsel that the conditions of the assignment were the same as those in this case; and from the report in 64 Law Times Reports, at p. 685, this would seem to be so. If this be so, I see no reason why the transaction might not have been impeached on precisely the same grounds as those which were urged in this case. It is true that the point of maintenance was not distinctly raised, but some considerations of public policy were undoubtedly discussed, and the court held that the assignment was good under section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. That decision is, therefore, an authority in this court that such an assignment can be enforced. No doubt there was no evidence in that case as there is here of a special collateral purpose for which the assignment was taken; but, if the transaction as described in the document was free from all taint of maintenance, the title of the assignee was absolute, and could not be impeached because he acted maliciously in contemplation of law in enforcing it: see Stevenson v. Newnham, 13 C. B. 285; Mayor, &c., of Bradford v. Pickles. Without, therefore, attempting to grapple with the broader question whether at the time when that case was decided actions to recover debts had ceased to be a possible subject of maintenance, I think it binds us, and I am constrained to differ from the conclusion of the learned judge below, and to hold that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from the judgment of Lawrance, J., in favour of the defendant. The plaintiff is the assignee of five debts amounting together to over £50 due from the defendant to five creditors resident in Ireland. The assignment is effected by a deed dated the 13th of October, 1904. It is in the common form of an absolute assignment, but there is no pecuniary consideration, and the assignee takes no beneficial interest, for he covenants that, in case he is able to recover the amount of the debts from the defendant, he will pay over to the assignors the respective amounts or so much thereof as he may be able to recover or realize after payment of all costs necessarily incurred by him. Now the existence of the debts is not disputed, and unless the plaintiff can recover the amounts the defendant has been relieved from all responsibility. It has, however, been strenuously contended by Mr. Gregory in his very able argument that the plaintiff's action is open to the objection of maintenance, or is otherwise such that on grounds of public policy the court ought to refuse its assistance. This view was adopted by the learned judge.

It is desirable to consider the limits of the doctrine of maintenance as applied to choses in action. There are undoubtedly many choses in action which are not and never were assignable either at law or in equity. A right to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud is a typical instance. It is plain that no court would allow the assignee of such a right to maintain an action. The instrument would be equally void at law and in equity. And an agreement by which a third person (not being within the recognized exceptions, such as master and servant) undertakes to institute or prosecute or assist the litigation in the name of the claimant, and to indemnify him wholly or partly against the costs of the litigation, is a principle open to precisely the same objection. If not technically maintenance, it savours of maintenance. This is well illustrated by Lord Eldon's judgment in Wood v. Downes and by Lord Abinger's judgment in Prosser v. Edmonds. The case of Harrington v. Long is inadequately reported, but it seems to me to be only another instance of the same principle. For the supplemental bill, in which the assignee and assignor were co-plaintiffs, sought to set aside a deed of gift by the testator in favour of the defendant, and the assignment was executed and the deed of indemnity was given "solely for the purpose of enabling him" (i.e. the assignee) "to prosecute the original suit and to impeach the deed."

There are, however, other choses in action which, though not assignable at common law, were always regarded as assignable in equity. A debt presently due and payable is an instance. At common law such a debt was looked upon as a strictly personal obligation, and an assignment of it was regarded as a mere assignment of a right to bring an action at law against the debtor. Hence the assignment was with some exceptions which need not be referred to (see 1 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, p. 458), looked upon as open to the objection of maintenance. After a time the common law courts recognized the right of any one who had a pecuniary interest in the debt to sue in the name of the creditor. This, however, was the limit of their departure from the old strict rule, so far as I have been able to discover. But the courts of equity took a different view: Row v. Dawson, 1 Ves. sen. 331. They admitted the title of an assignee of a debt, regarding it as a piece of property, an asset capable of being dealt with like any other asset, and treating the necessity of an action at law to get it in as a mere incident. They declined to hold such a transaction open to the charge of maintenance. Thus, in Prosser v. Edmonds, Lord Abinger says, at p. 491: "With respect to the question as to the validity of an assignment of a right to file a bill in equity" (i.e. to set aside an alleged fraudulent deed), "I must distinguish between this sort of case and the assignment of a chose in action" (i.e., a debt). And again, at p. 496: "It was urged . . . that the assignee of a chose in action" (i.e., a debt) "may file a bill in equity to recover it, though he cannot proceed at law for that purpose. But where an equitable interest is assigned, it appears to me that, in order to give the assignee a locus standi in a court of equity, the party assigning that right must have some substantial possession, some capability of personal enjoyment, and not a mere naked right to overset a legal instrument. . . . So, where a person takes an assignment of a bond, he has the possession; and, though a court of equity will permit him to file a bill on the bond, it does not follow that he is obliged to go into a court of equity to enforce payment of it." A court of equity recognized not merely transactions which amounted to sales or mortgages of debts, under which the assignee took a beneficial interest in the debt, but also the creation of trusts, under which the trustee took no interest. Thus A., the creditor, might assign the debt to B., with or without a power of attorney, upon trust for C. Or A. might simply declare himself a trustee of the debt for C. In either case the trustee would take no beneficial interest, and would, by virtue of his position as trustee, be entitled to be indemnified out of the moneys recovered against all costs of the action brought in the name of A. against the debtor. If the debt was secured by a promissory note or bill or other negotiable instrument, A. might deliver the instrument to B. upon trust for C., and B. could sue at law on it. Or A. might create a trust in favour of himself by delivering the instrument to B. upon trust for himself. It would, I apprehend, in this case be no objection to say that B. had no interest in the debt. It has never, so far as I am aware, been suggested that a trustee to whom a debt is assigned is exposed to a charge of maintenance. Mortgages are every day dealt with in this fashion, including an assignment of the debt. From time to time particular classes of obligation have by statute been rendered assignable at law, and by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 6, any debt is made assignable at law by an absolute assignment in writing, of which notice is given to the debtor. Henceforth in all courts a debt must be regarded as a piece of property capable of legal assignment in the same sense as a bale of goods. And on principle I think it is not possible to deny the right of the owner of any property capable of legal assignment to vest that property in a trustee for himself, and thereby to confer upon such trustee a right of indemnity. It is not easy to see how the doctrine of maintenance can be applied to a case like the present. The decision of this court in Comfort v. Betts really proceeds upon this footing, and seems to me to be decisive of the present case. The court is not asked to exercise any discretionary jurisdiction. If the assignment is valid at all, it is valid in all courts, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment ex debito justitiæ. The plaintiff is merely seeking by this action to recover payment of debts admitted to be justly due. It is said that the plaintiff does not really desire to be paid and can take nothing for his own benefit under the judgment. For the reasons above stated I think this is of no moment. It is further urged that his only object is to obtain a judgment which may serve as the foundation of bankruptcy proceedings, the ultimate result of which will be the removal of the defendant from his position as director of a company in which the plaintiff is largely interested. But I fail to see that we have anything to do with the motives which actuate the plaintiff, who is simply asserting a legal right consequential upon the possession of property which has been validly assigned to him. If the defendant pays, no bankruptcy proceedings will follow. If he does not pay, bankruptcy is a possible result. In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. Mathew, L.J., agrees with this judgment.

Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Annulment—Payment in full—Release by creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 35 (1).

In order to obtain the annulment of an adjudication in bankruptcy by proving to the satisfaction of the court that all debts have been paid in full under section 35 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the payment in full must be a payment of money, and a debt which has been released by a creditor voluntarily, or for small consideration, is not paid in full within the meaning of the section.

This was an appeal by the official receiver against the decision of a Divisional Court (Bigham and Darling, JJ.) sitting in bankruptcy.

An order was made by the registrar of the county court at Leeds annulling the bankruptcy of the above debtor in these circumstances:

The debtor was an outside stockbroker, and on the 24th of September, 1903, a receiving order was made against him on a creditor's petition, and on the 1st of October, 1903, he was adjudicated a bankrupt. His liabilities being £9,600 and his assets only £189, an order was made for the summary administration of his estate, and the official receiver became the trustee in the bankruptcy.

Only one dividend of 2d. in the pound was paid. All the creditors, except a few whose debts amounted to £41 and who were paid in full, being desirous of helping the debtor, executed a deed whereby they released the debtor from their debts and agreed to withdraw their proofs.

In September, 1904, the debtor applied to the county court to annul his adjudication and put in evidence the deed of release. The registrar made the order.

The official receiver appealed to the Divisional Court.

Section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that where in the opinion of the court a debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt, or where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may, on the application of any person interested, by order annul the adjudication.

The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal, holding that the order of the registrar was right.

Bigham, J., said that what was equivalent to payment in full had occurred. The creditors had chosen to release their debts and withdraw their proofs. The court had a discretion and might look into the facts, but here there was no reason to suppose that anything improper had been done or to doubt the honesty of the transaction.

The official receiver appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and Lushington, for the official receiver.—This case is distinguishable from In re E. A. B., 50 W. R. 229, [1902] 1 K. B. 457, and from In re Pilling, 51 W. R. 465, [1903] 2 K. B. 50. Both those cases raised the question whether a scheme should go through, which is very different from the present case, as the court has control over a scheme. There has been no payment in full of the debts within section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Payment in full there means payment in cash, and a release by the the creditors is not equivalent to payment in full.

Carrington, for the debtor.—The decision of the Divisional Court was right. There is no reason to doubt the bona fides of this transaction, and in the absence of any suggestion of wrongdoing, the court ought to sanction it. The debts have all been fully paid. If a part of the debts were released and the balance paid, the debt would be fully paid and it makes no difference that the entire debt has been released.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 9.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The bankrupt applied in the county court for an annulment of his bankruptcy on the ground that all his debts which had not been released had been paid in full. The registrar made the order for annulment. The Divisional Court affirmed the order of the registrar. Not without some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that this appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court must be allowed. I cannot agree with Bigham, J., that the release of a debt is equivalent to or the same as "payment in full," which, by section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is the condition precedent to the jurisdiction to annul, a condition which the bankrupt contends has happened in the present case. I have had more doubt whether Darling, J., was not right when he treated section 35 as dealing with debts which continued to be debts throughout the bankruptcy until they were paid, that is, extinguished by payment in full, and does not apply to those which have been put an end to by release. I agree with him that the language of the Act is inaccurate and does not strictly describe what Parliament meant to say. The wording of section 36, which runs thus, "For the purposes of this part of this Act, any debt disputed by a debtor shall be considered as paid in full, if the debtor enters into a bond, in such sum and with such sureties as the court approves, to pay the amount to be recovered in any proceeding for the recovery of or concerning the debt, with costs, and any debt due to a creditor who cannot be found or cannot be identified shall be considered as paid in full if paid into court," rather supports the view of Darling, J. Suppose the debtor alleges that he has paid all his debts and disputes the right of a creditor, who has executed an unconditional release, to be paid anything, and suppose thereupon the debtor enters into the necessary bond to pay the amount to be recovered in any proceeding for the recovery of or concerning the debt, it is not easy to see how the creditor suing could succeed, unless the issue raised was whether, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, the debtor had a provable debt. An issue whether the creditor, at the moment of the application to annul, had a provable debt would, so far as I can see, let in a replication by the debtor of a release. Moreover, it is not the debtor only who is affected by a released debt being regarded as continuing for the purposes of section 35 as capable of payment. If a debt has been in truth and in fact unconditionally released, the proof ought to be expunged on the application of any creditor who, by reason of his proved debt, has a right to rank upon the debtor's estate. With regard to section 36, the only way out of the difficulty, in my opinion, would be to hold that, according to the true construction of that section, a bankrupt cannot dispute a proved debt, but is bound by the admission of the proof by the trustee administering his estate, and to read the words in section 35 "that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full" as meaning that the proved debts are paid in full—that is to say, not the debts only of those still entitled to share in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate, but also all debts which, having been proved, have not been discharged by payment in full; and on the whole I think this, and not the view of Darling, J., is the right view. I believe, although I cannot find the case reported, I, when acting as judge in bankruptcy, expressed my approval of this construction. The section is not very clear, but I think that in practice it has always been construed as meaning that the condition of annulment is payment in full of all debts which have been admitted to proof, unless the proof has been expunged on the ground that it never ought to have been admitted.

In the present case it appears, by the report of the official receiver, that the bankrupt personally obtained all the signatures to the deed of release, and at the same time obtained the consents of the creditors to the proofs being expunged, which consents, together with the executed deeds of release, were exhibited to the bankrupt's affidavit, but no application to expunge the proofs, or any of them, has been made, and the proofs remain on the file. But, if the construction which I am putting on the section is right, the decision of the court would have been the same, even if the proofs of the released debts had been expunged and removed from the file. No one can doubt that the words of the section will support this construction, although another construction may be possible, and to construe the section in the way contended for on behalf of the bankrupt would undoubtedly open the door to arrangements with creditors under which the court, in ignorance of the true facts, might in the exercise of its discretion (for a bankrupt paying all his debts in full can only obtain an order for annulment if the court thinks fit, and not ex debito justitiæ) order annulment of a bankruptcy, when the court, if it had known the circumstances under which the releases were obtained, would have refused to annul. I have only to add that cases like In re E. A. B. and In re Pilling, which for the purposes of schemes of arrangement under section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, treat, for the purpose of the sanction of the court to a scheme of arrangement, the "debts" as those debts of the debtor existing at the time of the application to the court for its sanction to the scheme, to the exclusion of debts unconditionally released under circumstances which the court considered did not preclude it from giving its sanction to the scheme, do not really affect the question of construction of section 35 at all. I think that the court ought to read "debts" in section 35 as meaning debts admitted to proof, because to hold "debts" to mean "provable debts" would make the payment in full by a bankrupt of debts for advances by relations and friends, who have not proved conditionally or otherwise, or in any way intervened in the bankruptcy, a condition precedent to the power of the court to annul.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I can state my reasons very shortly. In the first place I cannot agree with Bigham, J., that a debt which has been voluntarily released by the creditor can be said to have been paid in full. In the second place it is clear from the section that the word "debts" is a word referring to debts not existing as such at the date of the application for annulment; and without considering to what debts previously owing the section is referring, I think that it must at any rate be meant to refer to and cover debts which have been proved, and rightly proved, in the bankruptcy.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, must be read in connection with the other provisions of the Act. I refer particularly to those found in section 28, which has, no doubt, been repealed, but has been re-enacted in section 8 of the Act of 1890 with modifications and extensions. Section 28 provided that the court should refuse discharge in all cases where the bankrupt had committed any misdemeanour under that Act or the Debtors Act, 1869, or any amendment thereof; and also should, on proof of any of the facts therein mentioned, either refuse the order or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time, or grant an order of discharge subject to certain conditions. It follows from that, that in granting an order of discharge the court exercises discretion. Under the present legislation the court has to take into consideration, amongst other facts, that the bankrupt's assets are not of a value equal to 10s. in the pound on the amount of his unsecured liabilities. In the present case the bankrupt's debts amounted to £9,630, and the assets have been sufficient only to pay a dividend of 2d. in the pound, a very serious fact which would have to be taken into consideration if the bankrupt were applying for an order of discharge. He is not applying for an order of discharge, but for an order of annulment under section 35, under which, if it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may wipe out the bankruptcy altogether and put the bankrupt in the same position as if there had been no adjudication. The question is whether such an order ought to be made in the present case. The first point to be considered is whether the bankrupt has satisfied the condition prescribed by the Legislature—namely, whether he has proved to the satisfaction of the court that his debts are paid in full. On that it has to be considered what are the debts meant, and I agree with my brethren that the debts there referred to include at least all the debts which have been actually and properly proved in the bankruptcy. The large mass of those debts has in this case been got rid of by means of releases from the creditors given without any consideration. To test the case, let us suppose that it had been proved that the releases had been given in consideration of a payment of 6d. in the pound, would that be a payment in full? I cannot think that that is the meaning of the Act at all, and I respectfully differ from Bigham, J., who appears to have been of that opinion. The language of the Act interpreted according to its natural meaning appears to me to require a payment in full—a payment of money—something which in an action of law could under the old practice have been pleaded as a payment. If the releases had been given in consideration of a small payment, in my judgment they would not have satisfied the requirements of the Act, and still less could releases given without any consideration at all. I think, therefore, that the bankrupt has not satisfied the requirements of the Act so as to be entitled to an order for annulment, but I desire to add that the jurisdiction which is conferred by section 35 is discretionary. The Act provides simply that the court may, on the application of any person interested, by order annul the adjudication, and in my judgment, in the absence of some more special circumstances, it would not be a good exercise of discretion that an order for annulment should be made in a case in which, if the bankrupt were applying for an order of discharge, the order would not be granted. For these reasons I think that the order which has been made cannot be supported, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

A marriage brokage contract is not confined to a contract for reward to procure an introduction to a particular person with a view to marriage, but includes a contract to procure introductions to persons generally with a view to marriage; and the court will order money paid under such a contract to be repaid, even though some step has been taken by the other party towards the performance of the contract.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (1905, 1 K. B. 24, 53 W. R. Dig. 97) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.), on an appeal from the Westminster County Court (reported in [1905] 1 K. B. 24).

(a.) Reported by J. F. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought in the county court to recover £52.

In response to an advertisement in a paper called the Matrimonial Post and Fashionable Marriage Advertiser, the plaintiff, Miss Hermann, who was thirty-three years of age, called on the defendant, the proprietor. In consequence of her interview with him she signed an agreement to pay him £250 if a marriage resulted through his exertions, and on the next day it was agreed verbally that she should pay him, as a "special client's fee," £52 in order that he should introduce her to gentlemen with a view to matrimony, of which £47 was to be repaid to her at the end of nine months if no engagement or marriage took place within that time. She sent a cheque for £52, and the defendant acknowledged it in the following terms: "I have to acknowledge the receipt of £52, less £47 to be returned in nine months should no engagement or marriage take place within that period." Introductions were made and photographs exchanged, but nothing resulted in consequence.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover the £52 within five months after the £52 was paid.

The county court judge found that the contract was a marriage brokage contract, that the defendant had undertaken to find the plaintiff a husband, and that the contract was therefore illegal; that the plaintiff had repudiated it before the illegal purpose of procuring the engagement or marriage had been carried into effect, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to have her money back.

The Divisional Court held that the agreement, not being an agreement to procure for the plaintiff a particular person as her husband, was not a marriage brokage contract, and was not illegal; and that, therefore, the claim as to £5 was in no circumstances maintainable, and as to the £47 was premature.

The plaintiff appealed.

Duke, K.C., and Compton Smith, for the plaintiff.—The distinction drawn by the Divisional Court between a contract to procure a marriage with a particular person and a contract to procure a husband or wife generally for another person is not supported by the authorities and cannot be maintained. Marriage brokage contracts were originally not illegal at common law, but courts of equity, being jealous of safeguarding marriage relations, and in order to prevent anyone from making a profit out of that relationship, refused to allow such a person to retain any money paid under such a contract, and ordered it to be repaid. The county court judge has found as a fact that this contract is a marriage brokage contract, and there was evidence to support that finding. The contract therefore is illegal and void, and the plaintiff can recover back the money paid under it. [They referred upon this point to Scott v. Tyler, 1 Wh. & T. L. C. (7th ed.), p. 535; Hall v. Potter, Show. P. C. 76; Arundel v. Trevillian, 1 Rep. Ch. 47; Roberts v. Roberts, 3 P. D. 742.] Further, the defendant was a mere stakeholder who held £52 to abide a certain event. The transaction having been repudiated before the event happened, the plaintiff can recover the money back: Cotton v. Thurland, 5 T. R. 405; Tappenden v. Randall, 2 Bos. & P. 467; Aubert v. Walsh, 3 Taunt. 277; Hastilow v. Jackson, 8 B. & C. 221. A party to the contract may be a stakeholder: Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan, 44

W. R. 497, [1896] A. C. 166; Barclay v. Pearson, 42 W. R. 74, [1893] 2 Ch. 154. Even at law, therefore, the plaintiff could have recovered this sum as money had and received to the use of the plaintiff. The defendant cannot recover even for services rendered, as they were rendered under a void contract.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Schiller, for the defendant.—First, if this is a marriage brokage contract, and therefore illegal, the plaintiff cannot recover the money back because she cannot make out her cause of action without setting up the illegality: Bensley v. Bignold, 5 B. & A. 335; Collins v. Blantern, 1 Sm. L. C. (11th ed.), p. 369; Hunt v. Silk, 5 East 449; Taylor v. Chester, L. R. 4 Q. B. 309, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 28, 94; Harse v. Pearl Life Assurance Co., 52 W. R. 457, [1904] 1 K. B. 558. There had been no total failure of consideration. If nothing has been done under the contract the plaintiff might recover back the money: Symes v. Hughes, L. R. 9 Eq. 475, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 139; Simpson v. Bloss, 7 Taunt. 246; Smith v. Bruning, 2 Vern. 392; Keat v. Allen, 2 Vern. 588; Taylor v. Bowers. But if a step has been taken under the contract, the plaintiff cannot rely upon a total failure of consideration and cannot recover: Tappenden v. Randall; Herman v. Jeuchner; Kearley v. Thomson; Scott v. Brown, 41 W. R. 116, [1892] 2 Q. B. 742. If the contract was not merely illegal, but immoral, the plaintiff could never recover—ex turpi causâ non oritur actio. Secondly, this is not a marriage brokage contract. It was not a contract to procure a marriage with a particular person, but to procure introductions generally: King v. Burr. That contract is not open to the objection of marriage brokage, and therefore not against public policy. A marriage brokage contract was against public policy, because it was made with a person who could influence the particular girl specified, as a parent exercising influence over his daughter. Such a contract would tend to interfere with the unbiassed advice which a parent ought to give to his daughter upon the subject of her marriage by reason of the money payment made to the parent. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J., said that he had obtained from the Record Office the bill in the case of King v. Burr, which was a case, not of a contract to introduce the defendant to a particular lady, but to introduce him to ladies generally, and the Lord Chancellor refused the assistance of the court in support of such an action, the bill being a bill of discovery in equity in support of an action at law to recover the expenses of entertainments given by the plaintiff with a view to carry out the contract.*]

* The bill was a bill in equity in support of an action at law to recover the expenses of entertainments given by the plaintiff under an agreement with the defendant to introduce him to some woman of fortune with a view to marriage, and the defendant demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was allowed, the Lord Chancellor saying that he would not give any assistance in support of such an action. The decision was in 1810. The bill set out the matrimonial advertisement which led to the agreement, and the defendant's promise in consequence. The advertisement was as follows: "Marriage Institution, No. 8, Margaret-street, Cavendish-square. The restrained and delicate condition which custom imposes on females subjects them to great disadvantages. By this institution all impediments are obviated. Ladies who have fixed their affections but never avowed the prepossession may be instructed how to effect their wishes. Any gentleman who has formed a predilection for a lady may be assisted in obtaining her. Those who have yet formed no attachment may have objects pointed out to them. The unions which have already been effected prove how secret and circumspect Mrs. Morris conducts her business, and that she uses means peculiar to herself and generally successful. The applicants pay in the first instance ten or twenty guineas. She rises or lowers her demand according to their condition and capacity, and gives them an immediate introduction. She requires their names, places of residence, and a particular description of their circumstances, without which she cannot serve them, and she attaches responsibility to her recommendations, and cannot introduce persons until she knows them thoroughly. The secrecy that has all along been observed is a pledge for her that she can never abuse their confidence placed in her. None are introduced except those whose characters are unexceptionable, but if they are rejected they are never exposed." The promise of the defendant, who was a general, was set out as follows: "Should the intercourse between me and the proprietors of the institution be instrumental to my marrying a lady to whom I have been introduced, I promise to pay £1,000 on the day of marriage. The general expects to be introduced to no lady who has not property the annual produce of which is less than £1,500 per annum, of unblemished character, and of respectable connections, her age from thirty-seven to fifty-seven."

Duke, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the Divisional Court reversing the decision of a county court judge. The circumstances are shortly these: The plaintiff, a young lady, was desirous of getting married. She was attracted by an advertisement in the Matrimonial Post, of which the defendant was the proprietor, and she got into communication with him. He undertook to assist her to get married by means of introductions to gentlemen, and she agreed to pay him £250 in the event of a marriage resulting therefrom, and also, as a "special client," she handed to him £52, of which sum he was to keep £5 in any event, and the balance of £47 in the event of an engagement or a marriage taking place within nine months. The defendant gave her various introductions, and at the end of two months she thought better of it and demanded her money back. The county court judge, in an admirable judgment, came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the £52, the contract being a marriage brokage contract, and therefore one with regard to which the law would not assist in its accomplishment—that it was a contract which the law regarded with disfavour, and would give its assistance to a party to it who was seeking to undo it. The Divisional Court came to the conclusion that a contract to procure introductions with a view to marriage, giving the lady a choice, was not within the mischief of marriage brokage, which was confined to a contract to procure a marriage with one particular person. When one looks back at the principle upon which the law as to these contracts rests, I fail to find any foundation for that distinction. The principle seems to me to be violated just as much by a contract to bring about a marriage with any one of several persons as with one particular person. The principle is most clearly stated in Cole v. Gibson, 1 Ves. sen. 503, where Lord Hardwicke said: "To be sure, this court has been extremely jealous of any contract of this kind made with a guardian or servant, especially with a servant, in respect of the marriage of persons over whom they have an influence; (and has been justly so, nothing tending more to introduce improper matches), and by rules established, not regarding whether the match is proper or no, if brought about by a marriage brokage contract, sets it aside; not for the sake of the particular instance or the person, but of the public, and that marriages may be on a proper foundation; therefore, though a proper match, as it was in Hall v. Potter, Show. P. C. 76, yet for the sake of the mischief that would be introduced, and to prevent that influence which servants more especially would gain over young ladies, the court sets it aside; and if that was the nature of the contract, I do not know that subsequent confirmations have been permitted to stand in the way of the relief sought. . . . Nor will the annuities being granted after the marriage alter the case; for in that great authority in Lord Coventry's time of Arundel v. Trevillian, 1 Rep. Ch. 47, the bond for performance was given after marriage, the husband having his hands free; yet the court even so long ago did not suffer it to prevail. In those cases, therefore, such a sort of confirmation or subsequent acts have not been considered; nor in other cases where there is remedy on like grounds; as in private, clandestine agreements in contradiction of the public marriage agreement; as by husband to return part of his wife's fortune without the privity of his own relations; for unless something released or barred his action the court will never suffer such subsequent acts to bar it." That case is important as showing that the cause of the mischief aimed at is not merely a contract to procure a marriage with one particular person, but that it exists equally in the case of a contract to procure a marriage generally. I can see no distinction in this respect between the one contract and the other. At the bottom of a marriage brokage contract was the marriage brokage itself, thereby introducing the consideration of a money payment into what should be free from any such taint. The case is frequently complicated by the fact that other elements intervene, such as undue influence on the part of a parent or guardian, but those are not essential elements in marriage brokage. It was clearly decided in the case of King v. Burr, 3 Mer. 693, a case which is indistinguishable in its facts from the present case, that the very mischief aimed at included the case of a contract for introductions generally with a view to marriage. Cozens-Hardy, L.J., has obtained the bill in that case from the Record Office, and the circumstances are practically identical with those in the present case. The plaintiff undertook to give to the defendant, who was desirous of getting married, introductions to ladies, and the plaintiff was to receive a sum of money if a marriage resulted. It involved expensive entertainments, and the plaintiff sued the defendant, who was a general, at law to recover the price of the entertainments, and the plaintiff filed a bill in the Court of Chancery for discovery in aid of the action at law. Therefore the very point as to the contract being one for introductions to ladies generally, and not a contract for an introduction to one particular lady, arose. The bill was met by a demurrer, and the demurrer was allowed. The coincidence between the methods employed in 1810, when that case was decided, and those employed now is singular. The Divisional Court had not the advantage of seeing the bill in that case, and therefore they had not the assistance which we are able to derive from it. With great respect, I am unable to agree with the judgment of the Divisional Court; and in my opinion, both upon principle and upon authority this transaction falls within the mischief of marriage brokage.

Then comes the next question, which was not discussed in the court below—namely, assuming the contract to be void, has there been such a part performance of it as to debar the plaintiff from getting relief. In other words, can the plaintiff insist upon the right to have the transaction undone. That is an important question It is said that the lady was a party to an illegal contract, and that she comes to the court setting up her own wrong and asks for relief. It is said that, though in modern times parties have resiled from an illegal contract before the illegal purpose has been accomplished, yet they cannot do so if any part of the illegal purpose is fulfilled, and that, as in the present case introductions have been given and trouble and expense incurred, it is now too late for the plaintiff to resile from the contract. The plaintiff places her case upon two grounds. First, she claims to recover back the money deposited to abide an event which never happened, and, standing upon her common law rights, she says that she has deposited with the defendant a sum of money to be kept by him only upon the happening of a certain event; that that is an illegal object, and there is no contract binding at common law, and that it is competent for her to revoke it at any time before the happening of the event; and that she has revoked it before the happening of the event and is therefore entitled to recover back the money. Upon this point I must refer to the judgment of Stirling, J., in Barclay v. Pearson, 42 W. R. 74, at p. 77, [1893] 2 Ch. 154, at p. 168, where he said: "Hastelow v. Jackson was an action in which the plaintiff and one Wilcoxon deposited money in the hands of a stakeholder to abide the event of a boxing match between them, and after the battle the plaintiff demanded the whole sum from the stakeholder, and threatened him with an action if he paid it over to Wilcoxon. This he nevertheless did by the direction of the umpire, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from him his own stake as money had and received to his use. Littledale, J., stated the law very clearly thus: 'If two parties enter into an illegal contract, and money is paid upon it by one to the other, that may be recovered back before the execution of the contract, but not afterwards. In the case of persons entering into such a contract and paying money to a stakeholder, if the event happens and the money is paid over without dispute, that is considered as a complete execution of the contract, and the money cannot be reclaimed; but if the event has not happened, the money may be recovered. With respect to a stakeholder, there is a third case—viz., where the event has happened, but before the money has been paid over one party expresses his dissent from the payment. Under such circumstances he may recover it; and perhaps it may be said that, although the event has happened, yet the contract is not completely executed until the money has been paid over, and therefore the party may retract at any time before that has been done.'" Other authorities have been referred to, notably Tappenden v. Randall, 2 Bos. & P. 467. Put upon the naked ground of common law, the point is a good one. In terms the money was deposited to abide the happening of a particular event—namely, marriage. If the event took place the money was to remain with the defendant. If it did not take place, unless the plaintiff was prevented from claiming relief upon the ground of illegality, she can recover. The plaintiff has agreed to pay money upon the happening of a certain event, and she has a right to resile. She may say, in answer to the objection that something has been done under the illegal contract, that it was no part of this contract that the defendant should do what he did—viz., make the introductions—that he has taken steps outside the contract in order to bring about the fulfilment of the contract more easily, and that, that being so, as the event has not happened, she can recover. That seems to me to be a good ground of decision. But I do not wish to rest my judgment upon that ground alone. I desire to put it also upon the other and wider ground taken by the plaintiff —namely, the doctrine and practice of the old courts of equity as to marriage brokage contracts. The particular mischief aimed at was marriage brokage. That was not a common law doctrine. Up to about 150 years ago there was no objection at common law to a marriage brokage contract. But courts of equity took a different view of the matter, and courts of law have since modified their view of the matter and have shaped their course accordingly. Equity did not measure its procedure by the narrow common law rule; for instance, the rule as to the necessity for a total failure of consideration when the contract was tainted with illegality was not applied. As was pointed out by Lord Hardwicke, a court of equity had a right to intervene even after the contract had been performed either wholly or in part; that is to say, even after the marriage has been brought about. A court of equity would still give relief to the party to the illegal contract, and in one reported case, at least, the court ordered the money to be repaid after the marriage. In Arundel v. Trevillian, 1 Rep. Ch. 47, the court set aside a bond even after the marriage had taken place. In Drury v. Hooke, 1 Vern. 412, again, a bond was ordered to be given up after the marriage. In Smith v. Bruning, 2 Vern. 392, not only was the bond ordered to be given up, but the money which had been paid was ordered to be refunded. There are other instances which might be quoted. That a court of equity would interfere in this particular branch of the law is apparent from the observations of the judges. In Roberts v. Roberts, 3 P. Wms. 66, Sir Joseph Jekyll, M.R., said that this was perhaps the only instance in which a court of equity would intervene after the matter had been consummated, and the courts had always shown a desire of keeping open a locus pœnitentiæ in this class of case. The contract being within the mischief aimed at, where a party was desirous of resiling from the contract the court refused to interpose a barrier in the way of the fulfilment of that desire which could only have the effect of indirectly giving effect to the contract. In Tappenden v. Randall Heath, J., said: "It seems to me that the distinction adopted by Buller, J., between contracts executory and executed, if taken with those modifications which he would necessarily have applied to it, is a sound distinction. Undoubtedly there may be cases where the contract may be of a nature too grossly immoral for the court to enter into any discussion of it; as where one man has paid money by way of hire to another to murder a third person. But where nothing of that kind occurs, I think there ought to be a locus pœnitentiæ, and that a party should not be compelled against his will to adhere to the contract." In Reynell v. Sprye, 1 De G. M. & G. 660, Knight-Bruce, L.J., said: "Where the parties to a contract against public policy, or illegal, are not in pari delicto (and they are not always so), and where public policy is considered as advanced by allowing either, or at least the more excusable of the two, to sue for relief against the transaction, relief is given to him." I cite these cases to show that the jurisdiction of courts of equity was wider than the old jurisdiction of the common law courts, and that they were not bound by the hard-and-fast rule that the court would not intervene if anything had been done under the contract.

I come now to the more modern authorities, Taylor v. Bowers, which was relied upon by the plaintiff, and Kearley v. Thomson. As to Taylor v. Bowers, that was undoubtedly a decision of this court, and as such is binding upon us. The effect of that case was this: The plaintiff, being in embarrassed circumstances, was desirous of defrauding his creditors, and in order to bring that about he arranged with a man named Alcock that the latter should take his furniture under a fictitious sale, and Alcock agreed to assist in the scheme by taking and warehousing the furniture. Alcock then made a fraudulent sale of the furniture to the defendant, who was a party to the fraud. The plaintiff brought an action to set aside the sale and to recover the furniture, and the court treated the defendant as having no better title than Alcock, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. Mellish, L.J., there said: "If money is paid or goods delivered for an illegal purpose, the person who had so paid the money or delivered the goods may recover them back before the illegal purpose is carried out; but if he waits till the illegal purpose is carried out, or if he seeks to enforce the illegal transaction, in neither case can he maintain an action; the law will not allow that to be done." Clearly some consideration had been given by Alcock, as he undertook to and did warehouse the furniture apparently at his own expense, but that was not allowed to interfere with the decision of the court. The court, upon the evidence, came to the conclusion that there had been no actual defrauding of the creditors, and having regard to the main object of the scheme they came to the conclusion that no part of that object had been accomplished. How far is that modified by Kearley v. Thomson? That was also a decision of this court, but the circumstances were very different. The head-note states that the defendants were solicitors to the petitioning creditor in certain bankruptcy proceedings, and had incurred costs which were to be paid out of the estate. The plaintiff, a friend of the bankrupt, offered to pay to the defendants a sum of money for these costs which had not been paid owing to want of assets, on their undertaking not to appear at the public examination of the bankrupt, and not to oppose his order of discharge. The defendants, with the consent of their client agreed to this, and received the money. They did not appear at the public examination of the bankrupt, and before any application for his discharge had been made the plaintiff brought an action to recover back the money from the defendants. Held, that though the contract was illegal, the partial performance of it prevented the plaintiff from recovering back the money paid under it. Fry, L.J., took exception to the statement of Mellish, L.J., quoted above. He said: "It is remarkable that this proposition is, as I believe, to be found in no earlier case than Taylor v. Bowers, which occurred in 1876, and notwithstanding the very high authority of the learned judge who expressed the law in the terms which I have read, I cannot help saying for myself that I think the extent of the application of that principle, and even the principle itself, may at some time hereafter require consideration, if not in this court, yet in a higher tribunal; and I am glad to find that in expressing that view I have the entire concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice." But it is to be observed that in that case the illegal purpose itself, which was to defeat creditors by suppressing information, had been largely accomplished. The solicitors, who knew all about the matter, had abstained from appearing on the public examination. Therefore the case is not upon all fours with the present case.

In the present case no part of the illegal purpose has been performed. Therefore, even assuming that the dictum of Fry, L.J., controls us, it is not in point, when one remembers that the object was to bring about a marriage, which could not be performed in part, whereas in that case the purpose could.

notice that Sir Frederick Pollock in his work on Contracts (7th ed.), p. 383, qualifies Mellish, L.J.'s, proposition by substituting for the words "the illegal purpose," the words "any material part of the illegal purpose." Therefore, whether we regard this case from the point of view of the common law, or from the larger point of view of a court of equity, we can give relief against this contract, which ought never to have been made, notwithstanding that the defendant has taken trouble and incurred some expense in doing something towards its accomplishment. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of the Divisional Court was wrong, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are three questions which we have to consider. First, is the contract a marriage brokage contract? secondly, if it is, is it illegal? and thirdly, can a marriage brokage contract be rendered binding by part performance? With regard to the first question, in my opinion it is a question of fact. If there was reasonable evidence to justify the conclusion arrived at upon this point by the county court judge, we can not interfere. I think that there was reasonable evidence. The Divisional Court drew a distinction between a contract for reward to procure a marriage with one particular person and a contract to procure a marriage with some person generally, giving a choice to the person with whom the contract was made. In my opinion there is no such distinction. I am therefore obliged to differ from the decision arrived at upon this point by the Divisional Court, and in my opinion this is a marriage brokage contract. As to the second question, no doubt in many decisions marriage brokage contracts are referred to as illegal. But in what sense are they illegal? It is much too strong to apply the words turpis causa to a contract of this sort, or to speak of the plaintiff as allegans turpitudinem. The contract is not analogous to a contract in restraint of trade or a contract to stifle a prosecution. The real nature of the contract is, as it seems to me, that it is nudum pactum, and the law says that it imports no consideration and that no rights shall be permitted to arise under such a contract. The real position, where a contract is nudum pactum and executory, is that it may be rescinned. The position of the defendant is that of a stakeholder holding money which is to be paid over upon an engagement or marriage taking place. There was no consideration for such a contract, and the plaintiff had a locus pœnitentiæ. With reference to the third question, if part performance were to have the effect contended for, the rule of law would be rendered nugatory. It would be only necessary for the defendant to write some letters or do some other trifling act in order to render the rule of law useless. It is impossible to suppose that the law would allow itself to be frustrated in that way. In my opinion the appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only point decided by the Divisional Court was that this was not a marriage brokage contract because it was not a contract to procure a marriage with a specified individual. They were led to that conclusion by a reference to Drury v. Hooke, 1 Vern. 412, where the Lord Chancellor spoke of the bond as "a sort of kidnapping." That was no doubt so in that case. But Drury v. Hooke was decided in 1686, at a time when there was a difference of opinion as to whether marriage brokage contracts could only be set aside when there was some fraud or illegal coercion. That question was disposed of by the House of Lords in Hall v. Potter, Show. P. C. 76, decided in 1695, where a marriage brokage contract was set aside, though the marriage had taken place and though there was no fraud. We have also had the opportunity of seeing the bill in the case of King v. Burr, and it shows that the ground upon which the Divisional Court based their judgment is not maintainable. We therefore start with this—that this is a marriage brokage contract. A great deal of discussion took place towards the end of the seventeenth century about those contracts. They were not then void at common law. Courts of equity, however, gave relief; and as late as 1735, in Law v. Law, 3 P. Wms. 391, Talbot, L.C., said that marriage brokage bonds were good at law. That was a case where A. by his interest with the Commissioners of Excise got an office in that branch of the Revenue for B., who in consideration thereof gave a bond to A. to pay him £10 per annum as long as B. enjoyed the place. It was held that equity would give relief. The Lord Chancellor said: "But supposing it to be a good bond at law, so are all marriage brokage bonds; which yet are justly condemned in equity, as introductive of infinite mischief." The court in that case gave relief to the executrix of one of the parties, and it ordered the bond to be delivered up to be cancelled, though the party to the bond had obtained the office, and the consideration moving from the other party had been performed. The matter did not stop there, because in the earlier case of Smith v. Bruning, 2 Vern. 392, which ought properly to be Goldsmith v. Bruning, the court ordered a repayment of money which had been actually paid on account of, and in anticipation of, the marriage. I have had an opportunity of seeing the record in that case. It was a decision of the Master of the Rolls, and he ordered not only that the bond should be delivered up to be cancelled, but also that the 50 guineas actually paid should be repaid by the defendant.

Upon these grounds, all courts having now the jurisdiction of courts of equity, there is jurisdiction to order this sum of £52 to be repaid. It is unnecessary for me to go further into the matter. I entirely agree with the other grounds dealt with by the Master of the Rolls.

Appeal allowed.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — July 8, 1905.

BROWN v. HAIG AND OXLEY. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Further security for costs—Application after trial—Summons for directions—Application by way of notice—Proper method by fresh summons—Ord. 30, rr. 2, 5; ord. 65, r. 6.

After trial and judgment the proper method to proceed in an interlocutory matter is by a fresh summons, and not by notice under the summons for directions.

The plaintiff in an action brought for a declaration of partnership and for an account had been ordered to give security for costs. At the trial it was ordered that the accounts between the parties should be taken by the official referee. The defendants applied by notice under the summons for directions that the plaintiff should be ordered to give further security for the costs to be incurred in the inquiry before the official receiver.

Held, that the application must be refused, as the summons for directions, under which the notice was given, was put an end to by the trial and judgment.

This was an application by each of the two defendants in the above action for an order that the plaintiff might be ordered to give further security for their costs; and the question raised was as to whether such an order could be made upon a summons for directions under order 30, an order having been made when the action came on for trial for an account to be taken by an official referee.

The action was brought by A. K. Brown for a declaration of partnership and to have an account taken of all the dealings and transactions in connection with the partnership which he alleged existed between himself and the defendants in respect of certain concessions granted by the Egyptian and Soudan Governments for prospecting for minerals and precious stones, and which were referred to in a certain letter dated the 13th of September, 1901, signed and sealed by the defendant Haig, and which was in the following terms: "Gentlemen,—It is understood between us that the concessions I hold from the Egyptian and Soudan Governments for exclusive prospecting at this date are held by me for myself and yourselves and that all profits arising in connection with the sale or other dealing with the said two concessions shall be divided into three equal parts—one part for myself, one for A. K. Brown, and one for J. O. Oxley.—Yours faithfully, G. O. Haig."

The plaintiff was resident out of jurisdiction, and on the 11th of April, 1905, Kekewich, J., made an order directing the plaintiff to give security for costs to each of the two defendants.

The action came on for hearing on the 24th of May and the 8th of June. No witnesses were heard, but the plaintiff admitted that he was bound to contribute one equal third part of expenditure in connection with the concessions mentioned in the letter set out above, and Joyce, J., ordered that it be referred to the official referee to take an account of all the dealings and transactions in connection with the concessions before mentioned, and the official referee was to be at liberty to report to the court specially upon any point arising on the account. And it was also ordered that the further consideration of the action be adjourned, and any question as to costs be reserved with liberty to the parties to apply as they may be advised.

Both defendants then gave notice that they intended to apply for further directions in the action, under ord. 30, r. 5—viz., that the plaintiff be ordered to give further security for the costs of both defendants in respect of the proceedings before the official referee.

The summonses were adjourned into court on the question as to whether such an application could be made on a summons for directions after the trial had taken place and an order made for an account to be taken by the official referee.

Order 30 of the Rules of the Supreme Court provides as follows: Rule 1.—(a) Except in the cases mentioned in paragraph (d) the plaintiff in every action shall take out a summons for directions returnable in not less than four days; (b) such summons shall be taken out after appearance and before the plaintiff takes any fresh step in the action other than application for an injunction, or for a receiver, or the entering of judgment in default of defence under order 27.

Rule 2.—Upon the hearing of the summons the court or a judge shall, so far as practicable, make such order as may be just with respect to all the proceedings to be taken in the action, and as to the costs thereof, and more particularly with respect to he following mattters: Pleadings, particulars, admissions, discovery, interrogatories, inspection of documents, inspection of real or personal property, commissions, examination of witnesses, place and mode of trial. Such order shall be in the form No. 4*a*, Appendix K, with such variations as circumstances may require.

Rule 5.—Any application subsequent to the original summons and before judgment for any directions as to any interlocutory matter or thing by any party shall be made under the summons by two clear days' notice to the other party stating the grounds of the application.

Ord. 65, r. 6.—In any cause or matter in which security for costs is required the security shall be for such amount, and be given at such times and in such manner and form as the court or a judge shall direct.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the defendant Haigh.—The proper method to proceed was by notice under the summons for directions in accordance with ord. 30, r. 5. There is nothing in the rules to make a summons for directions inoperative as to proceedings after trial, although in most cases it would be exhausted by the trial. The words in ord. 30, r. 2, "in all proceedings to be taken in the action," are applicable to the present case and include those proceedings that take place after trial. As long as the action is alive there may be proceedings in it, and the validity of this mode of procedure under the summons for directions ought not to be cut down to the proceedings before trial. There was no final judgment given at the trial, but only directions for an inquiry to be held, and therefore the summons for directions is still alive.

G. C. Rankin, for the defendant Oxley, adopted this argument. Ord. 65, r. 6, was framed in the way it was because it was intended to apply to the King's Bench Division as well as to the Chancery Division. The substance and not the form of the proceeding must be looked at: Tomlinson v. Land and Finance Corporation, 14 Q. B. D. 539, 33 W. R. Dig. 59.

A. à B. Terrell, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

KEKEWICH, J.—These are two applications, one by each defendant, for further security for costs, which are the costs to be incurred in an inquiry before the official referee. The case came on for trial on the 8th of June, but no witnesses were heard, and by arrangement an order was made by which it was referred to one of the official referees to take the account of the following matters—viz., an account of all dealings and transactions in connection with the concessions mentioned in the letter of the 13th of September, 1901, and the official referee was to be at liberty to report to the court specially upon any point arising on the account, and the further consideration of the action was adjourned and the costs reserved. This order, to my mind, is technically a judgment, even if it is not a final judgment. It is very like an order to refer to chambers something which has to be dealt with there. In that sense it is not a final judgment, but it is the judgment in this sense, that what takes place afterwards in court is a further consideration of the action. The materiality of this is that this order has disposed of the case as far as the court could dispose of it at the trial, the further consideration being reserved. Even if not technically a judgment, it is the same as the trial, and would be treated by the Court of Appeal as the final judgment and go into the final list.

Now, after the trial, an application is made for security for costs. Before 1897—that is to say, before the summons for directions came into vogue—a litigant would have to issue a summons for this as for other things, and the question is, Do the rules as to the summons for directions alter the matter. Nothing much to help can be gathered from rule 1 of order 30, but in rule 2 there is a summary of what can be done. "Proceedings to be taken in the action" include proceedings before the official referee, and "the costs thereof" have been held to include security for costs. My own opinion is that on that rule the summons for directions comes to an end when you come to the trial. This view is strengthened by rule 5 of the same order as it now stands. That is the rule under which we dispose now of scores of applications weekly, but that rule provides that the applications made under it must be applications "subsequently to the original summons and before judgment." It is obvious that it may be necessary to make an application before the summons for directions has been issued—for instance, for the appointment of a receiver; in such a case the application must be made by a different summons. After the summons for directions has been issued, the application must be by notice under the original summons, and to issue a fresh summons when a notice would be sufficient would be to run the risk of being ordered to pay any additional costs incurred thereby. But the rule says further "and before judgment," which points to the conclusion that after judgment nothing can be done under that rule. The rule does not expressly say that notice must not be given after judgment, but it seems to me to be implied that notice is not then to be given.

It has been urged that the validity of this mode of procedure ought not to be cut down by restricting it to matters before the trial. I do not wish to cut down the validity of the summons, but I must deal with the practice under the rules as they stand. I have been supplied with a copy of the printed form of summons for directions which is now in universal use in all the chambers. It enumerates all the interlocutory proceedings specified in rule 2, and then the words "any other interlocutory matter or thing" have been added. Those words would no doubt include an application for security for costs, but it must be made in an interlocutory matter. It seems to me that, whether the defendants are entitled to an order for security for costs or not, they are not entitled to the order on these notices.

The court was then asked to decide as to whether an order for further security would be made, assuming that a fresh summons was taken out.

A. à B. Terrell, for the plaintiff.—Security for costs has never been ordered in the case of a plaintiff who has at the trial made good his right to what he claimed—viz., an account of the dealings and transactions between the parties.

KEKEWICH, J.—Upon this part of the case I may accede to the argument that the court ought not to cut down the utility of a useful provision. Rule 6 of order 65, which is the only rule dealing with the security for costs, speaks of "any cause or matter"; why should I say that "any cause or matter" does not mean any proceedings directed by the judgment to be taken before an official referee or before the judge in chambers. In my opinion the words are wide enough to include that, and one must remember that an application for security for costs does not preclude a second application if the costs mount up or if any further proceedings are directed. It is for the court to consider these matters from time to time. Why, if after judgment inquiries are directed, those proceedings should not be covered, I cannot see. It seems to me that, assuming that the plaintiff is resident out of the jurisdiction and that the security already ordered is insufficient to meet the costs of the proceedings before the official referee, a good case can always be made for an order for further security. If these applications are made by summons they will be in order and must be attended to.

LOWE v. DORLING & SON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lodger—Distress—Distraint of lodgers' goods—Action against bailiff—Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 79), s. 2.

Under section 2 of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871, an action lies against a bailiff for illegal distraint. Page v. Vallis, 19 Times L. R. 393, overruled.

Appeal from the Bow County Court.

The plaintiff was a lodger in the house of which his mother was the tenant. Her rent being in arrear, the defendants, on the 22nd of June, 1904, acting as bailiffs, distrained on behalf of the landlord, and seized, besides the tenant's goods, goods belonging to the plaintiff, who served the defendants with a notice under section 1 of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871. Notwithstanding this, the defendants on the 12th of August sold the plaintiff's goods. The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for illegal distress, and judgment was given in his favour.

By the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871, s. 2, "If any superior landlord, or any bailiff or other person employed by him, shall, after being served with the above-mentioned declaration and inventory, and after the lodger shall have paid or tendered to such superior landlord, bailiff, or other person the rent, if any, which by the last preceding section such lodger is authorized to pay, shall levy or proceed with a distress on the furniture, goods, or chattels of the lodger, such superior landlord, bailiff, or other person shall be guilty of an illegal distress, and the lodger may apply to a justice of the peace for an order for the restoration to him of such goods; and such application shall be heard before a stipendiary magistrate, or before two justices in places where there is no stipendiary magistrate, and such magistrate or justices shall inquire into the truth of such declaration and inventory, and shall make such order for the recovery of the goods or otherwise as to him or them may seem just, and the superior landlord shall also be liable to an action at law at the suit of the lodger, on which action the truth of the declaration and inventory may likewise be inquired into."

Ronald Walker (C. E. Jones with him), for the appellant.—No action lies against the bailiff. Page v. Vallis, 19 Times L. R. 393, is an authority in my favour. The only remedy is by action against the superior landlord. If the section was intended to give a right of action against the bailiff different language would have been used.

Schwabe, for the respondent.—Page v. Vallis was wrongly decided. The words "shall be guilty of an illegal distress" would be rendered nugatory if the only right of action was one against the superior landlord.

Walker replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This matter is no doubt capable of considerable discussion. My brother Darling took a different view to that which we entertain, but after having the matter argued more fully than is possible at Nisi Prius I have come to the conclusion that the county court judge was right in holding that in such a case an action will lie against the bailiff. The county court judge says in his judgment: "I hold that section 2 carries with it when duly proved a right to damages; an action can be brought against a bailiff for such damages unless the statute says it must not."

It is said that the effect of the section is to limit the right of action for an illegal distress to the remedy against the superior landlord. I cannot think that is so. I think we must look at the statute as a whole. The preamble says: "Whereas lodgers are subjected to great loss and injustice by the exercise of the powers possessed by the superior landlord to levy a distress on their furniture, goods, and chattels for arrears of rent due to such superior landlord by his immediate lessee or tenant." That shows the object of the legislation. The Act then, after safeguarding the interest of the superior landlord in section 1 by providing for the payment to him by the lodger of any rent due to his immediate landlord, and by providing for a correct inventory of the lodger's goods, goes on in section 2 to say: "If any superior landlord or any bailiff or other person employed by him shall, after being served with the before-mentioned declaration and inventory, and after the lodger shall have paid or tendered to such superior landlord, bailiff, or other person, the rent, if any, which by the last preceding section such lodger is authorized to pay, shall levy or proceed with a distress on the furniture, goods, or chattels of the lodger, such superior landlord, bailiff, or other person shall be deemed guilty of an illegal distress." I do not think that it can be seriously contended that if the section had stopped there, no action would lie against the bailiff who had levied the distress. I confess that at first I did not quite see why the superior landlord was included in that part of the section, considering the language of the latter part of the section, but, as it has been pointed out, it is possible for a landlord to distrain himself and not to employ a bailiff, and that seems to be the reason of the insertion of the name of the superior landlord in this part of the section. An illegal distress is an expression well known to the law, and primâ facie a bailiff is responsible if he enters a house and seizes another man's goods, and the landlord who employed him would only be responsible if he authorized the bailiff to do so. Section 2 proceeds: "and the lodger may apply to a justice of the peace for an order for the restoration to him of such goods." I do not think that these words were only intended as a preamble to enable the lodger to make an application to the magistrate for the restoration to him of his goods. He goes to the magistrate because he has served a declaration and inventory of his goods, and this part of the section is not, in my opinion, merely a description of the state of things in which he can apply to the magistrate for an order. The section goes on to say: "Such magistrate . . . shall inquire into the truth of such declaration and inventory . . . and shall make such order for the recovery of the goods or otherwise as to him . . . may seem just." In my opinion the words "or otherwise" cannot possibly be held to give the magistrate power to make anyone pay damages for the illegal distress. Then come the last words of the section: "and the superior landlord shall also be liable to an action at law at the suit of the lodger, in which action the truth of the declaration and inventory may likewise be inquired into." It is contended that these words are inserted to give a remedy merely against the landlord in which the landlord can question the truth of the lodger's declaration and inventory, and that they by implication negative any right of action against the bailiff or any other person except the landlord. But I think those words were inserted to make the superior landlord liable even when he had not authorized the bailiff to seize the goods of the lodger, and they cannot be used to cut down the remedy given by the earlier part of the section against the bailiff.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. During the course of the argument I have felt doubts as to the proper construction of the section, and those doubts have been enhanced by the view taken by my brother Darling. I think, however, that we ought to require clear and definite words to make us hold that a bailiff who by the language of the section is to be deemed guilty of an illegal distress should not be held liable for that tortious act to the person whom he has injured. I agree that the words at the end of the section are difficult to construe, but I think that the juster view of them is that which has been expressed by my lord—namely, that if the section had stopped earlier it might have been said that if the notice had been served only on the person actually making the distress the superior landlord would not become liable to an action, and that this was a statutory provision in favour of the lodger which did not make a superior landlord legally responsible if all that he had done was to authorize the bailiff or other person to make a distress which only became illegal after the service upon the bailiff of the declaration and inventory. I think that to prevent any argument of that sort these words were added, in order to make it clear that the superior landlord is liable whether he has expressly and after notice authorized the acts constituting the illegal distress or not.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree, and I only add a word because of the decision of my brother Darling from which we are dissenting.

In my opinion, section 2 of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871, deals with three sets of persons—the superior landlord, the bailiff, and the other person employed by him. Any one of those may make the distress, and if any one of the three does so after being served with the declaration and inventory he is to be deemed guilty of an illegal distress. So far the section only deals with the person actually making the distress. Any person who makes an illegal distress is liable to an action in respect of it by the general law, because he has committed a tortious act. The superior landlord, however, who had instructed a bailiff or other person to distrain would not be liable unless he had specially authorized the acts constituting the illegal distress. The words at the end of the section, therefore, are meant, in my opinion, to make him liable whether he has authorized those acts or not. It is said that they show that the only remedy is by action against the superior landlord, and that they take away any right of action against the bailiff. If so we can give no effect to the words in the earlier part of the section as to being deemed guilty of an illegal distress. It seems to me that the only way of giving effect to the whole of the section is to hold that the words do not cut down the remedy against the bailiff, but give a remedy against a landlord who has not authorized what by the earlier words of the section is to be deemed an illegal distress.

DAVIS v. PETRIE. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors—Bankruptcy proceedings instituted within the next three months—Effect of payment made to trustee of assignment deed—Protected transaction—Right of the trustee in the bankruptcy to enforce payment of the debt—Relation back of trustee's title—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 49 (2).

The defendant being indebted to a builder for work done, and the builder having made an assignment of his property in favour of all his creditors, the defendant paid the amount of her debt to the trustee of the assignment deed, having been notified by the trustee of the execution of the deed and required to pay the debt to him. Within three months of the execution of the assignment deed a bankruptcy petition was presented against the builder founded on the act of bankruptcy occasioned by the execution of the deed, and he was adjudicated a bankrupt. The assignment trustee having failed to pay over to the trustee in bankruptcy the money received from the defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy sued the defendant.

Held, that, as the defendant had notice of the act of bankruptcy when the debt was paid to the assignment trustee, the payment was not a protected transaction, and the trustee in the bankruptcy was entitled to recover the amount from the defendant for the benefit of the bankrupt's creditors.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Stonor, sitting at Brompton County Court.

The plaintiff was the trustee in bankruptcy of one William Watson, and he sued the defendant Mrs. Petrie for the sum of £21 in respect of work done for her by Watson. The defendant pleaded payment of the amount by cheque dated the 12th of June, 1903, to one Afford, the trustee under a deed dated the 5th of June, 1903, executed by Watson, whereby Watson assigned all his property to Afford for the benefit of all his creditors. Afford by letter dated the 6th of June, 1903, informed the defendant he had been appointed trustee of the deed of assignment, and required payment from the defendant of the debt due by her to Watson.

One of Watson's creditors filed a petition in bankruptcy against Watson on the ground that the execution of the deed of assignment of the 5th of June, 1903, was an act of bankruptcy, and Watson was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 9th of September, 1903.

The plaintiff Davis having been appointed trustee in the bankruptcy, applied to Afford for an account and claimed payment of any money in his hands. Afford failed to pay over the £21 he had received from the defendant, and the plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy accordingly sued the defendant, who pleaded that, having paid Afford the amount of her debt, her liability to the bankrupt in respect of it was discharged.

The county court judge held that the defendant was not liable to pay twice and entered judgment for her with costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

S. R. Earle, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge was wrong in holding that payment by the defendant with full knowledge to the assignment trustee was a protected transaction, where, within three months of the execution of the deed, a receiving order is made against the grantor. In such a case section 49 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act affords no protection, for the title of the trustee in the bankruptcy relates back by section 43 to the date of the act of bankruptcy, and the liability for the debt still exists unless it can be shown that there had been such an adoption or ratification by the trustee in the bankruptcy of the acts of the assignment trustee as to make the latter his agent: see per Lord Esher, M.R., in In re Pollitt, Ex parte Minor, 41 W. R. 89, 276, [1893] 1 Q. B. 455. The object of section 43 is to preserve the whole of the bankrupt's property for his creditors: see per Fry, L.J., in In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 128, (1888) 20 Q. B. D. 310, at p. 314. The trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to treat what was done by Afford as the acts of a trespasser, if he elected to do so and to call upon him for an account: Ex parte Vaughan, In re Reddeough, 33 W. R. 151, (1885) 14 Q. B. D. 24. That was all the trustee did; he received no money and did no other act that could be suggested as ratification.

Ex parte Snowball, In re Douglas, 20 W. R. 786, (1872) 7 Ch. App. 534, and Stein v. Pope, 50 W. R. 374, [1902] 1 K. B. 595, were also referred to.

Frank Mellor (Giveen with him), for the defendant.—The county court judge's decision is right, for it was never intended that the Act of 1883 should work such an injustice as to make a person who had paid under an assignment deed, which was perfectly good at the time of payment, pay a second time owing to the defalcations of the trustee. Until the deed of assignment was upset it was valid, and all that was done under it before it was avoided is protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The assignment trustee could have sued the defendant, and the defendant would have had no answer to the question. Moreover, here there has been ratification by both the official receiver and the trustee by asking for an account and payment of all moneys received under the deed from the assignment trustee and an actual payment on account by him.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The county court judge says in terms that the language of section 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is opposed to the view he has taken in this case, and it is plain that the literal construction of that section is in favour of the contention of the plaintiff. None of the authorities referred to in the judgment of the county court judge appear to me to support the view that a payment such as that in the present case, with notice, is protected. We were pressed by Mr. Mellor to say that if Afford, the assignment trustee, had brought an action against the defendant for the £21 she would have had no defence to it. Afford was only an assignee, under a title which ex hypothesi would come to an end if an act of bankruptcy took place, and the deed was in itself an act of bankruptcy. I fail, therefore, to see that there could be no answer to such an action. It was said also that payment to Afford was a protected transaction. As to that I would point out this—that the payment to a bankrupt is not protected if the person making the payment has notice of an act of bankruptcy; and I am of opinion that payment with notice to the assignee of the bankrupt stands in no better position.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is curious that there is no decision on the point raised in this case. What are the facts. Afford took a deed of assignment from Watson which, in itself, was an act of bankruptcy on which Watson could be, and was, adjudicated a bankrupt. Afford then wrote to the defendant saying that as she was indebted to Watson she would have to pay the debt to him—Afford—as he had been appointed trustee under the deed of assignment executed by Watson. It was suggested that although there was no antecedent contract between Afford and the defendant, yet that the defendant would have been in law bound, if sued by Afford under the deed, to pay the debt to him, and that although both knew that the execution of the deed was an act of bankruptcy on the part of Watson, the payment made by the defendant to Afford was not void by section 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. If such a payment is protected the protective section—section 49—as to payments made without notice would appear to be unnecessary. A distinction was sought to be drawn between a payment to the trustee under the deed of assignment and one made to the bankrupt himself. I am unable to see any distinction.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree and have nothing to add.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 518, [1904] 1 K. B. 762) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) affirming the judgment of Ridley, J., in favour of the Crown, upon an information by the Attorney-General claiming that succession duty at the rate of 6½ per cent. became payable by the appellants on the death of the sixth Duke of Northumberland, and that the same was payable on the value of the succession considered as an annuity on the life of the appellant Caroline Frances Murray.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 19th of April, 1817, the manor of Redesdale, in the county of Northumberland, was (together with other hereditaments) under and by exercise of a joint power of appointment which was vested in Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland, and Hugh, third Duke of Northumberland, appointed and limited to certain uses which have either failed or have otherwise determined, with remainder to the use of the sixth duke for life without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of trustees during his life to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of his first son in tail male, with divers remainders over.

By an indenture dated the 19th of December, 1868 (duly enrolled as a disentailing assurance), the sixth duke and the present duke (then Earl Percy) disentailed the estates and conveyed them to such uses as the sixth duke and the present duke should by deed jointly appoint, and in default thereof as therein mentioned.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 21st of December, 1868, the said manor was (together with other hereditaments) appointed to such uses as the sixth duke and the present duke should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the sixth duke for life, with remainder to the use of the present duke for life, with divers remainders over.

By an indenture dated the 1st of December, 1870, certain hereditaments being a portion of an allotment made to the lord of the manor of Redesdale upon the inclosure of a certain common parcel of such manor, were, under the joint power contained in the settlement of the 21st of December, 1868, appointed (but subject to the exceptions and reservations mentioned) by the sixth duke and the present duke to the use of Lord James Murray in fee simple. Lord James Murray died on the 3rd of June, 1874, and his wife, Lady Elizabeth Marjory Murray, became, under his will dated the 8th of May, 1868, beneficially entitled to such hereditaments for an estate in fee simple in possession. Lady Elizabeth Marjory Murray died on the 11th of October, 1888, and her daughter, the appellant, Caroline Frances Murray, became under her mother's will beneficially entitled (subject to a certain mortgage and further charge) to the hereditaments comprised in the indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, for an estate in fee simple in possession.

On the death of Lady Elizabeth Marjory Murray succession duty at the rate of 1½ per cent. became payable, and was paid on the value of the interest of the appellant Caroline Frances Murray (considered as an annuity for her life) in the hereditaments comprised in the indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, and deduction was taken in the succession duty account from the annual value of all the hereditaments so mortgaged for interest on the principal sums secured by the mortgage and further charge.

In the year 1902 Caroline Frances Murray sold the hereditaments comprised in the said indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, to Charles William Bell.

The Crown claimed succession duty upon the death of the sixth duke in respect of the hereditaments comprised in the said indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, as on the death of the said sixth duke, at the rate of 6½ per cent.—that is to say, 5 per cent. under section 10 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853 (the present duke being a descendant of a brother of the father of the third Duke of Northumberland), and 1½ per cent. under section 21, subsection 1, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I have read and have nothing to add to the judgment of my noble friend Lord Macnaghten in this case. Two observations I wish to make, because I have made them before and I have no desire to alter them. One is that a succession within the Act once established, no manipulation of the parties can get rid of it; and the observation is equally true whether there be one or two successions. The other is that since the decision of this House in Lord Wolverton's case, 47 W. R. 97, [1898] A. C. 535, the judgment of Sir George Jessel in In re Cooper and Allen, 25 W. R. 301, 4 Ch. D. 802, cannot be relied upon as an authority.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—Besides the question as to the effect of a disentailing assurance in the case of property chargeable with duty under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, this appeal involves the consideration of two reported decisions—Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, 21 W. R. 854, L. R. 8 Ex. 233, and In re Cooper and Allen.

The question as to the effect of a disentailing assurance is not, as it seems to me, reasonably arguable, and if it were it would be concluded, I think, adversely to the appellants by the decision of this House in the case of Lilford (Lord) v. Attorney-General, 15 W. R. 595, 2 L. R. H. L. 63.

In many ways the Succession Duty Act, 1853, is a remarkable piece of legislation. Drawn with consummate skill, it avoids all technical expressions, and yet there is not a single word misused or out of place, nor any expression which would be easy to improve. The Act was fortunate in its passage through Parliament. It was not mangled, or marred, or amended. The result is that it is consistent throughout, and as clear as the nature of the subject and the novelty of treatment which it required would permit. But to understand the Act thoroughly it is necessary to lay aside all preconceived notions and to follow patiently and persistently the clue which the Act itself provides.

The key to the Act is found in section 2, which defines the terms "successor" and "predecessor," and explains the relation between predecessor and successor.

The Attorney-General argued that the word "successor" was a word of flexible meaning, and occasionally used rather loosely in the Act. With the utmost deference I protest against that view. It has been the cause, and I think the sole cause, of all the difficulties that judges have discovered in the Act.

There are two things plain on the face of the Act. In the first place, it is clear that the terms "disposition" and "devolution" must have been intended to comprehend and exhaust every conceivable mode by which property can pass whether by act of parties or by act of the law. In the next place it is to be borne in mind that a "successor" must be beneficially entitled. When a person takes a succession he may not have actual possession. A husband, for instance, may have possession in right of his wife, a guardian on behalf of an infant. But a successor, to be a true successor within the meaning of the Act, must have the beneficial interest in the property subject to duty, whoever may have the actual possession or the right of management. These are obvious considerations. But they are frequently lost sight of, and then all sorts of difficulties arise. Let me put this case: A limitation after a death to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to C. in fee. In the lifetime of A. and B., C. sells his reversionary interest to X. Does X. become a successor? The Act says Yes. But the learned judges in Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Society answer No. In that case the court said, "The language of the second section does not deal with the position of an alienee of a succession. . . . The position of an alienee is a matter of legal consequence from the second section, and not touched by the words of it." I must confess I cannot follow that observation. It seems to me that the position of an alienee is within the very words of section 2. That section declares that "Every . . . disposition of property," by reason whereof any person becomes beneficially entitled to property upon death, either immediately or after an interval, shall be deemed to confer on the person so entitled a succession, and it adds, "the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled." Now, in the case I have supposed X. undoubtedly becomes entitled to property answering the description contained in section 2 under the circumstances there mentioned, if the sale to him be a "disposition of property" within the meaning of the Act. In many cases the purpose of the Act would be defeated unless you give to the term "disposition" the largest possible signification; not only so, but the Act shows on the face of it that the term "disposition" includes a sale. Section 7 speaks of "any disposition of property not being a bonâ fide sale"; and section 17 is more significant still. It is to be inferred from it that the framers of the Act thought the expression "disposition of property" wide enough even to include contracts for the payment of money on post obits and under policies of insurance. Now if an alienee be a true successor the difficulties with which the Court of Exchequer struggled in the case of the Law Reversionary Interest Society vanish altogether. The rate of duty and the time of payment are fixed by section 15. The value of the annuity on which the duty is to be computed is determined by section 21. There is no difficulty left, except the difficulty, such as it is, which has been suggested in the construction of section 44. And that vanishes, too, if the alienee be a true successor within the meaning of the Act. The difficulty suggested was that section 44 declares that "besides the successor" certain persons shall be accountable to the Crown for succession duty, and reckons among the persons accountable "every person" in whom any property or the management of any property subject to duty "shall be vested by alienation or other derivative title at the time of the succession becoming an interest in possession." It was said that an alienee cannot be a successor within the meaning of the Act, for here you have the alienee distinguished from the successor and placed in a different class. But there is no substance in that objection. Beneficial interest is the badge of a true successor and a necessary qualification in his case, while the management of the property or the right to receive the rents may be vested in some other person and so vested by alienation or other derivative title. It may be observed that unless an alienee coming into possession be a successor within the meaning of the Act, he would be in a different position from a successor not taking by alienation. He would not be under the liability of section 42, but only under the limited liability of section 44—that is, under the liability attaching to persons who have not the beneficial interest—a result which could hardly have been contemplated by the framers of the Act.

In the case of the Law Reversionary Interest Society the learned judges of the Court of Exchequer got over the difficulty which they had themselves created by considering the inconvenience that might arise if a successor, after having parted with his succession, were still to be treated as the successor for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the annuity on which duty is to be computed. And so they arrived at a right conclusian, but not, I think, by the most direct road.

I now come to the case of In re Cooper and Allen. The question there turned on section 15. That section is in my view the natural and necessary outcome of the position which the Act assigns to the alienee of a succession. He becomes a "successor" within the meaning of the Act, though the succession conferred on him is not a new succession. Who, then, is the "predecessor"? The predecessor must be the original successor who has parted with his succession, and so the duty on a succession by alienation could never be less than 10 per cent. when the alienee is not of kin to the person from whom title is derived. To prevent a result so unreasonable and inconvenient, a special provision is introduced which declares that in the case of a succession becoming vested by alienation or by any other title not conferring a new succession in any person other than the original successor, before he becomes entitled thereto in possession, neither the rate of duty nor the time of payment is to be altered. Section 15 says nothing about the value of the succession, simply because, according to the view which I have ventured to present to your lordships, the value of the succession is dealt with expressly by section 21. Then in section 15 occasion is taken to deal with the kindred subject of "acceleration" by the surrender or extinction of a prior interest. In the case of acceleration, but for the provision introduced at the end of the section, it might have been open to contention that duty would become payable at once on the surrender or extinction of the prior interest. The rate of duty, of course, would not be altered, nor the value of the succession. And so the section says quite properly that the duty is to be payable at the same time and in the same manner as if no such acceleration had taken place—and it says no more.

Some difficulty seems to have been created in some cases by the words "or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person" which follow the words "vested by alienation" in section 15. In the case of In re Cooper and Allen Sir George Jessel appears to have been pressed by the difficulty and perhaps misled by it. But a little consideration will show that a succession may be transferred without conferring a new succession, not merely by alienation pure and simple, but also by a title which is either not alienation at all, strictly speaking, or alienation combined with something else. Take the case of escheat as the law stood when the Succession Duty Act was passed, or the case of leaseholds (which are real estate under the Act) seized under a fi. fa., or the case of a husband alienating his wife's reversionary interest in a term of years. These and other cases would come under the words in question and under the words "or other derivative title" which are used as their equivalent, if held not to fall under the word "alienation." The judgment of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in In re Cooper and Allen was disapproved of in Wolverton v. Attorney-General. Your lordships have heard an ingenious argument intended to set it up again. Can it be supported? I think not. The language of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, is too plain. In section 15 it declares that "where . . . any succession shall before the successor shall have become entitled thereto or to the income thereof in possession have become vested by alienation . . . in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made. . . ." That is an enactment of general application. There is no exception to be found in the Act. But Sir George Jessel introduces an exception. He says, in effect, that the rule does not apply if there be a disposition or devolution conferring a new succession in respect of which duty is payable before duty becomes payable in respect of the succession transferred by alienation. In the present case it is not disputed that the succession of the seventh duke was transferred to Lord James Murray, and that if the sixth duke had died in the lifetime of Lord James duty would have been payable in respect of the seventh duke's succession, and again on Lord James's death, if on the death of Lord James the property had passed by disposition or devolution to Miss Murray. Why should payment of duty on the property left by Lord James discharge the duty with which the property was chargeable when he bought it? For such a vicarious exoneration there is no warrant in the Act. Nor is there in reason. When there is a sale of property chargeable with succession duty provision is ordinarily made to meet the claim for duty when it arises. The commissioners have power to commute the duty; the vendor may covenant to bear it, or it may be left to fall on the purchaser. In any case, the duty is, or ought to be, taken into consideration in arriving at the price, and the money which goes into the pocket of the vendor so much the less. Why should the vendor, or it may be the purchaser's estate, get a windfall, and why should the Crown lose because the vendor happens to outlive the purchaser?

I think the appeal fails on all grounds, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord DAVEY.—The Succession Duty Act, 1853, dealt for the first time with a difficult and complicated subject of legislation, but a careful consideration of the scheme and language of the Act will render the solution of the questions submitted to your lordships for decision on this appeal free from any extraordinary difficulty.

By the disentailing deed of the 19th of December, 1868, estates comprising the lands in question were conveyed by the sixth duke (tenant for life) and the present duke (then Earl Percy and tenant in tail in remainder) to such uses as they should jointly appoint, and in default to the subsisting uses. By a deed dated the 1st of December, 1870, the sixth duke and the present duke in exercise of the power appointed the lands in question to Lord James Murray in fee.

The joint power created by the first deed was but the appropriate machinery for enabling the parties to make a conveyance of their respective interests by a simultaneous act and so as to create one estate. Mr. Danckwerts, however, argued that the effect of the exercise of the joint power was to destroy the succession which previously existed in the present duke, and therefore no duty under this Act became payable on the death of the sixth duke. I am of opinion that the exercise of the power in favour of Lord James Murray had precisely the same legal effect as if the sixth duke had conveyed his life estate, and the present duke having disentailed had conveyed the fee simple directly to the appointee by the deed of the 19th of December, 1868, and he had been named as grantee in that deed, or as if the present duke had conveyed the fee simple in remainder and the sixth duke had surrendered his life estate so as to pass the fee simple in possession. While I agree that the subject is not to be taxed by implication or unless he comes within the letter of the taxing Act, I think that the forms of conveyancing make no difference where the legal effect and substance is the same.

The principal point on this appeal depends on the construction of section 15 of the Act. By section 1 the term "succession" denotes "any property chargeable with duty under this Act," which, I think, would be more accurately expressed as any estate or interest in property which is chargeable with duty, though this is probably covered by the definition of "property." By section 2 every disposition by reason whereof any person becomes beneficially entitled to any property upon the death of any person, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property upon the death of any person, confers on the person entitled "a succession," and the term "successor" denotes the person so entitled. The cardinal fact to be borne in mind in the construction and application of sections 14 and 15 is that in the case of real estate the successor, although entitled in fee simple, is charged only on an annuity commensurate with his personal enjoyment—that is, in most cases, for his life. Consequently, section 14, which prescribes the rule in case of a succession passing by reason of death, can have no application to real estate, and is in terms confined to personal property. Section 15 deals with a different class of cases, and applies both to real estate and personalty. Grammatically, the words "not conferring a new succession" apply only to the word "title," and should be so construed; but whether they are or not applied to the word "alienation," I think that word in itself primâ facie means and should be construed as meaning only transfers inter vivos (either gratuitous or for value). The word is not apt to describe the passing of property from the dead hand, either by will or by intestacy. I think that a new succession can only be conferred by a new disposition or devolution by law to take effect on death, and conversely every derivative title by reason of death confers a new succession under section 2 of the Act. The section therefore applies only to a title acquired by transfer or otherwise in the lifetime of the successor. It is not necessary to define how such other derivative title can be created. The words may only be intended to bring such title within the operation of the section, if any such title there be. Lord Herschell, however, has pointed out one instance of such title—namely, by bankruptcy—and there may conceivably be other circumstances and events in which the interest of the successor might become divested in favour of another. I am further of opinion that the transferee or person otherwise acquiring title thereby becomes the "person entitled" under the disposition or devolution conferring the succession within the meaning of section 2, and "the successor" for the purposes of the Act, unless the context shows that the word is used in a different sense. And as at present advised (though it is unnecessary to decide it in the present case) I think that if the transferee of a succession in real estate were to die before he became entitled in possession to the property comprised in the succession, his devisee or heir would be a person holding by a title conferring a new succession in the same position exactly as the devisee or heir of an original successor so dying. So far I agree with Sir George Jessel.

But the present case is not one of a transfer of the succession only. I have already expressed my opinion as to the effect of the appointment under the joint power to Lord James Murray. I am disposed to think he became thereby in the position of a successor whose title in possession has been accelerated by the surrender or extinction of the prior interest, and, apart from the provision at the end of section 15, would have been presently liable to pay the duty, but by that provision for the benefit of the successor the duty is made payable only at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no acceleration had taken place.

The words "in the same manner" are a little puzzling, but I think that they mean that the Crown is not to lose the duty by reason of the estate of the successor having become an estate in possession or the limitations of the existing settlement being exhausted, and the duty is to be paid on the happening of the same event as it would if there had been no surrender of the prior interest, although nothing passed and no title in possession was acquired on that event. In an any case the transferee became entitled to a fee simple in possession, which became the subject of other dispositions and devolutions conferring successions depending on other events on which duty was properly payable, but that was not a satisfaction of the duty payable in the event of the death of the sixth duke, which became a charge on the property; and all that can be said is that Lord James Murray purchased a property subject to an incumbrance. I am therefore of opinion that by the combined effect of the provisions in section 15 of the Act a duty became payable to the Crown on the death of the sixth duke at the same rate as it would have been payable if no transfer had been made.

It remains to inquire on whose life the duty is to be calculated under section 21. It is argued that the opinion which I have expressed, that the transferee becomes the successor for the purpose of the Act, is inconsistent with subsequent sections, and that the word denotes only the original successor or transferor. I do not think so, and I think that such a construction would introduce confusion into the scheme of the Act. In section 20 the words are: "The duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor or any person in his right or on his behalf shall become entitled in possession to his succession." Those words are not apt language in which to describe the transferee of the original successor. Bearing in mind that the Act applies to personalty as well as realty, and only to beneficial interests, I think the words relied on mean only any trustees, executors, husband entitled in right of his wife (as the law stood at the date of the Act) guardian of an infant successor, committee of a lunatic successor, and so forth, and in subsequent parts of the section the word "successor" must include a person having a derivative title to the succession. Passing by section 21 for the present, I think that in sections 23 to 26 the word must from the context mean the person entitled to the succession at the date when it becomes an interest in possession. In section 28 you again have the words "successor or any person on his behalf," and the succession is spoken of as his—that is, the successor's—succession, which it would not be if the "successor" meant only the "original successor." Section 42 is not inconsistent with the construction I have placed on the Act, but in section 44 it must be admitted that the word "successor" appears from the context to be used of the original successor.

Returning to section 22, I think the word "successor" is used in the sense which I have attributed to it. It is, however, sufficient for the present purpose to say that the word is capable of either sense; but the context of this section shows that the "successor" means the person entitled to the succession at the date when it becomes an interest in possession. The appellant, Miss Murray, is in the position of such a successor, and I am of opinion that the duty should be assessed on the value of an annuity according to the tables for the residue of her life. I agree with the judgment of Cleasby, B., in Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society.

I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord LINDLEY (whose judgment was read by Lord MACNAGHTEN).—The judgment of the Master of the Rolls and of Romer and Mathew, L.JJ., upon two out of the three questions raised by the appellants are so obviously correct that I feel unable usefully to add anything to them. Succession duty clearly became payable on two successions, and not upon one only; and the contention that the disentailing deed and conveyance to Lord James Murray extinguished or otherwise got rid of the duty payable on the death of the sixth Duke of Northumberland is, in my opinion, quite untenable.

The third question—namely, whether the duty now payable should be calculated on the life of the seventh duke or on that of Miss Murray—is much more difficult, and turns upon sections 2, 15, and 21 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. The Court of Appeal considered this question settled by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society. This case has been acted upon ever since, and the Court of Appeal did not think it ought to be now overruled, even if wrongly decided, which they did not think it was. I quite concur with the Court of Appeal in the view thus taken.

Until I had the advantage of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten, I felt more difficulty than I do now in dealing with some of the arguments addressed to your lordships by the counsel for the appellants. But that judgment has put the matter so clearly that I will not trouble your lordships with any additional observations on the construction of the Act. I am satisfied that his view of it is the true one, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

ROGERS v. MAYOR, &C., OF CARDIFF. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Engineering work—Repair of tramway—Area of the undertaking—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the applicant was employed by a municipal corporation, who were the owners of an electric tramway, in the work of repairing the overhead wires when necessary. Having done some repair at a point on the tramway, he was proceeding with a machine which he used in the work to another point on the tramway about three-quarters of a mile distant for the purpose of doing some repair there. When he was about 200 yards away from the first point, and while he was either on or in close proximity to the tramway, he was accidentally injured.

Held, that, inasmuch as there was evidence on which the county court judge could find that the obligation of the corporation to repair extended to the whole area of the tramway, he was justified in holding that at the time of the accident the applicant was employed on, in, or about engineering work—viz., the repair of the tramway.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Cardiff County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a workman who was injured by an accident whilst in the employment of the Corporation of Cardiff. The corporation were the owners of a system of electric tramways laid in the streets of Cardiff. The motive power by which the tramcars were driven was supplied by overhead wires carried on iron standards about thirty feet in height. The applicant was employed by the corporation in the work of repairing the overhead wires when necessary. For this purpose he was supplied with a movable scaffolding upon wheels, called a tower wagon, which was drawn by a horse from place to place as required.

On the 5th of September, 1903, the applicant was working with the tower wagon, and in pursuance of orders given to him drove to a place on the tramline where repairs to the overhead wires were required. Having done these repairs he proceeded to drive along the street in which the tramlines were laid to another place about three-quarters of a mile distant, where the wires also required repairing, for the purpose of doing the necessary repairs there. When he was about 200 yards from the place where he had effected the repairs, the horse became restive. The applicant got down from the tower wagon, and tried to take hold of the horse's head to prevent him running away, and while so doing his foot slipped, and he was thrown down and seriously injured. The place where the accident happened was either on or in close proximity to the tram lines.

The applicant claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, upon the ground that the accident happened while he was employed "on or in or about engineering work" within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act. Section 7, sub-section 2, defines engineering work as "any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer. . . ."

In Fletcher v. London United Tramways (Limited), 50 W. R. 597, [1902] 2 K. B. 269, it was decided that a tramway was a "railroad" within the above definition.

It was contended by the employers before the county court judge that the employment of the applicant at the time of the accident was not employment "on or in or about engineering work" within the meaning of the Act, because the applicant was then employed not on any work of repair of the tramway, but in merely driving the tower wagon to a place where repairs were required to be done.

The county court judge was of opinion that, as the tower wagon was part of the plant required for and used by the corporation in the repair of the tramways, the applicant was employed in the repair of the tramways, and that he did not cease to be so employed because at the time of the accident he was driving the tower wagon from the place where repairs had been done to another place where repairs were about to be done. He therefore held that at the time of the accident the applicant was employed on or in or about engineering work, viz., the repair of a railroad, and he made an award of compensation in the applicant's favour.

The employers appealed.

Bailhache, for the employers.—The applicant was not at the time of the accident employed on or in or about engineering work. It has been clearly settled that "engineering work" means a physical area, a locality: Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners, 47 W. R. 533, [1899] 2 Q. B. 132; Pattison v. White & Co., 20 Times L. R. 775; Back v. Dick, Kerr, & Co. (Limited), 53 W. R. 615, [1905] 2 K. B. 148. The words "on, in, or about" allow a certain zone around the actual place of work. The question in each case is whether the workman was within or without the zone. The nature of his occupation is not the test. The engineering work in this case was the repair of the electric wires of the tramway system at a particular point. The accident happened not at or about that particular point, but at a considerable distance from it, at a point which was clearly outside the zone. No doubt the applicant was entitled to the benefit of the Act while he was at the place where he effected the first repairs, and he would have been again entitled to the benefit of the Act if he had reached the place where the further repairs were to be done. But while he was going from the one place to the other, and was a great distance from either, he was not entitled to the benefit of the Act. In Middlemiss v. Middle District Committee of Berwick, 2 F. 392, and also in Atkinson v. Lumb, 51 W. R. 516, [1903] 1 K. B. 861, it might fairly be said that the physical area of the work extended to the place where the accident happened. But the mere fact that some work of repair is being done on part of a railroad does not bring the whole railroad within the area.

A. Parsons, for the applicant.—The authorities show that an engineering work, as well as a railway, factory, mine, or quarry, is a locality. But in the case of an engineering work it is not so easy to ascertain the actual locality and its physical boundaries as in the case of a railway, factory, mine, or quarry. Therefore the nature of the work must be taken into consideration. The work here was that of repairing defects in the overhead wires of a tramway. The workman was employed to do whatever repairs might be necessary throughout the whole length of the tramway. He was only told of defects at two points, which were at a considerable distance from one another. But if there had been defects at intermediate points it would have been his duty to repair them also. At the time of the accident he was performing part of his task, which was one continuous task to be done over continuous premises. This case is more similar to Atkinson v. Lumb than to Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners, and the cases which followed it.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case has been well argued, and no doubt the points raised by counsel for the corporation in support of the appeal must be faced. But I have come to the conclusion that the question in this case turns on the facts, and, the county court judge having found the facts, unless we can point to some misdirection which led to his finding as he did, we cannot interfere. The question in this case is as to engineering work, and it is only by pointing to engineering work undertaken by the corporation that the applicant can make out that the corporation are to be held liable for this accident. Therefore we have to ascertain whether he was employed in such engineering work. Engineering work does embrace a certain physical area, the expression pointing to there being local limits to the work; and the applicant must be shown to have been employed on, in, or about that area. The word "about" has been discussed in several cases, both with regard to engineering work and also with regard to railways and factories. It appears to be common to all these cases that the work on which the applicant was engaged must be concerned with the business of the undertaking; that is one element. But there is also the element of physical proximity; the work must have been done within the physical area of the undertaking or such latitude as has been allowed by previous decisions. That brings us to this—what were the physical limits of the work undertaken in this case? If the applicant at the time of the accident was within those limits, it cannot be said that he was not employed on or about the engineering work. The county court judge defined for himself the geographical limits, and found that the limits included the point where the accident happened. If it was not on the tramway itself, it was at any rate in close proximity to it. But it was argued that the engineering work was not co-extensive with the tramway, and that the only physical area of engineering work was the particular parts of the tramway where the work of repair had to be done. In my opinion, there was evidence which justified the county court judge in taking the view that the area of the engineering work was co-extensive with the tramway itself. He could not define the area without taking into consideration what the undertakers had undertaken to do. He found as a fact that the area as to which the obligations of the undertakers extended was the whole area of the tramway. This is what he says: "I think that, as the tower wagon was part of the plant required for and used by the respondents in the repair of their tramways, the applicant was employed in the repair of the tramways, and that he did not cease to be so employed because at the time of the accident he was driving the tower wagon from the place where repairs had been done to another place where repairs were about to be done." That seems to me to be a finding that the obligation of the undertakers extended to the whole area of the tramway, and that the applicant was employed by them to do such work as was necessary and obligatory on them as such undertakers. The whole work of repairing the wires of the tramway included the business of inspecting and ascertaining where the defects existed, and it was the duty of the applicant to ascertain defects and amend them. It seems to me that the county court judge, without any misdirection, arrived at the conclusion that the accident happened within the physical area of the engineering work. I therefore think that the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—In my opinion, the county court judge acted on a right principle of law, and came to a right conclusion on the facts. The Workmen's Compensation Acts ought not to be applied in a narrow or technical spirit. I think we should be so applying them if we gave effect to the contention put forward on behalf of the corporation. It is important to consider what was the work undertaken by the undertakers in this case. The work was to repair and keep in repair a tramway. That was the area of the undertaking, to keep in repair the tramway as a whole. The applicant was employed for the purpose of this undertaking, and in the course of his work he had to repair a particular part of the tramway line with a machine, and having done that repair, he had to proceed with the machine along the street to repair another part of the tramway line. While he was so proceeding he was accidentally injured. In the circumstances I think that the applicant was injured while he was employed on, in, or about engineering work within the meaning of the Act. In my opinion we ought not to sever the acts of repair and treat each act of repair as a separate engineering work. I therefore think the appeal should be dismissed.

MIDWOOD & CO. (LIMITED) v. MAYOR, &c., OF MANCHESTER. (a.)

Electric lighting—Nuisance—Leakage of electricity—Explosion—Damage to premises—Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 11) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. cxcvii.), s. 70.

By a provisional order confirmed by statute the defendants were constituted the undertakers for the supply of electrical energy for lighting purposes in the city of Manchester, and as such undertakers they were under a duty to lay down mains in the streets and to supply electrical energy to persons requiring it. Section 70 of the order provided that "nothing in this order shall exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them." A leakage occurred in one of the defendants' mains opposite the plaintiffs' premises, which caused an explosion and injured the premises.

Held, that this was a nuisance to the plaintiffs for which the defendants were liable.

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Lawrance, J., and a special jury.

The action was brought to recover £677 4s. 6d. for damage to the plaintiffs' stock-in-trade and other property at 81, Fountain-street, Manchester.

The defendants were, by sections 4 and 5 of a provisional order made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, and confirmed by the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 11) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. cxcvii.), made the undertakers for the supply of electricity for lighting purposes in the city of Manchester. By section 6 of the order the system and mode of supply were to be approved by the Board of Trade. Section 8 gave the defendants power to break up streets. By section 17 the defendants were bound to lay down and maintain suitable distributing mains in the streets; by section 21 they were under an obligation to give a supply of electrical energy within their district to persons requiring it; and by section 23 they were subject to a penalty of 40s. a day if they made default in so doing. Section 67 was as follows: "The undertakers shall be answerable for all accidents, damages, and injuries happening through the act or the default of the undertakers or of any person in their employment by reason of, or in consequence of, any of the undertakers' works, and shall save harmless all authorities, bodies, and persons by whom any street is repairable, and all other authorities, companies, and bodies collectively and individually, and their officers and servants, from all damages and costs in respect of such accidents, damages, and injuries." The word "works" was interpreted in the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, s. 32: "The expression 'works' means and includes electric lines; also any buildings, machinery, engines, works, matters, or things, of whatever description, required to supply electricity and to carry into effect the object of the undertakers under this Act." By section 70 of the provisional order it was provided as follows: "Nothing in this order shall exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them."

The defendants' mains were laid in a trough and covered with bitumen for the purpose of insulating them. The entire system in Manchester was linked together as one system, and in order to obtain a constant pressure in the mains over the whole area of supply—which was a requirement of the Board of Trade and was necessary for the proper supply of electricity to consumers—electricity was supplied to the mains by means of feeders at as many points in the system as possible. In consequence of a leakage of electricity in one of the mains in the street opposite to the plaintiffs' premises the main became fused, which caused the bitumen to be volatilized and inflammable gas was given off which caused an explosion and a fire in the plaintiffs' premises, doing the damage complained of.

The plaintiffs based their cause of action on the grounds (1) that the defendants' system of electric lighting constituted a nuisance as being a dangerous system; and (2) that the defendants were guilty of negligence in not discovering and dealing with the fault in the main sooner than they did. With regard to the question of nuisance, the plaintiffs alleged that owing to the linked system it was more difficult and would take longer to locate and to deal with a leakage of electricity than if the system were divided up into smaller circuits, and that therefore the system was a dangerous one and constituted a nuisance; and further, that the leakage of electricity and consequent explosion constituted a nuisance to the plaintiffs.

The defendants denied that their system was a nuisance; they said that their system was the best system, and was approved by the regulations of the Board of Trade, and that it was as easy in the linked system to locate and deal with a leakage as in any other system. They also denied that they had been guilty of negligence.

The learned judge left the following questions to the jury: (1) Did the system adopted by the defendants constitute a nuisance by causing danger to persons having premises adjacent to the mains? Answer, Yes. (2) Were the defendants guilty of negligence in their adoption of the method of localizing and dealing with faults? Answer, Yes. (3) When the defendants became aware of the fault, did they deal with it for the purpose of preventing fire in a reasonable and proper manner? Answer, No. Upon those findings the learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs for the agreed amount of damages.

The defendants now applied for judgment on the ground that there was no evidence to support the findings of the jury; or in the alternative for a new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence and that there was misdirection.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action against the Manchester Corporation, who are the undertakers for the supply of electricity in the city of Manchester, to recover damages sustained by the plaintiffs, who are householders in the city, by reason of an explosion caused by the escape of electricity from one of the mains adjoining the plaintiffs' premises. The escape of the electricity fused the bitumen in which the electric mains were laid, and the bitumen becoming volatilized gave off considerable quantities of gas which exploded and damaged the plaintiffs' premises. The first question is whether the defendants have a statutory protection from liability for the damage thus caused, their mains having been laid in accordance with the requirements of the Board of Trade. The plaintiffs rely upon section 70 of the provisional order, which was confirmed by the Act of 1890, and from which the defendants derive their powers to lay the mains and to supply electricity in the city. That section provides that "nothing in this order shall exonerate the undertaker from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them." That raises the principal point—namely, whether what happened here was a nuisance to the plaintiffs for which the defendants are liable. There is a further question of negligence. The jury have found a verdict against the defendants on both points.

First, with regard to the question of nuisance. It is, no doubt, technically disputed that what occurred here was in fact a nuisance to the plaintiffs, but it is obvious that where the owner of premises finds his premises blown up by an explosion that amounts to a nuisance to him. Whether the defendants are liable for that nuisance is another matter. It is clear beyond all controversy that it was a nuisance to the plaintiffs, and that nuisance was brought about by the carrying on of the electric lighting of the city. If the defendants are protected, the protection must be found in the statute authorizing them to carry on the undertaking. It is ingeniously argued that, notwithstanding the clear language of section 70, that section must be read subject to the right of the defendants to lay the mains in the streets, and to keep the pressure of electricity in the mains up to a certain standard; that they have done this, and nothing more; and that section 70 must not be read so as to make them liable where they have simply laid the mains and sent electricity along them without any negligence on their part. The answer to that contention seems to me to be that, upon reading all the sections together, there is only a qualified permission to the defendants to lay the mains and to send electricity along them. The defendants are entitled to lay the mains, and are under an obligation to keep up a certain pressure of electricity, but, underlying the whole matter comes section 70, which is enacted for the protection of the public. The privilege of laying down mains and supplying electricity is conferred upon the defendants, and for the reasonable protection of the public the section imposes upon them the obligation of bearing the consequences if in the exercise of that privilege they cause a nuisance. They are not given carte blanche to create a nuisance. If they cause a mischief to third persons by a nuisance in the course of carrying on their undertaking, they are made liable by the section. The authorities lay that down clearly. I will only refer to one case. In Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. the particular nuisance complained of was not the same as that in the present case. In that case the nuisance was caused by vibration and noise from the working of the electric lighting engines. Precisely the same answer was set up in that case to the claim in respect of the mischief caused by the nuisance as is set up here. Lord Halsbury said: "The nuisance being established, it is said, first, that the defendant company are authorized by law to carry on their business, and that, as they have done all that skill and care can effect to prevent any nuisance, they are in the same position as a railway company, and are entitled to do what they have done under the authority of the Legislature. If the analogy were a correct one I should think the defendants had fallen very far short in their proof that they had done all that was possible to prevent a nuisance. A railway company has a definite line of operation within which it may make its works, and, if it does all that can be done to prevent a nuisance in that place, the things having to be done in that place and by locomotive engines with the necessity of fire being carried along the railway, the Legislature is taken to have sanctioned that proceeding. No such considerations apply here, quite apart from the differences in the legislative enactments, with which I will deal presently. . . . The main question turns on the construction of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, and the provisional order, which has become an Act of Parliament. It was boldly contended by Mr. Moulton that the provisional order protected the undertaking, and that, if a nuisance were necessarily created by the carrying on of the company's undertaking, such nuisance was authorized and even imposed as a duty on the undertakers." Lord Halsbury then referred to section 10 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, and to a clause in the provisional order in that case which was identical in its terms with section 70 of the provisional order in the present case, and proceeded: "The general Act only gave them power subject, therefore, to the restrictions of the particular order, and the particular order makes them liable for nuisance." The present case comes within the principle laid down in that case. The defendant corporation, having introduced that which the jury have found to be a nuisance, are liable. That is sufficient to dispose of the case.

At the same time it would be wrong not to give expression to the opinion which I have formed upon the other question which has been argued. In my opinion the learned judge would not have been justified in withdrawing the question of negligence from the jury. [His lordship then dealt with the evidence upon the question of negligence, and proceeded:] I am only dealing with the alleged negligence of the defendants in dealing with this particular explosion, and not with any alleged negligence or nuisance in respect of the system of supplying electricity. The question is, Was there evidence of negligence causing this particular damage? In other words, Was the particular mischief brought about by the negligence of the defendants? That is the question; and that is what was intended to be left to the jury and what the jury found, and not whether the system itself was a negligent system or a nuisance. For these reasons the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There was clearly a nuisance caused by the defendants. The electricity stored in the mains leaked considerably, and caused an accumulation of gas and a consequent explosion, which damaged the plaintiffs' premises. It was a clear case under section 70 of the provisional order for throwing liability on the defendants in respect of that nuisance. I can find nothing in the provisional order to protect the defendants from liability in these circumstances. I agree that the provisional order expressly authorized certain special works, and I also agree that those works could not be treated as a nuisance within section 70. For instance, there is power to break up streets for the purpose of laying the mains, and there is power to lay down mains and to store electricity in the mains. But I can find no express authority conferred by the provisional order upon the defendants authorizing them to allow a leakage of electricity from their mains so as to cause an explosion and to injure the plaintiffs' premises, as they have done. That is sufficient to decide the case. There is nothing in the authorities to afford any reason why the defendants' liability should not be given effect to. That being so, it is not necessary to consider the findings of the jury. I am not, however, satisfied that the first finding can be supported, if it means that the system itself is a nuisance. I think it right to say that, on account of the great liability that would be thrown upon the defendants if it were thought that this court approved of that finding in that sense.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants are authorized to carry on a dangerous business to which mischief is incidental. It seems to me to be reasonable to say that the defendants, who have power to carry on that dangerous business, should pay for any loss from a nuisance caused by their carrying it on. The escape of electricity may cause a nuisance, and it is reasonable to make the defendants liable to pay for any loss consequent therein. I also agree upon the question of negligence.

Appeal dismissed.

In re BOSWORTH AND THE MAYOR, &c., OF GRAVESEND. (a.)

Burial-ground—New burial-ground—Addition to existing burial-ground—Disused burial-ground—"Set apart for the purposes of interment"—Ground set apart without statutory authority—Burial Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134), s. 1—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34), s. 1—Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 72), s. 3—Open Spaces Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 32), s. 4.

For the purposes of the provisions of the Burial Act, 1853, which prohibit the opening of any new burial-ground within the limits there specified without the approval of a Secretary of State, an addition to an existing burial-ground stands on the same footing as the opening of an entirely new burial-ground.

A piece of land which has once been set apart for the purposes of interment, and in which interments have taken place, but which is no longer used for interments, is, by virtue of section 4 of the Open Spaces Act, 1887, a disused burial-ground within the meaning of the Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884, and therefore incapable of being used for building purposes, although by reason of a failure to obtain the approval of a Secretary of State the original setting apart was not lawful.

Appeal from the judgments of Wright, J., and Bray, J., upon a special case stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the court.

By an agreement in writing dated the 2nd of October, 1901, between Emily Lucy Bosworth and Helen Pauline Bosworth, the vendors, of the one part, and the Corporation of Gravesend, the purchasers, of the other part, it was agreed that the vendors should sell and the purchasers should purchase a cemetery called the Gravesend and Milton Cemetery, in the parish of Gravesend, at a price to be settled by arbitration, and to be fixed on the basis of the fair value of the property as between willing seller and willing buyer.

The arbitrator to whom the question of the price was referred made his award in the form of a special case, in which he found that the following facts had been proved:

Part of the Gravesend and Milton Cemetery was the original cemetery belonging to the Gravesend and Milton Cemetery Co., which was incorporated by a special Act of Parliament in 1838.

On the 11th of August, 1854, an Order in Council was passed under the provisions of the Burial Act, 1853, whereby it was ordered that no new burial-ground should be opened in (amongst other places) Gravesend without the previous approval of one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

In 1859 one John Robert Hull, one of the predecessors in title of the vendors, who was then the owner of the cemetery, acquired an additional piece of land adjoining thereto.

On the 22nd of November, 1884, a letter was written by the registrar of the diocese of Rochester to the Home Secretary stating that the Bishop of Rochester had been requested to consecrate an addition to the proprietary cemetery at Gravesend, and asking whether, having regard to the Order in Council of the 11th of August, 1854, the approval of the Home Secretary was necessary to such addition being used for burials.

The reply from the Home Office, dated the 11th of December, 1884, was that the sanction of the Secretary of State to the proposed addition to the cemetery was not required.

The additional piece of land was not used as a cemetery before the 11th of December, 1884, but subsequently thereto the whole of it was set apart and consecrated as a burial-ground enclosed by a wall, and part of it had been used as a burial-ground. A portion of the part which had not been so used could conveniently be separated from the part which had been so used by a fence so as to be available for building.

It was contended before the arbitrator on the part of the purchasers—

(1) That the additional piece of land had been enclosed within the cemetery walls in violation of the aforesaid Order in Council and the provisions of the Burial Act, 1853.

(2) That having regard to the matters in the last paragraph contended, and to the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ward v. Portsmouth Corporation, 46 W. R. 610, [1898] 2 Ch. 191, in so far as it decided that an addition to an existing burial-ground is within the provisions of section 6 of the Burial

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act, the additional piece of land could not legally be buried in.

(3) That the additional piece of land, having been enclosed as aforesaid and having been used as a burial-ground, could not now by reason of the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Ponsford and Newport District School Board, 42 W. R. 358, [1894] 1 Ch. 454, be used for building land.

(4) That the additional piece of land ought not to be valued either as ground in which interments could be made or as building land, but ought to be valued on the basis that it could not be put to either of such uses.

It was contended on the part of the vendors—

(1) That by reason of section 5 of the Burial Act, 1853, the said Act did not apply to the Gravesend and Milton Cemetery or to additions thereto.

(2) That the case of Ward v. Portsmouth Corporation did not affect the law as it was in 1884, and that in 1884 an addition to an existing burial-ground was not under the Act a new burial-ground.

(3) That if the Burial Act, 1853, and the Order in Council of the 11th of August, 1854, applied, the letter of the 11th of December, 1884, constituted such approval as was required under the Act and Order in Council.

(4) That if the additional piece of land could not be legally used as a cemetery, that portion of it which had not been already used for graves could be thrown into the adjoining fields and utilized and valued as building land.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the additional piece of land could be used as a burial-ground; (2) whether, if not, that part of it which could conveniently be separated from the part actually used for interment could be used for building purposes.

If, in the opinion of the court, the answer to the first question should be in the affirmative, then the arbitrator awarded and adjudged that the total price to be paid by the purchasers to the vendors was £9,711. If, in the opinion of the court, the answer to the first question should be in the negative, but to the second in the affirmative, then he awarded and adjudged that the price was £9,015. If, in the opinion of the court, the answer to both questions should be in the negative, then he awarded and adjudged that the price was £8,305.

The argument on the special case was heard before Wright, J., who answered the first question in the negative, on the grounds that the Order in Council of the 11th of August, 1854, applied to the additional piece of ground, notwithstanding section 5 of the Burial Act, 1853, which provided that that Act should not operate to prevent burials "in any cemetery established under the authority of any Act of Parliament," and that the reply of the Home Office to the Bishop of Rochester of the 11th of December, 1884, did not amount to an approval by the Secretary of State.

With regard to the second question, Wright, J., remitted the case to the arbitrator, in order that he might define more clearly upon a plan the portion of the additional piece of land to which that question related.

The case subsequently came on for hearing before Bray, J., who answered the second question in the negative, on the ground that the prohibition contained in section 3 of the Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884, against the erection of buildings upon any disused burial-ground applied to any land which had been "at any time set apart for the purposes of interment" within section 1 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, even though it had been so set apart in violation of an Order in Council or of the provisions of the Burial Act, 1853. The result of this decision was that the price awarded was the sum of £8,305

The vendors appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the appellants.

Freeman, K.C., and Colefax, for the respondents.

COLLINS, M.R.—Wright, J., has held that the additional piece of land cannot be used as a burial-ground; and Bray, J., has held that it cannot be used for building purposes. If these decisions are correct, the result is that the third alternative sum mentioned in the special case is the price awarded.

First, as to whether the additional piece of land can be used as a burial-ground. It is said on the part of the vendors that this is not a case of opening a new burial-ground, but of adding to one already existing. But it is obvious that the reasons which must have influenced the Legislature in prohibiting the opening of a new burial-ground without the approval of the Secretary of State apply just as much to the addition of a piece of land to an existing burial-ground as to the opening of an entirely new burial-ground. There is no difference between the two cases from the point of view from which the Legislature passed the enactment—viz., the evil of the appropriation of fresh ground to the purpose of burial in populous places. I think that Wright, J., was correct in holding, as he did, that for this purpose an addition to a cemetery was the same thing as a new cemetery; and I also think that the point was decided in Ward v. Portsmouth Corporation. It is said that the opinion expressed in that case on this point was obiter; but the reasons given for the decision in that case support the view that I should be prepared to take apart from authority—viz., that for the purpose of the Burial Act, 1853, an addition to an existing burial-ground is on the same footing as the opening of an entirely new burial-ground.

Secondly, as to whether any part of the additional piece of land can be used for building purposes. That question depends on the legislation on the subject, which is as follows: By the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, s. 1, "the term 'burial-ground' shall include any ground, whether consecrated or not, which has been at any time set apart for the purposes of interment, and in which interments have taken place since the year 1880." By the Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884, s. 3: "After the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial-ground, except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship." By section 2: "In this Act a 'disused burial-ground' shall mean a burial-ground in respect of which an Order in Council has been made for the discontinuance of burials therein in pursuance of the provisions of the said recited Acts." By the Open Spaces Act, 1887, s. 2, sub-section 1: "The Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, is hereby repealed to the extent mentioned in the schedule to this Act." The schedule mentions as follows: "In section one . . . the following words occurring in the definition of a 'burial-ground,' viz., 'and in which interments have taken place since the year 1880.'" By section 4, "In the Disused Burial-grounds Act, 1884, and this Act, the expression 'burial-ground' shall have the same meaning as in the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, as amended by this Act, and the expression 'disused burial-ground' shall mean any burial-ground which is no longer used for interments, whether or not such ground shall have been partially or wholly closed for burials under the provisions of any statute or Order in Council." It seems to me that the definition of "disused burial-ground" in the last section covers this case. This piece of land was set apart for the purposes of interments, interments took place there, and it is no longer used for interments. It is argued that the words "set apart" mean lawfully set apart, and that this land was not lawfully set apart, because the approval of the Secretary of State was not obtained. I see no ground for reading the word "lawfully" into the definition, and I think that this piece of land comes within the definition of "disused burial-ground" and cannot be used for building purposes. I am therefore of opinion that Bray, J., answered the second question rightly, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LLOYD'S BANK (LIMITED) v. MEDWAY UPPER NAVIGATION CO. (a.)

Practice—Equitable execution—Summons for appointment of receiver — Form of summons — Injunction restraining judgment debtor from dealing with property —R. S. C., 1883, Appendix K, Form 61 (a).

Where a judgment creditor applies for leave to issue a summons for the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits of the judgment debtor's property by way of equitable execution, the summons ought not, as a matter of course, to contain an injunction, as in Form 61 (a) of Appendix K to the Rules of the Supreme Court, restraining the judgment debtor from dealing with the property. Such an injunction ought only to be granted where there is evidence of danger that the property may be made away with before the hearing of the summons.

Appeal from an order of Jelf, J., at chambers refusing to dissolve an injunction granted on the application of the plaintiffs for a summons for the appointment of a receiver.

The plaintiffs obtained judgment for the sum of £2,585 13s. 7d. against the defendants, who were a company incorporated under a special Act of Parliament for the improvement and maintenance of the navigation of the Upper Medway.

The judgment being unsatisfied, the plaintiffs applied ex parte to the judge at chambers for leave to issue a summons for the appointment of a receiver of property of the defendants by way of equitable execution.

The affidavit filed by the plaintiffs in support of the application stated that, with the exception of office furniture and other goods of the value of about £50, the defendants had no goods or chattels on which the plaintiffs could levy legal execution, but that the defendants were entitled to the tolls and rents arising from the navigation of the upper portion of the River Medway and to the profits of the business of carriers carried on by them, and were also possessed of freehold land and premises and the rents arising therefrom.

The affidavit did not contain any allegation that there was any danger that any of the property of the defendants would be made away with or removed from the jurisdiction of the court before the hearing of the summons.

On the hearing of the ex parte application the following order was made for a summons for a receiver with an interim injunction, in accordance with Form No. 61 (a) in Appendix K to the Rules of the Supreme Court: "Let the defendants attend the judge in chambers . . . on the hearing of an application on the part of the plaintiffs for the appointment of S. W. Burgess, the manager of the plaintiffs' branch bank at Tonbridge, as receiver in this action without security or remuneration, plaintiffs being answerable for his acts or defaults, to receive the rents, profits, and moneys receivable in respect of the defendants' interest in the following property—namely, the tolls and rents arising from the navigation of the River Medway, and also in the profits of the business of carriers carried on by the defendants, and in other rents and profits of and incident to the defendants' undertaking; also certain freehold lands and premises, and rents and increment arising therefrom, which said lands are situate at Tonbridge and other places on the River Medway and elsewhere, in satisfaction of the sum of £2,585 13s. 7d. and costs, due under the judgment in this action; and, the plaintiffs by their solicitors hereby undertaking to abide by any order the court or a judge may make as to damages in case the court or a judge should hereafter be of opinion that the defendants shall have sustained any by reason of this order which the plaintiffs ought to pay, it is ordered and directed that the said defendants, their agents and servants, and every of them be restrained, and an injunction is hereby granted restraining them and every of them, until after the hearing of the above application, from selling, charging, or otherwise dealing with the said property."

The defendant applied to Jelf, J., to dissolve the injunction. The learned judge refused the application.

The defendants appealed.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendants.—There is no power to grant equitable execution by the appointment of a receiver and an injunction under the Judicature Act, except in cases in which it was the practice of the Court of Chancery to grant such equitable execution before the Act: Holmes v. Millage, 41 W. R. 354, [1893] 1 Q. B. 551. The Court of Chancery did not grant injunctions on applications for the appointment of a receiver unless there was evidence of danger that the property might be done away with or removed from the jurisdiction of the court.

Holman Gregory, for the plaintiffs.—Evidence that the property is in danger of being removed is not necessary: see the statement of the usual practice given in the Annual Practice of 1905, at p. 712. The learned judge had a discretion to make an order in the form of No. 61 (a) of Appendix K, and he exercised it.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The practice of granting equitable execution was not known in the courts of common law till the passing of the Judicature Act. It may be that judges then took too wide a view of the jurisdiction conferred on them by that Act, and sometimes appointed receivers where the court of Chancery would not have done so. They were in the habit of appointing receivers on ex parte applications, but, as this was found to be attended with difficulties and drawbacks, the practice was changed, and under the present practice notice of the intention to apply for a receiver is required, and an order to show cause is obtained in the first instance. This gives an interval during which there may be some danger of the property in respect of which the receiver is to be appointed being made away with or removed from the jurisdiction of the court. Accordingly a form of summons has been adopted containing an injunction which may be treated as ancillary to the summons itself. In so far as that involves the idea that such an injunction is a necessary ancillary to the summons, it appears to be a departure from the practice of the court of Chancery. By that practice it was requisite before an injunction could be granted, to aver and give evidence of some danger that the property might be removed from the jurisdiction of the court. This form No. 61 (a) of Appendix K, if it is to be treated as a common form, seems to be contrary to that practice. Here there is no allegation of any believed intention on the part of the defendants to remove the property, which is the subject-matter of the application, out of the jurisdiction of the court. In the absence of any statement to that effect on affidavit I see no ground for an injunction in this case. I therefore think the learned judge was wrong in refusing to dissolve the injunction. He seems to have followed the form in the appendix without sufficiently considering the facts of the particular case. The appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Form 61 (a) is applicable where there is danger of the property being made away with. But in the absence of any evidence of such danger I think that an injunction ought not to be granted.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I should be sorry to say that Form 61 (a) is not a good form in a proper case. But I do not think that in every case of an application by a judgment creditor for the appointment of a receiver such an injunction as is contained in that form should be granted as a matter of course without evidence that the property is in danger of being made away with.

Appeal allowed.

Power—Appointment—Execution—"To E. R. A. and his issue"—Construction.

A power was given enabling the donee in the events which happened to appoint certain real estate to his, the donee's, sons for an estate not exceeding a life estate with remainder to their issue in tail. The donee by a codicil to his will, referring to the power, appointed one part of the estates "to E. R. A. and his issue." E. R. A. was one of the donee's sons.

Held, a valid appointment to E. R. A. for life with remainder to his issue as joint tenants in tail.

Summons.

By his will dated the 29th of April, 1853, E. R. Adams (the grandfather) devised all his freehold estates to his son, E. R. Adams (the son), during his life, and after his decease to the children of E. R. Adams (the son) and their issue (not including the issue of any child which should come into esse after the testator's decease) in such manner, subject to the proviso thereafter mentioned, as E. R. Adams (the son) should by will or codicil appoint. The will contained a proviso that with regard to any child of the testator's son who might be living at the testator's decease, his son should not under the power appoint to any such child any estate larger than an estate for life, but the estate appointed to any such child for life might be appointed in remainder subject to the life or less estate of any such last-mentioned child to or among all or any of the children of such child in tail.

E. R. Adams (the grandfather) died the 22nd of July, 1856, and at that date E. R. Adams (the son) had three sons alive—namely, E. R. Adams (the grandson), J. W. R. Adams, and C. R. Adams.

By a codicil to his will E. R. Adams (the son), after reciting that "by the last will of his father he was empowered to appoint amongst his children and their issue all his real estates," appointed "to his eldest son, E. R. Adams, and his issue" an estate called the Elmer Estate; "to his son J. W. R. Adams and his issue" an estate called the Penge Estate; and "to his son C. R. Adams and his issue" an estate called the Butcher Hill Estate, being the real estates devised by his father's will.

The question which arose upon this summons was whether the codicil was an effectual exercise of the power of appointment, and, if so, what interests the parties took under it.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Warlters Horne cited Sugden on Powers (8th ed.), 521, and Pawcy v. Bowen, 1 Ch. Cas. 23.

Dighton Pollock cited Theobald on Wills (6th ed.), 421.

Astbury, K.C., and E. Ford cited Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), 298, and Rucker v. Scholefield, 1 Hem. & Miller 36.

BUCKLEY, J.—Under the will of Edward (the grandfather), Edward (the son) had a certain power power of appointment amongst his children and their issue, but the class of issue that could take under the power was limited, and properly limited, by the will of Edward (the grandfather) so as not to countervail the rule as to perpetuities. Therefore he could only appoint in favour of issue to a limited extent. Further, as regards the issue themselves, the estate which under the power could be given to the issue varied according to whether the particular issue in question was born before or after the death of Edward (the grandfather). If the issue was born before his death, that child could only take a life estate under the power. Thus it was a complicated power extending to children of Edward (the son), to grandchildren of Edward (the son), and any more remote issue, but limited as regards the remoteness of the issue and as regards the quality of estates which could be given to the issue according as to whether they were born before or after the death of Edward (the grandfather). The testator died in July, 1856, and on the 25th of August, 1856, Edward (the son), the donee of the power, executed an appointment. Now, in dealing with this appointment I conceive that I ought to apply these two principles. In the first place, when you are determining whether and how a power has been exercised the true rule is to ascertain the intention of the donee of the power and to give effect to that intention. Of course, you must find it from the words he has used, but you do not read the instrument for the purpose of declining to give effect to it, because it is in inartificial language provided the language is such that you can accurately ascertain the intention which the donee of the power had. And secondly, this principle—that the estates taken by the appointees under the power are really taken, not under the instrument which executes the power, but under the instrument which creates the power. The instrument executing the power is but a schedule or appendix, so to speak, to the instrument which creates the power. And you have only to read into the instrument creating the power the relevant provisions, which are introduced by the instrument executing the power, and then the estate arises by virtue of the original will and not of the instrument which executes the power under the will.

Now with that I look at the instrument which executed the power. It begins with this recital: "Whereas I am empowered to appoint amongst my children and their issue all my father's real estates." Now what does that language under these circumstances mean? He had not power to appoint amongst his children and their issue in so many fractions or so many acres to each. What he had power to do was to create estates of quality varying according to the character of the persons to whom the appointment was to be made. One person amongst the class of children and issue could take a life estate and nothing more. Another person amongst the class of children and issue could take an estate tail. And therefore this donee in using that language must have meant: "Whereas I am empowered to create certain estates, varying according to the quality of the person, in my children and issue in my father's real estates." Having said that, what he goes on to do is this; he appoints "to my eldest son, Edward Richard Adams, and his issue" a certain part of that real estate. I agree that without the context, without knowing the circumstances, the result would be to create an estate tail in Edward Richard Adams, the son of the donee of the power. But is that the meaning and intention of the donee? I answer, certainly not. His intention was this, as I gather it from his words. He has said, as I have shown, if I understand his language: I have power to create in my son Edward Richard Adams a life estate, and in a certain class of his issue certain other estates—estates in tail; now I am going to exercise that power, and I appoint to my son Edward Richard Adams and his issue certain real estate. I think he meant by that: I appoint to these persons for the several estates which, having regard to the power which I hold, I can give those persons in that real estate. The result of that, of course, is that you get a life estate given to the person to whom he could give a life estate and an estate tail to the person to whom he could give an estate tail. There are two other similar gifts to the other two children. Let me point this out: that inasmuch as the class of persons to whom he could give a life estate only were dependent upon the question whether the grandchildren of Edward (the grandfather) had been born in his lifetime or not, it would have been important to the donee of the power to make the matter elastic as regards the class of estate that the issue were to take if, as might have been the case, he was not certain whether his remoter issue had or had not been born in the lifetime of Edward (the grandfather). In point of fact Edward (the grandfather) being dead, the event was determined—they were either born or not born, but it does not follow that the donee of the power personally knew it, and by expressing his gift in this form he left that to be determined according to the state of facts as they matured. I understand in point of fact that there were no great grandchildren born in the lifetime of Edward (the grandfather), and therefore really the power was to give life estates to the grandchildren and estates tail to the more remote issue. I think under this codicil that the result was to create in Edward Richard Adams and in each other child and their issue such estates as under the power could be given to those respective persons. The result is that the children of Edward (the son) would take for life, and the issue would take as joint tenants in tail.

ELSDON v. MAYOR, &c, OF HAMPSTEAD. (a.)

Metropolis—Local government—New road—Frontage—Apportionment of expenses—Metropolis Local Management Acts, 1855 and 1862.

Where the local authority by resolution, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by the Metropolis Local Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, apportioned the expenses of paving a new road among all the owners of the frontage, and subsequently revoked such apportionment and, by a fresh resolution, apportioned such expenses among a certain number of owners, making a merely nominal charge in respect of the remaining owners,

Held, that such subsequent apportionment was wrong in principle and invalid.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain houses in Gondar-gardens in the borough of Hampstead. On the west side of Gondar-gardens was land belonging to trustees upon which houses had been erected facing a road, parallel to Gondar-gardens, called Sarre-road. This land was separated from Gondar-gardens by a fence. The trustees had granted leases of the houses in Sarre-road and were in receipt of rent in respect of the same.

In October, 1901, the defendants determined to pave a portion of Gondar-gardens, which was a new road and unpaved, and on the 10th of October, by resolution under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, s. 105, and the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862, s. 77, apportioned the estimated expenditure, amounting to £2,040, among the owners of the houses and land bounding or abutting on Gondar-gardens, including the houses fronting on Sarre-road, such apportionment being at the rate of £1 3s. per foot of frontage.

On the 3rd of March, 1904, the defendants rescinded the said apportionment of the 10th of October, 1901, and on the 14th of April, by a fresh resolution apportioned the expenses among the owners of frontage abutting on the part paved, but excluding the owners of houses in Sarre-road, and making a nominal apportionment of 10s. in respect of the strip of land on which the fence stood which separated the premises of the houses in Sarre-road from Gondar-gardens.

The effect of this was to increase the amount payable by the remaining owners to £1 18s. per foot of frontage.

The plaintiff, one of the remaining owners, brought this action claiming a declaration that the apportionment of the 14th of April, 1904, was invalid.

The defendants alleged that the said trustees were not owners of land in Gondar-gardens and that the apportionment of the 14th of April, 1905, properly apportioned the expenses and was valid.

Younger, K.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiff.—The second apportionment is no apportionment at all—everybody must be charged. If any owner of frontage is left out the apportionment is bad. The court will not interfere with the discretion of the local authority except in the case of mala fides, but here the court ought to declare that no valid apportionment has been made.

The following cases were cited: Grand Junction Waterworks v. Hampton Urban District Council, 46 W. R. 644, [1898] 2 Ch. 331; Vestry of Mile End v. Whitechapel Guardians, 24 W. R. 364, 1 Q. B. Macmorran, K.C., and Munroe, for the defendants.—Inquiry as to ownership of adjoining land is not put upon the local authority. The corporation rightly or wrongly have come to the conclusion that the lessees of the Sarre-road houses are not frontagers, and their discretion is absolute: Metropolitan District Railway v. Fulham Vestry, 44 W. R. 53, [1895] 2 Q. B. 443.

JOYCE, J., in giving judgment, after reviewing the facts, said: The apportionment of the 10th of October, 1901, having been made, the inhabitants or owners of the houses in Sarre-road started the ingenious theory that their tenements did not abut upon Gondar-gardens, by reason that, as they alleged, the narrow strip of ground, really less than a foot in width, upon which the old wooden fence stood, or used to stand, did not belong to them but to someone else—viz., to the Grand Junction Waterworks Co. Thereupon, that is to say, on the 14th of April, 1904, the borough council rescinded the resolution of October, 1901, and affected to make another apportionment. That, it is asserted by counsel, the defendants are entitled to do so long as any work remains uncompleted. I have been referred to the case of Bishop v. Wandsworth Board of Works, and the plaintiff's counsel did not argue to the contrary, but assumed that I would follow that decision.

Of course, if an apportionment made by the authority were determined to be invalid a fresh one could be made. No one questioned that. The new apportionment omitted all mention of houses in Sarre-road and inserted instead "land upon which old fence stands," purporting to charge the owner or owners of the land, whatever it might be, so referred to with the nominal sum of 10s. The difference between this and the aggregate sum of more than £500 charged by the original apportionment on the houses in Sarre-road was thus thrown on the owners of other properties in Gondar-gardens, some of which belonged to the plaintiff, who very naturally objected to have the assessment on his property materially increased in this manner.

After investigation I am satisfied that there is no foundation in fact for the theory that the gardens or grounds of the houses in Sarre-road are cut off from the new street called Gondar-gardens by any intervening strip of land whatsoever, either belonging to the Grand Junction Waterworks Co. or to any other person other than the owners of the houses in Sarre-road, and I hold as a matter of fact that if the houses in Sarre-road are not houses "forming the new street," still the lands of the trustees demised to the lessees of the houses in Sarre-road do, within the meaning of the term in the statute "bound" or "abut" upon the new street, and so are liable to have, and ought to have, some portion of the expense of paving apportioned upon them in common with the other owners in the new street.

It was contended before me that if the corporation could not discover, or found difficulty in ascertaining who the owners were of some of the houses or lands forming or abutting upon the new street, they might apportion the whole expense, or all but a nominal sum, upon the owners who they did know. That appears to be a somewhat startling proposition, and having regard to the terms of the Act cannot be supported. It then was said that the court could not question or revise the principle upon which the apportionment was made if it was made bonâ fide. That may be as between the several persons liable, but the apportionment, whatever be the principle, if any, adopted in making it, must be made upon the right people, including all those liable, none can be left out. If the properties of the lessees in Sarre-road abut upon the new street, as in my opinion they do, some portion of the expense must be apportioned upon them. In my opinion the last apportionment was illegal and invalid.

Under the peculiar circumstances, notwithstanding what was said by Stirling, J., in Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v. Hampton Urban Council, I think this is a case in which an action can be maintained for a declaratory judgment or order, whether any consequential relief is claimed or not. I accordingly declare that the apportionment of the 14th of April, 1904, is invalid, the plaintiff to be at liberty to apply for an injunction if the apportionment is sought to be enforced. The defendants must pay the costs of this action.

PEDLAR v. ROAD BLOCK GOLD MINES OF INDIA (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Memorandum of association—Objects—Construction—Subsidiary or substantive—Ultrà vires.

One of the objects of a company, as stated in the first paragraph of clause 3 of the memorandum of association, was to acquire the undertaking of an older company and certain gold mines in Mysore. The object in the second paragraph was to acquire gold mines "in Mysore and elsewhere." The language of both these paragraphs, allowing for a change of name of the company in the first paragraph, was identical with, and the language of the remaining twenty-three paragraphs was to all intents the same as, that of the objects of the defendant company in Stephens v. Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) Mining Co. (Limited), 50 W. R. 509, [1902] 1 Ch. 745. One object was to promote new companies for the company's benefit. The company resolved to enter into an agreement to acquire certain gold mines in India just outside Mysore, and to pay for them partly in cash and partly in their own shares or in shares of a new company to be promoted by them for the purpose.

Held, that the objects in paragraph 2 were not sub-

Motion.

This was a motion by a shareholder in the Road Block Gold Mines of India (Limited) for an injunction to restrain the company until judgment from entering into a certain agreement with another company for acquiring a new gold mine which the company had sanctioned by special resolution.

The company was incorporated in July, 1893, with a capital of £180,000 divided into £1 shares, of which 122,349 had been issued. The objects for which the company was established, as stated in clause 3 of the memorandum of association, which consisted of twenty-five paragraphs, were (among others):

3.—(1) To acquire and take over as a going concern the undertaking of the Road Block Gold Mining Co. of India (Limited) (incorporated in 1900), and all or any of the assets and liabilities of that company, and with a view thereto to enter into and carry into effect, with or without modification, the agreement referred to in article 3 of the articles of association of this company.

(2) To acquire gold mines, mining and other rights, and land, auriferous, metalliferous, or otherwise, or any interests in the same respectively, in Mysore and elsewhere, and to work, exercise, develop, and turn to account the said mines, rights, and land, or interests therein respectively.

(11) To enter into partnership or into any arrangement for sharing profits . . . with any person or company carrying on . . . any business . . . which the company is authorized to carry on. . . .

(12) Generally to purchase . . . or otherwise acquire any real or personal property, and any rights or privileges which the company may think necessary or convenient with reference to any of these objects . . .

(15) To promote any company or companies for the purpose of acquiring all or any of the property, rights, and liabilities of this company, and for any other purpose which may seem directly or indirectly calculated to benefit the company . . .

(25) To do all such things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects . . . so that the objects specified in each paragraph of this clause shall, except where otherwise expressed in such paragraph, be in no wise limited or restricted by reference to or reference from the terms of any other paragraph or the name of the company.

The company acquired the Road Block mining property, but after spending considerable sums in exploring it, the directors came to the conclusion that it was not wise to spend any more money upon it. They accordingly prepared an agreement between a company called the Sangli Gold Mines (Limited) and their own company for the acquisition of another property called "Yelishirur," not in Mysore, but just over the border in the Presidency of Bombay. The terms of this agreement were, shortly, that the Road Block Co. were to have an option of purchase during two years, for which the company were to pay £50, and were to spend in prospecting and testing the property not less than £5,000. In the event of the option being exercised the company were to pay the Sangli Gold Mines Co. £1,250 in cash, and were either (1) to increase their share capital, and procure the same to be subscribed to an amount sufficient to provide a cash working capital of £45,000, and to allot to the Sangli Gold Mines (Limited) as fully paid up 15 per cent. of the nominal capital, or (2) to form a new company with a subscribed share capital sufficient to provide a cash working capital of £45,000, and were to allot to the Sangli Gold Mines (Limited) as fully paid up 15 per cent. of the share capital of such new company. At an ordinary general meeting of the company, held on the 26th of July, 1905, the draft agreement with the Sangli Gold Mines (Limited) was produced and a resolution was passed approving of the agreement, and the directors were directed to enter into the agreement on behalf of the company.

The plaintiff, who was a shareholder, brought this action against the company asking for a declaration that the scheme embodied in the agreement was ultrà vires, and that the company could not lawfully enter into it, and he claimed an injunction to restrain the company from entering into the agreement or giving effect to it; and he now moved for an injunction until the trial to the same effect.

Rowden, K.C., and S. Dickinson, for the plaintiff.—The principal object for which the company was established was to acquire and work the Road Block Gold Mines of the old company in Mysore. The rest of the objects stated in clause 3 of the memorandum of association are subsidiary to this object. The agreement to buy and work the Yelishirur Mines was consequently ultrà vires, and should not have been entered into; and the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction to restrain the company proceeding with it. Stephens v. Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) Mining Co. (Limited), 50 W. R. 509, [1902] 1 Ch. 745, is an authority exactly in point, for the objects of that company as stated in the memorandum of association were exactly the same as those here with one or two unimportant alterations. That decision was based upon the decisions of the Court of Appeal in In re Haven Gold Mining, 30 W. R. 389, 20 Ch. D. 151, and In re German Date Coffee Co. (Limited), 30 W. R. 717, 20 Ch. D. 169. Merely general statements of the objects of the company do not comply with the Companies Acts: In re Crown Bank (Limited), 38 W. R. 666, 44 Ch. D. 634.

Eve, K.C., and Frank Wright, for the defendant company.—The agreement in question is expressly within sub-clause 2 of the objects of the company. We do not need to rely upon sub-clause 25. The decisions of the Court of Appeal cited for the motion were upon winding-up petitions, and only decided that the substratums of the companies in those cases were gone. The decision in Stephens v. Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) Mining Co. ought not to be followed.

WARRINGTON, J. (after stating the facts): Now what is the true effect of the agreement in question? First an option is given to the company, to be converted at the company's will into an absolute contract, to purchase this property, but with a further option to the company that if it thinks fit it may direct that the property, instead of being conveyed to itself, shall be conveyed to the purchasing company, but it is to be borne in mind that the second option is merely for the sale to a company to be promoted by the present company. It does not involve the present company in any financial liability to any such new company, or involve it in any liability to subscribe for the shares of that new company. That is important, as will appear hereafter. Now is that agreement ultrà vires of the company? First, what is the true way of construing a memorandum of association containing such wide words as this contains? We are guided by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in In re

German Date Coffee Co. In that case the patents which the company was formed to acquire had not been granted, and consequently the objects specified in the first seven paragraphs failed altogether. But the company propose to acquire another patent in another country for the same or a similar invention. The matter came to court on a winding-up petition, it being alleged that the substratum of the company had gone. Lindley, L.J., said: "General words construed literally may mean anything, but they must be taken in connection with what is shewn by the context to be the dominant or main objects. It will not do under general words to turn a company for manufacturing one thing into a company for importing something else, however general the words are." Now, applying the principle laid down by Lord Lindley to the present case, and for the moment treating it as uncovered by any authority except that, for what ought I to say that this company was framed? Its name tells one nothing except that it is formed for gold mining, and that in order to distinguish it from other gold mining companies it is called the Road Block Co. The first paragraph of the objects shows why the name was selected. The next clause provides that the company may acquire gold mines "in Mysore and elsewhere." For my present purpose I need read no more of these sub-clauses of clause 3, because they certainly do not conflict with the construction which I am about to put upon those first two sub-clauses. Treating it as unfettered by authority, I should say that the object of the company was gold mining generally, not gold mining in a particular mine. Otherwise I cannot imagine what force is to be given to the words "and elsewhere" in the second paragraph, for to say that the object of the company is gold mining in the Road Block mines only and other gold mining incidental to the working of these gold mines is to reduce the clause to an absurdity. To say that the company is to work the Road Block mines and to acquire gold mines elsewhere than in Mysore as incidental to the working of the Road Block mines seems ridiculous. I therefore treat this as a company formed for the purpose of gold mining, not only in Mysore but elsewhere; but whose main object is gold mining. Now, is this agreement with the Sangli Gold Mines (Limited) one which such a company may properly enter into? As far as it provides for the working and purchasing of the gold mines mentioned in it, it comes within the very objects for which a company for gold mining is established. But the agreement goes farther, and under sub-clause 6 the company may promote a company to acquire the rights it has under the agreement. It has power under its memorandum of association to promote a company for this purpose. Unfettered by authority then I should come to the conclusion that the agreement was within the objects of the memorandum. I say nothing about sub-clause 25, upon the very wide words of which it is not necessary to rely for the purpose of this case. But am I at liberty to act upon the view I have stated. A very similar question came before Eady, J., in Stephens v. The Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) Mining Co. (Limited). The memorandum of association of the company in that case was to all intents and purposes the same as here. But the proposed transaction which was held to be ultrà vires was very different, and the view which the learned judge expressed must be regarded as bearing to some extent upon, and as being influenced by, the nature of the question he had to decide. It was not necessary for him to decide whether the primary object of the company was gold mining generally or mining in a particular mine, because whether the true construction was that its object was gold mining generally or mining in a particular mine, I think that the agreement in question in that case did not come within the objects of the company. I think, therefore, that that case is distinguishable from this. In construing a document, in my view, one judge is not bound by the decision of another in another case. He must express his view of the construction of the document before him. I remember hearing Sir George Jessel, M.R., say that he should not regard himself bound by the previous decision of another judge on the construction of the same passage in the same document as that which he had to construe. Now Eady, J., does not refer in his judgment to sub-clause 2 of clause 3 of the memorandum as it was not necessary for him to say whether the company was formed for gold mining generally or not. In that case the company proposed to obtain an option over a mine in West Africa, but not with a view of purchasing it themselves. If they thought worth while a subsidiary company was to be formed, in the shares of which the whole purchase price was to be paid. The company were to embark on a financial operation pure and simple. They were to subscribe to this new company, but were not to acquire the property over which they were to have an option; they were to embark the money of the shareholders in another company framed for the purpose of acquiring this gold mine. I heartily concur, if I may say so, in the principle laid down by Eady, J., that it is not right to adopt a construction which would virtually enable a company to carry on a business of any kind whatever; but with respect I venture to differ from him when he says: "In my opinion, the right way to construe the memorandum of association is to take the first paragraph of clause 3 as stating the principal or primary object for which the company is formed—i.e., 'to acquire and take over as a going concern the undertaking of the Mysore Reefs (Kangundy) (Limited).' Then the remaining paragraphs of clause 3 must be read as conferring on the company full and ample powers for carrying out that object." I think in saying that he passed over the effect of paragraph 2, which it was not necessary for him to consider. For that reason, and without relying on the principle that one judge is not bound in construing a document by the decision of another judge, I think this case does not come within that decision, and I am not bound by it or by the expression of opinion as to the construction of the objects of the memorandum given by Eady, J. I think that here the real object of the company was gold mining, and that the agreement they entered into was for that purpose and incidental to it, and comes within the incidental paragraphs of the memorandum of association.

Motion refused.

PERRING & CO. v. EMERSON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distress—Waiver of illegal levy—Owner of goods — Uncertificated bailiff — Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 21), s. 7.

Section 7 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, enacts : "From and after the commencement of this Act no person shall act as a bailiff to levy any distress for rent unless he shall be authorized to act as a bailiff by a certificate in writing under the hand of a county court judge. . . . If any person not holding a certificate under this section shall levy a distress contrary to the provisions of this Act, the person so levying and any person who has authorized him so to levy shall be deemed to have committed a trespass."

Held, that the section constitutes a distress by an uncertificated bailiff an illegal act which inures for the benefit not only of the tenant but of third parties whose goods are on the demised premises.

Appeal from the decision of the county court judge sitting at Brentford.

By an agreement dated the 7th of November, 1904, the defendant, Robert Emerson, let to Alexander Pierce for a term of three years, rent payable quarterly, a flat situated on the ground floor of a block of mansions known as Sutton-court, Chiswick.

The tenant was in default with the quarter's rent due on the 25th of December, 1904, and in due course the defendant signed a warrant of distress on the 21st of February, 1905, which was placed in the hands of one Baker, a certified bailiff.

By a hiring agreement dated the 26th of November, 1904, the tenant had hired on the hire system certain articles of furniture from Perring & Co., the plaintiffs, upon the condition (inter alia) that the plaintiffs should have power to retake possession of the goods upon the default by the tenant in the payment of any instalment due under the agreement.

The tenant being in default on the 22nd of February, 1905, the plaintiffs sent their foreman and three men to take possession of the goods. In the course of removing the goods to a van which they had provided for the purpose, which was at the time upon land exclusively the property of the landlord with rights of his tenants to use it, the manager of the defendant, one Milnes, entered upon the premises. The manager thereupon forbade the men to remove any more goods as he distrained on them for rent, stating that he had complete authority from the landlord to do so. The tenant stood by and did not object. In the afternoon the certified bailiff, Baker, distrained on the goods which had been already removed to the van, and eventually sold them to satisfy the rent, the sale of the goods in the house not proving sufficient for that purpose.

In an action by Perring & Co. against Emerson for illegal distress, the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs both as regards the goods on the premises and the goods which had been removed.

The defendant appealed.

P. B. Morle, for the appellant.—With respect to the goods on the premises distrained by Milnes, who was not a certificated bailiff, the distress was a good one. It would have been perfectly good at common law, and before a statute can be held to derogate from common law rights the language must be very clear. The Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, only concerns landlord and tenant, and section 7 whilst protecting the tenant affords no protection to a third party. Assuming, however, that the distress was irregular, yet the irregularity was waived by the tenant, which would inure for the benefit of the landlord against third parties on the authority of Werth v. London and Westminster Loans Discount Co., 5 T. L. R. 521. In that case the landlord distrained between the hours of sunset and sunrise, and the tenant waived the irregularity. It was held that this waiver bound third parties. Secondly, as regards the goods in the van which was at the time upon the landlord's property, I cannot contend in this court that the distress was legal, as the court is bound by the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Capel v. Buzzard, 6 Bing. 150.

Henlé, for the respondents, the plaintiffs.—I submit this was no distress at all. The requirements of section 7 of the Act were not fulfilled—that is to say, Milnes had not a certificate, and therefore all his acts were null and void: Fergusson v. Norman, 5 Bing. N. C. 76. But assuming that there was a distress, which was illegal, the true owner of the goods is still entitled to bring his action at common law to replevy the goods: Gibbs v. Cruikshank, 21 W. R. 734, L. R. 8 C. P. 454. The Act of 1888 certainly does not refer only to relations between landlord and tenant; section 6, which deals with the extension of time to replevy directly contemplates third parties; "within which the tenant or owner," &c. The tenant could not waive the illegality. Werth v. London and Westminster Loan and Discount Co. was not decided under this Act at all; the Act was not in force at the time; moreover, Manisty, J., treated the act complained of as an irregularity, not an illegality. [He was stopped by the court.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises a question of difficulty which, if it were thought necessary, might well be submitted to the consideration of a higher tribunal. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the view that this statute was passed mainly to amend the law as between landlord and tenant, and it has been argued that the provision as to certificated bailiffs was inserted for the protection of tenants rather than for third persons. I do not think it was limited to tenants, as section 6 certainly contemplates third parties. [His lordship read the section.] This brings us to the facts of this case. The words of section 7 are: [His lordship read the section set out above.] That section undoubtedly relates in the main to the relations between landlord and tenant, because it creates a new liability upon the person who authorized the uncertificated bailiff to levy the distress, even though the party authorizing does not know that the party authorized has no certificate. I am unable to come to the conclusion that the statute meant that the protection should only apply as between landlord and tenant; in other words, it was contemplated, in my opinion, that the right to levy distress upon goods which might or might not be the goods of third persons should only be exercised if the persons who levied the distress fulfilled the requirements of the statute. On general principles of construction you require different language than is to be found here to make an act legal as between the owners of the goods and the landlord where it is not a legal act as between the tenant and landlord. [His lordship stated the facts of the case.] I think the intention of the statute went further than to protect the tenant. The Act complained of should have been performed by a certificated bailiff, and it inures for the benefit of the owner of the goods. I was at first impressed by the decision in Werth v. London and Westminster Loan Co., but it seems the statute was not under the consideration of the court. It was merely a case where the landlord having acted illegally by levying at an improper time and the tenant having waived it, third persons could not avail themselves of the irregularity. Therefore that case is not an authority. The other point taken by Mr. Morle was that some of the goods distrained upon were upon part of the property of the landlord over which the tenant had certain rights. But the authority of Capel v. Buzzard is clear—namely, that the landlord cannot distrain upon the tenant's goods which are not upon the demised land but only upon the landlord's property over which the tenant has an easement. The main point of this appeal was upon the construction of section 7 of the Act. The appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The landlord has no title to the property of the goods of third persons which are upon the premises demised until their effective seizure under distress. Until that is made he has no right to interfere with the right of the owner to take the goods away. Now comes the critical question: What is the effect of section 7 of the 1888 Act? I confess that I fail to see how an act which is expressly forbidden by statute can inure to a person who admits to be guilty of an illegal act. It seems to me that, a seizure by an uncertificated bailiff having been forbidden in terms, no effect ought to be given to it. Therefore the right of the owner to take away his goods remains. It is not, to me, beside the mark to remind oneself of the fact that the year 1888 is only seventeen years ago and by that time the question as to the propriety of allowing the seizure of the goods of third persons had come into much consideration, and it was about that time that protection was afforded to lodgers. I cannot help thinking that if it was intended that, notwithstanding such distresses were forbidden by Act of Parliament, still the common law right of the landlord to take the property of third persons should be preserved, some adequate words would have been used to meet the case. We have been pressed by the decision of the Divisional Court in the Werth case. I confess that until Mr. Henlé pointed it out to me I was under the impression that it was a decision given under the statute of 1888. It is contended that in that case the court treated the act under consideration as a mere irregularity, and upon that view they decided it might be waived by the tenant, and the evidence showed it was waived by the tenant. To the best of my opinion I think that Mr. Henlé is correct in saying that the act of levying distress after sunset was an illegal act and not a mere irregularity, in which case different considerations would apply. But I fail to see on any point of view how an act forbidden by statute could be treated as an irregularity. Mr. Morle would have us carry the well-known doctrine of construction too far. He contends also that section 7 only creates an irregularity for which the concluding part of the section provides a remedy. As I understand it, it is this, where you have an act forbidden by the enacting words of the clause which makes the act wrong, and you have in the same clause or in some way connected with it a specific penalty provided, that that gets rid of the penalty which otherwise would be applicable—namely, the penalty for a common law misdemeanour. I think the effect of the concluding clause of section 7 is to render the landlord liable to an action for trespass and to prevent him from being prosecuted for a common law misdemeanour. I think that the landlord had no right to take these goods.

On the 9th of June, 1876, the testatrix executed a will by which she left all her property to her sister in trust for all the children who might "belong to" her at the time of her death, to be divided equally among them share and share alike.

In 1878 the testatrix gave birth to an illegitimate daughter, and died on the 2nd of January, 1905, a spinster, without lawful parent, grandparent, brother, or sister.

Samuel Eggar, a brother of the testatrix's mother, applied for a grant of administration with the will annexed on the ground that the residuary gift was void.

Stimson, for the applicant.

Le Bas, for the illegitimate daughter.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J., in giving judgment, said he thought there was a great distinction to be drawn between gifts whether by deed or will when made by a man in favour of illegitimate children and gifts made by a mother to her illegitimate children. In the former case it might well be urged that there was an immoral consideration, but it was difficult to see how that argument applied in the case of gifts given by a mother. Although there was a certain amount of conflict among the authorities, he thought that gifts by a mother were not affected by the policy of the law. He proposed to follow the case of Occleston v. Fullalove. As, therefore, the child in this case did undoubtedly "belong to" the testatrix, he held that she was the person entitled to benefit. The grant would therefore go to the illigitimate daughter of the testatrix, and the costs of both parties would be allowed out of the estate.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION v. BARCLAY & CO. (a.)

Company — Shares — Transfer — Indemnity — Forged transfer of stock—Innocent transferee—Loss incurred by company—Registration of transfer—Liability as between company and transferee.

A request to a person to carry out some statutory or ministerial duty, apparently legal, implies an undertaking to hold him free from loss occasioned by his thus complying with his supposed duty.

The respondents presented what purported to be a transfer of Sheffield Corporation Stock to the appellants, requesting them to register it in the name of their nominee. This was done, all parties acting innocently and without negligence. Subsequently the supposed transfer was found to be a forgery, and the corporation had to make good (there were new purchasers on the register) the loss to the real owners of the stock.

Held, that the respondents were liable to indemnify the corporation, as there was an implied contract to that effect.

The opinion of Lindley, J., in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D. 188, at p. 195, dissented from.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 54, [1903] 2 K. B. 580) reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) (52 W. R. 54, [1903] 2 K. B. 580), reversing a decision of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (reported 51 W. R. 204, [1903] 1 K. B. 1).

The action was brought by the Corporation of Sheffield against Messrs. Barclay & Co., bankers, to recover the sum of £11,487 17s. 5d., being the amount of principal and interest of certain corporation stock which belonged to certain trustees, Timbrell and Honnywill, and was transferred to a nominee of the defendants under a transfer purporting to be executed by Honnywill, but which for the purpose of this action must be taken to have been a forgery.

In March, 1893, 8,500 Sheffield Corporation Stock was transferred to the above-named trustees, and a certificate was issued in their names on the 13th of April.

Upon the 11th of April, 1893, a transfer of £8,200 of this stock to a nominee of Barclay & Co., purporting to be executed by both trustees, was handed to the defendants. This was sent to the corporation for registration on the 15th of April, 1893.

On the 28th of April, 1893, the nominee of Barclay & Co., the person named in the forged transfer of the 11th of April, executed a transfer of £8,000 of the stock to Young and Macdonald, and upon the 12th of May of the balance of £200 to M. F. Cockayne.

Upon the 1st of June the corporation issued certificates to Young and Macdonald for the £8,000 stock, and to M. F. Cockayne for the £200.

In 1901 an action was brought by Honnywill against the corporation claiming the rectification of the register, and it was found that the transfer had not been executed by Honnywill or with his authority, and consequently the corporation had to make good the loss incurred. The corporation the present appellants thereupon sued Barclay & Co. the present respondents upon an implied contract to indemnify them against the liability they had incurred under these circumstances, it being found that there was no negligence on either side.

The Lord Chief Justice held that the corporation were entitled to an indemnity, but the Court of Appeal considered that no contract of indemnity could be implied.

Danckwerts, K.C., Eldon Bankes, K.C., and H. T. Waddy, for the appellants.

Haldane, K.C., and F. R. Y. Radcliffe, for the respondents.

The arguments used and the cases cited are given very fully in the courts below.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case two persons, Timbrell and Honnywill, were joint owners of corporation stock created under a local Act of Parliament. Timbrell, in fraud of Honnywill, forged a transfer of the stock, and borrowed money on the security of the stock which the transfer was supposed to have transferred. A bank which lent the money sent the transfer to the proper officer of the corporation, and demanded, as they were entitled to do if the transfer was a genuine one, that they should be registered as holders of the stock. The corporation acted upon their demand; they transfered the stock into the names of the bank, and the bank in ordinary course transferred it to holders for value. The corporation also in ordinary course issued certificates, and the holders of these certificates were able to establish their title against the corporation, who were estopped from denying that those whom they had registered were the stockholders entitled. Honnywill, after the death of Timbrell, discovered the forgery that had been committed, and compelled the corporation to restore the stock, and the question in the cause is whether the corporation has any remedy against the bank who caused them to act upon a forged transfer, and so render themselves liable to the considerable loss which they have sustained.

Now, apart from any decision upon the question (it being taken for granted that all the parties were honest), I should have thought that the bank were clearly liable. They have a private bargain with a customer. Upon his assurance they take a document from him as a security for a loan, which they assume to be genuine. I do not suggest there was any negligence—perhaps business could not go on if people were suspecting forgery in every transaction—but their position was obviously very different from that of the corporation. The corporation is simply ministerial in registering a valid transfer and issuing fresh certificates. They cannot refuse to register, and though for their own sake they will not and ought not to register or to issue certificates to a person who is not really the holder of the stock, yet they have no machinery, and they cannot inquire into the transaction out of which the transfer arises. The bank, on the other hand, is at liberty to lend their money or not. They can make any amount of inquiries they like. If they find that an intended borrower has a co-trustee, they may ask him or the co-trustee himself whether the co-trustee is a party to the loan, and a simple question to the co-trustee would have prevented the fraud. They take the risk of the transaction and lend the money. The security given happens to be in a form that requires registration to make it available, and the bank "demand," as, if genuine transfers are bought, they are entitled to do, that the stock shall be registered in their name or that of their nominees, and are also entitled to have fresh certificates issued to themselves or nominees. This was done, and the corporation, by acting on this "demand," have incurred a considerable loss. As I have said, I think if it were res integra I should think the bank were liable; but I do not think it is res integra, but is covered by authority. In Dugdale v. Lovering, 10 C. P. 196, Mr. Cave, arguing for the plaintiff, put the proposition thus: "It is a general principle of law when an act is done by one person at the request of another, which act is not in itself manifestly tortious to the knowledge of the person doing it, and such act turns out to be injurious to the rights of a third party, the person doing it is entitled to an indemnity from him who requested that it should be done." This, though only the argument of counsel, was adopted and acted upon by the court, and I believe it accurately expresses the law. Qualifications have been constantly introduced into the discussion which I think led to some confusion; they are not really qualifications of the principle here enunciated at all, but the expression of principles which would render the application of the principle in question erroneous. One is that there is no right of contribution between tortfeasors, and the other is to distinguish the right insisted upon from the ordinary remedy in damages against a person who has caused injury by intentional falsehood. Neither of these questions has any relation to what is here in debate. The principle insisted upon by Mr. Cave in his argument quoted above has been undoubtedly sanctioned as part of the law by several old decisions, and I think the principle as enunciated is well established. With respect to the case of the sheriff quoted in the Court of Appeal (Collins v. Evans, 5 Q. B. 820), I think it has been overlooked that the sheriff was executing a genuine writ, and the information he received was given to him to aid him in the execution of the office which by law he was bound to execute, and the information (for it was no more) was given to him in good faith; but can any one suppose that, if any one brought a forged writ, and called upon the sheriff to execute it, such person would not be liable to indemnify the sheriff? I cannot think there would be any doubt on that subject, but the genuineness or otherwise of the document that the corporation were called upon to give effect to made the whole difference; and I think both upon principle and authority the corporation are entitled to recover, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord DAVEY.—The appellants are suing the respondents upon an implied contract to indemnify them against the liability which has been incurred by them in these circumstances. On the 11th of April, 1893, the respondents, Barclay & Co. (Limited), forwarded to the appellants a transfer of Sheffield Corporation Stock, purporting to be executed by two persons named Timbrell and Honnywill, who were the registered holders of the stock, in favour of the respondent Barclay, with a request to the appellants to register the name of the last-named respondent, and forward new certificates in due course. The appellants acted upon this request, and granted a new certificate to the respondent Barclay, who afterwards transferred the stock for value to third parties. The names of Barclay's transferees were registered in due course, and it is admitted that they obtained a good title against the appellants. All parties believed that the signatures to the transfer from Timbrell and Honnywill were genuine, but in fact Honnywill's signature had been forged by Timbrell.

It was not, however, until 1899, after Timbrell's death, that Honnywill discovered the fraud, and he thereupon brought an action against the present appellants for rectification of the register and other relief, and recovered judgment against the appellants, under which they have incurred a large liability. On these facts the Lord Chief Justice, who tried the action, has held that the appellants are entitled to be indemnified by the respondents against the liability they have incurred, but his judgment has been reversed by the Court of Appeal. Before referring to the numerous authorities which have been cited, I will first state the grounds upon which I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Chief Justice was right and that his judgment should be restored. Not much turns upon the particular provisions in the corporation's private Act of 1883 as to the transfer of their debenture stock or the keeping of the register or the issue of certificates of title. They for the most part follow the lines of the similar provisions in the Companies Clauses Act. I think that the appellants have a statutory duty to register all valid transfers, and on the demand of the transferee to issue to him a fresh certificate of title to the stock comprised therein. But, of course, it is a breach of their duty and a wrong to the existing holders of stock for the appellants to remove their names and register the stock in the name of the supposed transferee if the latter has in fact no title to require the appellants to do so. And it makes no difference that the appellants were not aware of the invalidity of the transfer or could not with reasonable diligence have discovered it. I am further of opinion that where a person invested with a statutory or common law duty of a ministerial character is called upon to exercise that duty on the request, direction, or demand of another (it does not seem to me to matter which word you use), and without any default on his own part in a manner which is apparently legal, but is in fact illegal and a breach of the duty, and thereby incurs liability to third parties, there is implied by law a contract by the person making the request to keep indemnified the person having the duty against any liability which may result from such exercise of the supposed duty. And it makes no difference that the person making the request is not aware of the invalidity in his title to make the request. I think that this is the broad principle to be deduced from such cases as Humphrys v. Pratt, 5 Bligh N. S. 154; Betts v. Gibbins, 2 Ad. & E. 57; Toplis v. Grane, 5 Bing. N. S. 636 and the other cases which have been cited. In Humphrys v. Pratt the reasons for the judgment in this House are unfortunately not stated in the report, but in commenting on that case in Collins v. Evans, 5 Q. B. 820, at p. 829, Tindal, C.J., says: "The declaration states that the judgment creditor pointed out the goods, and required the sheriff to take them. He made the sheriff his mandatary or agent for the purpose of taking the goods, and if the sheriff, acting innocently in obedience to that command, commits a trespass, there is no doubt but he, as any other individual in that position, whether sheriff or not, may recover over against his master or principal the damage he has been obliged to pay in consequence of obeying such directions." In Toplis v. Grane the same judge, after referring to the evidence in the case, says: "We think this evidence brings the case before us within the principle laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Betts v. Gibbins, that where an act has been done by the plaintiff under the express directions of the defendant which occasions an injury to third parties, yet, if such act is not apparently illegal in itself, but is done honestly and bonâ fide in compliance with the defendant's directions, he shall be bound to indemnify the plaintiff against the consequences thereof." In Collins v. Evans, on the other hand, the sheriff was entrusted with the execution of a writ of ca. sa. against one John Wright, and the defendant pointed out to him a person of the same name as the person liable, and the sheriff acted on the representation and incurred liability. It was held that the defendant was not liable to indemnify the sheriff, because he had merely made an innocent representation to the sheriff, but had not required the sheriff to act upon such representation, and had left him to his own discretion whether he would act upon it or not.

It has been said that the principle of these decisions only applies to cases between principal and agent and employer and employee, and the language of Tindal, C.J., in his comment on Humphrys v. Pratt gives some colour to that suggestion. I am not, however, of that opinion, and the contrary was decided in Dugdale v. Lovering, 23 W. R. 391, L. R. 10 C. P. 196. It may be that the language of Tindal, C.J., was not so felicitous as it usually was; but his meaning is plain that the liability to indemnify the sheriff arose from his having acted in supposed execution of his duty at the request and by the direction of the creditor. In some cases it is a question of fact whether the circumstances are such as to raise the implication of a contract for indemnity, but in cases like the one now before your lordships, when a person is requested to exercise a statutory duty for the benefit of the person making the request, I think that the contract ought to be implied. It matters not to the corporation whether A. or B. is the holder of stock, but to the purchaser who has paid his purchase-money or the banker who has lent money on the security of the stock it is of vital interest. The Court of Appeal distinguished the sheriff's cases on the ground that the request was to execute his duty in a particular manner. In the cases in question that was so. But I think the argument hæret in cortice, and is neither logical nor maintainable. It is difficult to imagine a case where a person should innocently request the sheriff to execute a writ which, though apparently regular, is in fact fictitious or invalid. If such a case be possible, it would come within the exact words of Tindal, C.J., and I entertain no doubt that the person presenting the writ would be held liable to indemnify the sheriff. It does not seem to matter at what stage of the transaction the request to do an act which turns out to be outside the officer's duty is made. In the present case, as pointed out by Mr. Bankes, the appellants ran no real risk until they issued the new certificate on the demand of the respondents. The judgment of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal seems to be based mainly on three grounds—(1) the decision of Lord Lindley (then Lindley, J.,) in Anglo-American Telegraph Co. v. Spurling, 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D. 188; (2) that there was no consideration for the alleged contract of indemnity; (3) that the contract—if any—to be implied from the circumstances was a warranty of their title by the transferees and not a contract of indemnity. The cases of Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. and the Anglo-American Telegraph Co. v. Spurling were an action and cross-action which arose out of a forged transfer of some of the company's stock, and were heard together. The first action was by the persons claiming under the forged transfer against the company for damages for wrongful removal of their names from the register on discovery of the fraud, and the cross-action was by the company against the persons who had brought in the forged transfer for registration, for an indemnity. The learned judge decided the first action in favour of the plaintiffs. He also decided the cross-action against the company. With regard to the transferor, he said: "Supposing that he knows nothing wrong about it, are the company entitled to say to him, 'We assume from the fact that you bring this transfer to us that it is a genuine document'? I apprehend that they are not entitled to say so to him. They are only entitled to say to him, 'We assume that you come honestly to us and that you do not know that anything is amiss with regard to the transaction.'" The learned judge then stated his views as to the duties of the company as follows: "It appears to me that a duty is thrown on the company to look to their own register, which involves, of course, the looking after transfers of stock or shares standing in the names of persons on the register, and that duty the company owes to those who come with transfers, and I do not see any corresponding or conflicting duty on the part of the person who brings the transfer, except, of course, that of bringing what he believes to be an honest document. I think the true view is this, that, there being no negligence, on the score of want of care on either side, but there being a duty on the part of the company to keep the register correct and themselves to look after the transfers between innocent parties, the loss must fall on the company." There was an appeal in both cases, and the decision in the first action was reversed, but counsel for the telegraph company did not proceed with the appeal in the cross-action, because if they succeeded in the first appeal the telegraph company had not suffered any damage. I am of opinion that the case of Spurling v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. was also wrongly decided by Lindley, J., and I respectfully dissent from both the propositions laid down by him and adopted by the Court of Appeal in the present case. I dissent from the proposition that a person who brings a transfer to the registering authority and requests him to register it makes no representation that it is a genuine document, and I am disposed to think (though it is not necessary to decide it in the present case) that he not only affirms it is genuine but warrants that it is so. I think that this is the result of the decision in Oliver v. Bank of England, 50 W. R. 340, [1902] 1 Ch. 610, affirmed in this House under the name of Starkey v. Bank of England, 51 W. R. 513, [1903] A. C. 114. It may be argued with some force that for this purpose no solid distinction can be made between the power of attorney through which the transfer of Consols is effected and the deed of transfer in the present case. Each of these instruments, it may be said, is put forward as evidence of the authority with which the person making the application professes to be clothed to request the removal of the stockholder's name and the substitution of another name in his place. But however this may be, it is enough for decision of this appeal to say that the deed of transfer was put forward as a genuine document, and the appellants were invited to act upon it as such. I am also of opinion that the authority keeping a stock register has no duty of keeping the register correct which they owe to those who come with transfers. Their only duty (if that be the proper expression) is one which they owe to the stockholders who are on the register. This point was decided by all the learned judges who took part in the decision of the first case of Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. I will content myself with quoting the language of Cotton, L.J.: "The duty of the company is not to accept a forged transfer, and no duty to make inquiries exists towards the person bringing the transfer. It is merely an obligation upon the company to take care that they do not get into difficulties in consequence of their accepting a forged transfer, and it may be said to be an obligation towards the stockholder not to take the stock out of his name unless he has executed a transfer; but it is only a duty in this sense—that unless the company act upon a genuine transfer they may be liable to the real stockholder."

True it is that the appellants, following what is now the usual practice, gave notice of the transfer which had been brought in to the persons named as transferors, but they had no duty to do so, and it was done merely for their own protection. Experience in these cases shows, however, that it is a very poor protection. Stirling, L.J., held that the mere performance of a duty imposed by law upon any one holding a definite legal position does not constitute a consideration sufficient to support a promise to him by the person to whom the duty is owed. But, with great respect to that very careful judge, he overlooked that this very point was involved in the decision of the case of Oliver v. Bank of England. Vaughan Williams, L.J., quoted and commented upon the passage from the judgment of Wills, J., in Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 2 Ell. & B. 627, where he says: "The fact of entering into the transaction with the professed agent as such is good consideration for the promise." And it did not occur either to the learned counsel, who argued the case of Oliver v. Bank of England with great pertinacity, or to any of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, or the noble lords in this House, to question that the acting by the Bank of England on the demand of the supposed attorney was not a good consideration for the promise by him to warrant the genuineness of the power which they held to be established. Lastly, it was said in the present case by Romer, L.J., that this is not an action on a warranty, and that a warranty and a contract of indemnity are distinct, one important difference being the period from which the Statute of Limitations would run. That, of course, is so, and the appellants admit that if they were suing on the warranty their action would be out of time. But I can see no legal reason why, in circumstances like those of the present case, it should not be held, if necessary, that the true contract to be implied from those circumstances is not only a warranty of the title but also an agreement to keep the person in the position of the appellants indemnified against any loss resulting to them from the transaction. And I think that justice requires we should so hold. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that as between these two innocent parties the loss should be borne by the respondents, who caused the appellants to act upon an instrument which turned out to be invalid. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice restored, with costs here and below.

EDMONDSON v. BIRCH & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Action of libel—Plea of privilege—Name of informant—Object of interrogatory.

Where in an action of libel the defendant pleads privilege, the plaintiff will not be allowed to interrogate the defendant as to the names of the persons on whose information the defendant published the words complained of, if it appears that the plaintiff's object is not to rebut the plea of privilege, but to obtain discovery which would enable him to bring actions against other persons.

Appeal from an order of A. T. Lawrence, J., at chambers, allowing an interrogatory in an action of libel.

The plaintiff was a mining agent. The defendants were a limited company carrying on business as merchants in the city of London.

In March, 1904, the plaintiff entered into an agreement of engagement with Messrs. Birch, Kirby, & Co. (Limited), who carried on business at Kobe, in Japan, and were the representatives of the defendants in that country.

By this agreement the Japanese company engaged the plaintiff on trial as their mineral manager and adviser at a monthly salary. It was at the same time arranged that the Japanese company should immediately communicate with the defendants to ascertain whether they approved the engagement; and, as the plaintiff alleged, subject to such approval, the Japanese company agreed that, if after three months' trial they were satisfied with the conduct and ability of the plaintiff, they would continue him in their permanent employ.

On the 22nd of June, 1904, the defendants sent a cablegram to the Japanese company to the following effect: "Have no dealings with Edmondson. Give notice of dismissal."

The plaintiff, having been thereupon dismissed, brought this action, in which he complained of the cablegram as being a libel, and alleged that by it the defendants meant, and were understood to mean that the plaintiff was an untrustworthy and dishonest person and not a man of business integrity fit to be employed in a responsible business capacity.

The defendants, by their defence, pleaded that the words complained of were not capable of the alleged or any defamatory meaning. In the alternative they pleaded privilege.

The plaintiff took out a summons for leave to administer the following interrogatory (among others) to the defendants: "What information, if any, had the defendants received, detrimental or otherwise to the character of the plaintiff, prior to the dispatch of the said cablegram which induced them to send the same? From whom was such information derived? Did the defendants take any and what steps to verify it?"

An affidavit made by one of the directors of the defendant company in opposition to the summons stated that, prior to the commencement of the action, the plaintiff had several interviews with him in which the plaintiff repeatedly stated that he wished to ascertain whether any person had given information to the defendants in regard to him which had resulted in the sending of the cablegram, and the name of that person, in order that he might institute an action against him, and that the plaintiff threatened that in the event of such information not being furnished to him he should institute an action against the defendants with the sole object of obtaining the desired information in the course of the proceedings. The plaintiff denied that he made such threat. From the written correspondence it appeared that the plaintiff repeatedly complained to the defendants that he had been traduced to them by some person, and asked that his name might be disclosed.

An order allowing the interrogatory was made by the master and affirmed by A. T. Lawrence, J.

Montague Lush, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the defendants.—This interrogatory ought not to be allowed, if the object of the plaintiff in putting it is not to rebut the defendants' plea of privilege, but to ascertain the names of the persons on whose information the defendants sent the cablegram, so that the plaintiff may bring actions against them: White v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index (Limited), 53 W. R. 369, [1905] 1 K. B. 653. The affidavits and the correspondence show clearly that the plaintiff's sole object in bringing the action was that he might administer this interrogatory and so obtain discovery to enable him to bring actions against other persons.

Marshall Hall, K.C., and A. S. Poyser, for the plaintiff.—This interrogatory is rightly allowed as necessary to assist the plaintiff in the conduct of the action. The question of malice may depend on the status of the defendants' informant. If the defendant's answer the interrogatory by giving the name of a person whose respectability no one can assail, the plaintiff will be well advised to abandon the action. On the other hand, the answer may be such as to support the plaintiff's allegation of malice and rebut the plea of privilege. The mere fact that answering the interrogatory may incidentally involve disclosing the name of a person whom the plaintiff may afterwards sue is no ground for disallowing the interrogatory.

ROMER, L.J.—In an action for libel, where privilege is pleaded by the defendant, there is no doubt that the court has jurisdiction to allow the plaintiff to administer an interrogatory, which, with the view of rebutting the plea of privilege, is directed to ascertaining from the defendant whether the defendant had made any inquiries as to the truth of the statement complained of, and from whom he had obtained the information on which he relied in publishing the statement. That the court has this jurisdiction is shown by White & Co. v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index (Limited). But undoubtedly an interrogatory delivered with the view of ascertaining the names of persons from whom the defendant received the information on which he acted in publishing the statement complained of is an interrogatory which ought to be looked on with care and jealousy; for it might be used as an engine of oppression. Collins, M.R., pointed this out in the case to which I have referred. After stating the principle that an interrogatory asking the defendant from whom he obtained his information was permissible, he said: "In some cases, of course, countervailing rights and considerations might have to be taken into account. There might in some cases be ground for thinking that the inquiry as to the persons from whom the information was obtained was made with some illegitimate motive, and that the plaintiff was really seeking to assert some right of action against the persons who gave the information to the defendant. If there were ground for the suggestion that the inquiry was not made bonâ fide for the purposes of the pending action, and, therefore, was made for other purposes than those for which the law allows interrogatories, then such an interrogatory would be oppressive and illegitimate, and ought not to be allowed." The letters which have been read convince me that the present case falls within the words I have quoted. I am satisfied that in this case the question which is asked as to the persons from whom the information was obtained is asked with an illegitimate motive, and that the plaintiff is really seeking to assert some right of action against persons who gave the information to the defendants, and that the question is not asked bonâ fide for the purposes of the present action. In my opinion, the court will be acting wisely in not allowing this interrogatory. It will, therefore, be partly disallowed. So far as it asks what information the defendants had received prior to the despatch of the cablegram that induced them to send the same, it will be allowed. But the rest of the interrogatory, which asks from whom such information was derived, and whether the defendants took any steps to verify it, will be disallowed. To that extent the appeal succeeds.

In re BRITISH WIDOWS' ASSURANCE CO. (a.)

Company—Life assurance—Company combining other businesses with life assurance—Separate account—Form of scheme—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), s. 4.

A company combining the business of life assurance with other business, such as selling tea, were authorized by the court to continue their business on undertaking for the future to carry it on in accordance with a scheme which complied with section 4 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, by the required separation of the two businesses.

Form of scheme approved.

This was an appeal against a winding-up order made by Buckley, J.

The British Widows' Assurance Co. (Limited), incorporated in 1902 under the Companies Acts, carried on the business of the selling of tea combined with that of life assurance for providing pensions for widows. The system of business was this: Tea was sold at a price of 8d., 10d., or 1s. per lb. in excess of its fair retail value. On a woman purchasing tea with the intention of availing herself of the insurance benefits offered by the company, she received a collection card on which the company's agent entered the purchases made by her from time to time. Upon this card were the conditions of insurance, whereby (amongst other things) the company undertook to pay 10s. a week to every woman who had purchased not less than half a pound of the company's tea for thirteen consecutive weeks next previous to her becoming a widow; and to continue such payments so long as she should continue a widow and buy half a pound of tea from the company in each week. It was further provided that a purchaser of only a quarter of a pound of tea weekly should similarly receive a pension of 5s. a week. Then the conditions went on to state that the rights under the assurance should be limited to receiving the payment of pensions rateably out of 75 per cent. of the net profits on tea, the funds accumulated therefrom to be set aside for that purpose by the company; and that the pensioners should have no rights as against the company beyond the said 75 per cent. of net profits, and the funds accumulated therefrom.

It appeared from the evidence that, taking the middle figure, 10d., as being the loading to answer the pension contract, a very small proportion ever reached the fund to which the assured were to look for the satisfaction of their claims, so that by November, 1904, the company found that their pension scheme was a failure. During that year the company had advertised a proposal to add the sale of coffee and cocoa upon the same terms.

In November, 1904, the insolvency of Nelson & Co. (Limited), a company of a similar kind, became the subject of discussion in the public press, that company being eventually wound up by an order made by Buckley, J.

In consequence on the 5th of February, 1905, the present company ceased to accept new business under the old conditions, and taking legal and actuarial advice they issued a prospectus offering their existing customers substituted contracts or policies under six heads or "Tables of Benefits," A, B, C, D, E, and F, classifying the several events on which persons would be entitled to insurance benefits, these tables having been calculated on what was believed to be a sound financial and practical basis. By that prospectus the company proposed to set aside for the insurance fund 90 per cent. of their profits in lieu of 75 per cent., placing a minimum of 7d. to 8d. per lb. of tea to the credit of that fund.

That was the position when the directors of the company received intimation that a winding-up petition was in contemplation. Thereupon they decided to inform their customers, who were all women in a humble position of life, of the proposed petition, and of the probable consequences if it should be successful, and the result was that about 21,879 customers accepted policies under the new conditions of insurance, all of whom, with the exception of a comparatively small number, were desirous that the company should go on under the new scheme.

On the 2nd of March, 1905, a petition for the compulsory winding up of the company, intituled under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and the Life Assurance Companies Acts, 1870 and 1872, was presented by two dissentient policy-holders. The petition alleged that the company was hopelessly insolvent, and that a winding up was just and equitable; also that the conduct of the business of the company required investigation.

The petition was heard by Buckley, J., who, on the 12th of April, 1905, made the usual compulsory winding-up order on two grounds — (1) that, on the evidence, not only had the company become insolvent under the old system, but its insolvency had continued under the new; and (2) that the effect of the new scheme was that the entire proceeds of the tea, &c., sold went into the general funds of the company without distinction, the moneys received from each customer by way of premium on insurance not being carried to and forming "a separate assurance fund," as required by section 4 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870. That section provides as follows:

"In the case of a company established after the passing of this Act transacting other business besides that of life assurance, a separate account shall be kept of all receipts in respect of the life assurance and annuity contracts of the company, and the said receipts shall be carried to and form a separate fund to be called the life assurance fund of the company, and such fund shall be as absolutely the security of the life policy and annuity holders as though it belonged to a company carrying on no other business than that of life assurance, and shall not be liable for any contracts of the company for which it would not have been liable had the business of the company been only that of life assurance. . . ."

After considerable argument occupying the greater part of the 17th and 18th of April, 1905,

THE COURT with a view to preventing the loss which would inevitably accrue to the poor policy-holders of the company should the company have to go into liquidation, directed the appeal to stand over generally for the appellants, the company, to prepare a scheme for carrying on their business, having due regard for the Life Assurance Acts, and to submit it to the actuaries for the petitioners; the scheme then to be brought before the court for consideration, and the appeal to be restored to the paper for that purpose; both parties to be at liberty to file further affidavits before the appeal was restored; pending the further hearing of the appeal the official receiver to carry on the company's business in the same manner as the company were carrying it on, and to allow the funds of the company to be applied for that purpose.

A scheme for the future working of the company was prepared by the company and their actuaries, and was submitted to and approved of by the actuaries for the petitioners, the scheme being in the following form:

"Proposed Conditions of Future Working.—1. The company will institute a separate life assurance branch assuring benefits in accordance with the six tables A, B, C, D, E, and F already advertised—but assurances in accordance with the terms of tables A, B, C, and D will be issued only to persons at present holders of policies upon those terms and to the extent to which they now are entitled to assurance. 2. Every assurance contract under the new scheme will be secured by a separate policy, which will be issuable both to customers for tea and cocoa, &c. (hereinafter called tea customers), and to those who are not tea customers of the company. 3. The policy will be an ordinary industrial life assurance policy containing no reference whatever, neither in the body of the policy nor by indorsement, to the purchase of tea; the weekly premium to be charged for full assurance shall be 1s., for half assurance 6d., and for quarter assurance 3d. 4. Full assurance means such assurance as under tables A to F would have been obtained by the purchase of 1lb. of tea per week, half assurance such as would have been obtained by the purchase of ½lb. of tea per week, and quarter assurance such as would have been obtained by the purchase of ¼lb. of tea per week. 5. In the case of those assured who are tea customers the collection card shall show in the heading thereof that the sum payable weekly includes 1s. in respect of insurance premium. 6. If the tea customer ceases to purchase tea, the insurance premium of 1s. remains payable should she decide to continue the insurance. 7. The whole of the premiums received will be carried to an assurance account, and an assurance fund, as provided by the Life Assurance Companies Acts, 1870, out of which will be payable only the sums allowed by the Life Assurance Companies Acts, subject to a provision that the contribution of the life assurance funds towards the expenses of conducting the business shall not exceed 5d. per week in respect of each full assurance, and 2½d. per week in respect of each half assurance, and 1¼d. per week in respect of each quarter assurance, so that if the maximum rate of expense is charged against the life assurance fund there will be left 7d. to meet claims and bonuses in respect of each full assurance, 3½d. in the case of each half assurance, and 1¾d. in the case of each quarter assurance. 8. The company shall agree to pay to the assurance fund 1d. upon every premium for a full assurance, ½d. upon every premium for a half assurance, and ¼d. upon every premium for a quarter assurance paid by persons assured previously to the 5th of February, 1905, who are holders of policies under tables A, B, C, or D, or have policies assuring larger amounts than those specified in tables E or F, and the sums payable under this clause into the assurance fund shall be applicable only to the payment of claims and bonuses (if any) as aforesaid. 9. Any expenses of the business of the company in connection with assurance not provided for out of the amounts applicable thereto, as hereinbefore mentioned, shall be borne and paid by the company out of its funds, other than those carried to the assurance account and assurance fund. 10. The accounts of the company shall be made up annually, and if a sum equal to 90 per cent. of the profits of the company for each year other than profits in the life assurance fund shall exceed the aggregate of 7d. out of every full assurance premium, 3½d. out of every half assurance premium, and 1¾d. out of every quarter assurance premium paid to the company during the year, for which the accounts are so made up, or 8d., 4d., and 2d. respectively in the case of those insurances referred to in clause 8 hereof, the said excess shall be added to the assurance fund and be applicable only to the payment of claims and bonuses (if any) as aforesaid. 11. A first valuation of the assets and liabilities of the assurance fund shall be made by a qualified actuary as at the 31st of December, 1908, and annually thereafter, and any surplus available after making all necessary reserves shall be divided into ten equal parts, nine of which shall be apportionable either in cash or equivalent benefits among the persons assured who at the date of the valuation are in full benefit, and such apportionment shall be made in such manner as the directors shall determine, and the remaining one-tenth part shall be treated as part of the profits of the company. 12. The other conditions of the assurance shall be the same as those now in force under the policies issued in pursuance of tables A, B, C, D, E, and F respectively, save that in the place of purchases of tea, cocoa, &c., the payment of premiums shall be the consideration for the policy, and the definition of full benefit, partial benefit, and the other conditions shall be varied accordingly. 13. As regards existing business: Every person entitled to insurance benefits under the tables A, B, C, D, E, and F shall be offered and be entitled to claim a new policy conferring similar benefits under the new scheme. 14. As regards lapsed business, any person whose right of benefits has lapsed during the period since the 5th of February, 1905, by reason of the company's agents not having called upon her, or since the 2nd of March, 1905, by reason of the uncertainty created by the presentation of the petition to wind up, and otherwise owing to the presentation of the said petition, and not by her own desire or default, shall be entitled, upon applying for a policy under the new scheme under tables E or F, and on making a purchase of tea, &c., to the amount which if purchased during the said interval would have kept her assurance on foot (or in the alternative on paying a sum equal to the aggregate weekly premiums falling due during the said interval at the rate of 1s., 6d., or 3d. per week, as the case may be) to have a new policy issued to her for full assurance, half assurance, or quarter assurance, as the case may be, under such of the said tables E or F as she may select. 15. Any person holding a subsisting assurance under the original pension scheme effected before the 5th of February, 1905, who has not in the meantime accepted, or agreed to accept, an assurance under one of the tables A, B, C, D, E, or F, and whose claims have not emerged, and who have regularly taken tea up to this date, shall be offered (a) the return of all premiums paid by her at the rate of 7d. for every pound of tea or cocoa she shall have purchased, together with interest at 4 per cent. per annum; or (b) the right to have a new policy issued to her for full assurance, half assurance, or quarter assurance, as the case may be, under such of the said tables E or F as she may select. (16) Any person who was assured before the 5th of February, 1905, under the pension scheme, and whose claim has emerged and is still outstanding, shall have her claim satisfied in ordinary course."

The case having been restored to the paper, the scheme was now submitted to the court for approval. In support of the scheme affidavits were filed by experienced actuaries on behalf of the company, and also on behalf of the petitioners, from which it appeared that under the new conditions the company had good prospects of future success, and that the benefits offered would be reasonably secure.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Martelli, for the appellants, the company, at their lordships' suggestion, offered an undertaking on behalf of the company to carry on their business in accordance with the scheme if sanctioned.

Younger, K.C., for contributories supporting the appeal.

Eve, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the petitioners.

A. H. Jessel, for parties supporting the petition.

R. J. Parker, for the Board of Trade, who had been served with the petition and to whom a copy of the proposed scheme had been sent, asked that the sanction to the scheme should be postponed to enable the Board of Trade to examine the scheme.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this matter we have the advantage of having had this scheme critically considered by actuaries representing both the petitioners in the winding-up petition and the company; and these actuaries, who are persons whose position as skilled actuaries can in no way be questioned, are agreed that if this scheme is carried out there will be reasonable security for the assured receiving the benefits which it is intended they should receive under their policies. In addition to that, the evidence before us shows that there is nothing in this scheme which in any way leads one to suppose that the carrying out of the scheme, which the company by their counsel undertake to carry out, will so cripple the business of the company as to prevent them from not only carrying on their business as a solvent company, but also arriving at a period of prosperity.

Every one must be glad that this result has been arrived at, because it is plain that, if the anticipations of these experts are verified, the assured will gain thereby that sort of assurance which as thrifty people they have been trying to obtain, and they will be saved from very serious loss which would inevitably have come upon them if this company had had to be wound up under a compulsory order.

With regard to what Mr. Parker has said about the Board of Trade, the board very often affords great assistance to the court in company cases, and the court is always glad to accept its assistance. In the present case it appears that the board has not in fact examined into this scheme, but to postpone the sanction of the scheme to allow the board to do so would be, in effect, to run a great risk that the scheme never could be carried out at all, because it is obvious that every week's delay makes it more difficult to carry out a scheme of this sort.

Mr. Parker mentioned that the Board of Trade thought that they might possibly have thrown some light upon the previous events in the history of this company which might lead us to a conclusion that this opportunity of framing and working out this scheme might possibly be an opportunity which the company were not entitled to have. With regard to that, we decided when this appeal was last before us that the company should have this opportunity; they have had it, and I myself have no reason at all to doubt that, in acting upon the opinion of these experts, we are acting upon opinions which the court is not only entitled to act upon, but is bound to accept.

Under these circumstances we sanction this proposed scheme, and make an order accordingly.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

[The winding up order order made by Buckley, J., was accordingly discharged, the company undertaking by the counsel to carry on their businesses in accordance with the scheme as now sanctioned.]

A lady domiciled in France, on whom a power of appointment by will had been conferred by an English instrument, made a will, valid by the law of her domicil but not attested as required by the Wills Act, by which she appointed a universal legatee with a general bequest of personalty. The will contained no express reference to the power and no express direction that it was to be construed according to English law.

Held, that the power had not been exercised, as the will, though admitted to probate, was not, owing to non-compliance with the provisions of the Wills Act as to attestation, a will to which the rules of construction contained in section 27 of the Wills Act as to the execution of powers applied.

Edward Cotteril Scholefield by his will dated the 22nd of July, 1851, appointed his brothers William Scholefield and John Scholefield executors and trustees thereof and gave, devised, and bequeathed the rest, residue, and remainder of his property both real and personal to his said trustees upon certain trusts for sale and realization thereof and for investment of the proceeds, and upon trust to pay the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof to his wife Isabella Deborah Scholefield for life, and from and after her decease he directed his trustees to stand and be possessed of his residuary estate upon certain trusts for his children, but if there should be no child who should attain a vested interest he directed that his trustees "as to two-thirds of the said stock, funds, and securities and the dividends, interest, and annual produce thereof to stand possessed thereof upon trust for the said William Scholefield and Joshua Scholefield, of Wigginton, near the City of York, their executors and administrators, absolutely as tenants in common, and as to the remaining third part thereof upon trust for such person or persons as my said wife shall by her last will and testament in writing notwithstanding any future coverture direct or appoint, and in default of any such last-mentioned direction or appointment and so far as the same shall not extend then upon trust for the said William Scholefield and Joshua Scholefield, their executors, administrators, and assigns, absolutely as tenants in common."

The said E. C. Scholefield died without leaving issue on the 1st of November, 1859.

His widow Isabella Deborah, whose maiden name was Young, was married a second time in or about October, 1863, to Comte de Damas D'Hautefort, who died on the 14th of April, 1887, leaving his widow surviving.

The said Comte de Damas D'Hautefort was a French subject domiciled in France, and by her marriage with him the Comtesse Isabella Deborah lost her English domicil of origin and acquired the French domicil of her husband, which she retained until her death in Paris on the 13th of March, 1904.

Under the will of Jane Young (her mother), who died on the 6th of May, 1858, the Comtesse de Damas D'Hautefort also had a general power of appointment by will in the ordinary form without any special formalities over a share in the estate of the said Jane Young.

The Comtesse de Damas D'Hautefort made several wills and codicils.

By a will dated the 19th of July, 1888, written in the French language and made at Pau by a notary, the testatrix reappointed her brother Walter Buchanan Young her general and universal legatee, and consequently she left and bequeathed to him all the movable and immovable property which should be found to belong to her on her death as well in France as in England, on condition that he executed the following specific legacies—viz.: To each of her nieces Millicent Massingberd Mundy and Sophia Massingberd Mundy £2,000. In the event of her brother predeceasing her the testatrix appointed her niece Millicent Massingberd Mundy her universal legatee, and the sum of £2,000 specifically bequeathed to her was to revert then to her sister Sophia Massingberd Mundy, so that her legacy should then amount to £4,000. The testatrix then revoked and annulled all other dispositions she had made before the present will, which will only was to be carried out. This will is stated to have been signed by the testatrix in the presence of the notary and three witnesses, who also signed it.

By a holograph codicil dated the 4th of June, 1889, to her will dated the 19th of July, 1888, the testatrix, after reciting that by that will she had appointed her brother Walter Buchanan Young her universal legatee, and in the event of her brother predeceasing her, her niece Millicent Massingberd Mundy, directed that if for any reason whatever, her brother would not accept her estate, the universal bequest made to him by the will should also be received by her niece Millicent Massingberd Mundy.

By a holograph will written in the French language and dated the 29th of September, 1890, the testatrix, after making a declaration of religious faith, appointed her brother Walter Buchanan Young her universal legatee, wishing that he should receive in full ownership all the property which composed her estate in England as well as in France.

By a holograph codicil in the French language, dated the 9th of February, 1893, the testatrix, in the event of her brother not accepting her estate, appointed her niece Helen St. John her universal legatee; also in the event of her brother dying before her.

By a holograph codicil in the French language, dated the 8th of August, 1903, the testatrix, in the event of her niece Helen St. John dying before her, appointed her niece Agnes Leacock her universal legatee.

None of the wills or codicils after the will of the 19th of July, 1888, were attested by witnesses.

The testatrix died on the 13th of March, 1904, having survived her brother Walter Buchanan Young, but leaving her niece Helen St. John surviving, who consequently became universal legatee according to the codicil of the 9th of February, 1893.

At the time of her death the testatrix was possessed of certain furniture and personal belongings of small value in France and in England, of a sum of £362 in a bank, and certain arrears of income due from the trustees of the wills of the said E. C. Scholefield and Jane Young.

Among the papers belonging to the testatrix was found an envelope addressed to Miss Helen St. John, containing five documents written in the English language, and a second envelope containing a list of legacies dated the 20th of October, 1903, which was signed, but contained no words of disposition. The legacies given amounted to £6,400, and included legacies to Miss Helen St. John and £500 to Mary Rogers. On the fly-leaf was a memorandum headed "debts," showing altogether that the debts owed by the testatrix amounted to £6,980. These documents showed that she thought she was disposing of all her property, including the property over which she had a power of appointment.

Letters of administration, with translations of the will of the 19th of July, 1888, the codicil of the 4th of June, 1889, the will of the 29th of September, 1890, and the codicils of the 4th of February, 1893, and the 8th of August, 1903, annexed, were granted to Miss Helen St. John as universal legatee.

The present summonses were taken out by the respective trustees of the wills of E. C. Scholefield and Jane Young for the determination of the question whether the power of appointments given by the wills of E. C. Scholefield and Jane Young had been validly exercised by the testatrix, and to whom the shares, over which there had been a power of appointment, belonged.

Evidence was given that according to the French law the terms of the gift contained in the wills and codicils were such as to pass all the property of which the testatrix was competent to dispose without any restriction whatever, including the property over which she had a power of appointment, and that the mode of disposing of property by means of powers of appointment was unknown to French law. If a French court had to determine whether certain words in a French will had exercised a power of appointment conferred by an English instrument, it would in general refer to English law, unless the terms of the will might as a matter of construction exclude the English law. If the question involved in this case came before a French tribunal the court, in trying to ascertain whether the testatrix had intended to exercise the power, would consider first the terms of the testamentary dispositions themselves and then the surrounding circumstances and any extrinsic documents, including the fact that, apart from these two funds over which the testatrix had a power of appointment, her estate was never at any time sufficient to satisfy the legacies, which amounted to £4,500, or to pay the debts, and would infer from the fact that the testatrix made her brother universal legatee with an obligation to pay out of the property coming to him legacies to the amount of £4,500, that the testatrix was intending to dispose of the whole of her property, including that over which she had a power of appointment.

By section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837: No will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned—that is to say, it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, and such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary.

By section 10: No appointment made by will, in exercise of any power, shall be valid unless the same be executed in manner hereinbefore required, and every will executed in manner hereinbefore required shall, so far as respects the execution and attestation thereof, be a valid execution of a power of appointment by will, notwithstanding it shall have been expressly required that a will made in exercise of such power should be executed with some additional or other form of execution or solemnity.

By section 27: A general devise of the real estate of the testator, or of the real estate of the testator in any place or in the occupation of any person mentioned in his will, or otherwise described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any real estate, or any real estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; and in like manner a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate, or any personal estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

T. T. Blyth, for the trustees of the will of E. C. Scholefield.

R. Neville, K.C., and A. L. Morris, for the defendant Miss St. John.—The question whether the general power of appointment was validly exercised by the French will must be determined by French law, and according to the evidence of the French lawyers the words used in the will would be sufficient to pass everything which the testatrix had, including property over which she had only a power of appointment.

This case is governed by the decision in In re Price, 48 W. R. 373, [1900] 1 Ch. 442, where Stirling, J., held that a testatrix could exercise a general power of appointment by a will made in French form and unattested, notwithstanding sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, and that the same rules of construction ought to be applied to it as would be applied to an English will in the same terms and of the same date, including the rule of construction introduced by section 27 of the Wills Act. If the will is to be construed according to the English law, the reference to England that the testatrix made in her will is almost identical to the reference to England in In re Price, and brings the case directly within that decision. The decision in In re Harman, [1894] 3 Ch. 607, is also in accordance with this view. There was no principle laid down in In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts, 51 W. R. 552, [1903] 1 Ch. 898, except that where there were no general words the French canon of construction would apply, and not the English canon. It is not disputed that a power contained in an English instrument giving power to dispose of property by will can be exercised by a foreign will valid according to the law of the domicil, if the intention so to exercise the power is apparent on the face of the will. Having regard to the French law, this court will look at the letters which show that there was an intention of exercising this power just as the French court would, where extraneous evidence is admissible to show evidence of intention.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for the defendant Mrs. Meredith, one of those who would take in default of appointment.—The power was not validly exercised. Whether it was so or not must be determined according to English law. Upon the face of the testamentary disposition, which is all that the court will look at, there was no exercise of the power of appointment at all; there was no reference in the will or codicils either to the power or to the funds which would pass under such power if exercised, and therefore the will must be construed according to the rules of construction independent of the Wills Act. The rule of construction which section 27 of the Wills Act establishes is an artificial rule of construction and only applies to wills which are executed in compliance with sections 9 and 10 of that Act. It does not apply to wills which our law recognizes as valid as being executed according to the law of the domicil, but not executed according to English law so as to make such wills a good exercise of a power of appointment. There can be a good exercise of a power of appointment by a will which is not made according to English law, but according to the law of the domicil if it directly purports so to do, as was done in In re Price. The rule of construction is that if there is a general bequest of personalty that shall operate as a good exercise of the power of appointment by will, but that does not mean a will executed according the law of France. In none of the cases cited was there a general bequest of personalty, but in every case the testator purported to have exercised the power of appointment, and that fact distinguishes those cases from the present case. Stirling, J., in his decision in In re Price, distinctly left open the very point that Buckley, J., decided in In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts when he held that as the will did not contain express reference to the law of England it did not operate as a valid exercise of the power of appointment. That is a distinct decision which governs the present case, and it is also in accordance with the decision of Stirling, J., in In re Price, which went on the ground that in that case there was on the face of the will an indication that the testatrix wrote it with reference to the law of England. It is said that in the present case there is a reference to England, but it is only to property in England, and there was property in England. There is no reference to the will being construed according to the law of England. It is also said that the letters which would be referred to in a French court contain a reference to the exercise of the power of appointment, but on this point the English law must be followed as to whether the power has been exercised by the will, and according to English law any evidence outside the will admitted to probate would be rejected. The evidence tendered has tried to go one step further than the evidence in In re Price and In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts, and the court will be slow in adopting this extension. Our evidence is in accordance with the decisions of Stirling, J., and Buckley, J., in the cases cited above, that the French courts would require to be instructed as to what, according to English law, amounts to an exercising of a power of appointment, and they would decide whether it had been duly exercised according to English law.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Dauney, for other parties in the same interest.—There was a default in the exercise of the power of appointment. Any documents which are regarded as an exercise of the power of appointment given by the English will must be construed according to English law. The French will was not an exercise of the power, notwithstanding property in England is mentioned in it. It would be impossible to say that this will was a valid exercise of the power unless section 27 of the Wills Act applied, but it is submitted that that section does not apply to a will which does not comply with the requirements of sections 9 and 10, and that therefore the will must be construed as if it had been made before the passing of the Wills Act. The case is governed by the decision of Buckley, J., in In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts. The evidence of the French lawyers is admissible only in so far as they state what the French law is, but it must be rejected so far as they purport to construe the will and say what the French courts would decide in the case: Di Sora v. Phillipps, 10 H. L. C., at p. 638; The Stearine Kaarsen Fabrik Gonda Co. v. Heintzmann, 17 C. B. N. S. 56. Each court is governed by the lex fori as to the admission of extraneous evidence. The fact that the French courts would admit the letters is no reason why this court should be bound to admit them. There is no ambiguity in the will so as to require any evidence to explain the ambiguity.

Neville, K.C., in reply.—It is immaterial whether the will is construed as a French will or as an English will. If it is construed as a French will the words the testatrix used would be sufficient to pass everything she had, including property over which she had only a power of appointment, and if the English law is to prevail the reference in the will to England brings the case directly within the decision in In re Price. There has been some misapprehension about the decision in In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts. All that Buckley, J., decided in that case was that as the will had to be construed according to French law section 27 of the Wills Act did not apply, as that was a canon of construction of the English law.

July 14.—KEKEWICH, J., read the following judgment: The main question arising on this summons can be concisely stated. A lady domiciled in France, on whom a power of appointment by will over personal property had been conferred by an English instrument, made a will constituting the defendant Miss St. John universal legatee, which referred neither to the property nor to the power, and was admitted to probate here only because it complied with the law of the domicil of the testatrix. Did this will operate as an exercise of the testamentary power of appointment? The precise question came before Buckley, J., in In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts, and he decided that a like power was not exercised by a like will. I am not sure that I have thoroughly and correctly grasped the reasoning of the learned judge, but his conclusion is perfectly plain, and I ought to follow it unless convinced that it is wrong. That conclusion is that a testamentary power can only be exercised by a will which conforms to English law, and that what is called the rule of construction depending on the 27th section of the Wills Act has no application to any instrument other than an English will—that is, does not apply to a will not executed according to the provisions of English law, notwithstanding that by reason of its having been made according to the law of the testator's domicil, or otherwise, it is admissible to probate here. Perhaps the phrase "rule of construction" is not a particularly happy one. The effect of section 27 is to provide that as regards English wills—that is, wills executed and attested according to the law of England—there is no longer any occasion to refer to a testamentary power, or to the property affected by that power, provided the will contains a general devise or bequest such as would pass the property if it were the testator's own; and the question, to state it again in a slightly different form, is whether this provision is applicable to wills not executed and attested according to English law. Buckley, J., decided that it is not applicable, and that decision governs the present case.

But it is said that there are other authorities deciding otherwise. First, reference is made to a case of D'Huart v. Harkness, 34 Beav. 324, which has been approved by Stirling, J., in In re Price, 48 W. R. 373, [1900] 1 Ch. 442. In that case Lord Romilly had to consider a power exercisable "by last will and testament in writing duly executed," for he held that the power had been exercised by a will of which, though unattested, probate had been granted in this country because made according to the law of the testator's domicil. But that will specifically gave the property in question, a sum of Consols, to the legatee claiming that the power had been exercised, and thus it appears that there was compliance with the English law apart from the provisions of the 27th section of the Wills Act, and that the question which I have to deal with did not arise. Again, it is said that the point was decided by myself in In re Harman, [1894] 3 Ch. 607. There is nothing in the report to indicate that the question now under consideration was there raised. It is extremely unlikely that, if the facts allowed of its being raised, it would have escaped notice, and probably they did not allow it; but it is sufficient to say that the point was not raised in argument or dealt with by the judgment. The only other authority requiring notice is the decision of Stirling, J., in In re Price. Needless to say, the judgment is replete with learning, and those who seek instruction on this subject generally, will find it there writ large; but he certainly did not decide, and, as I read his judgment, he did not express an opinion on the particular point now under consideration. In the will before him the testatrix had directed that it should be considered in England the same as in France, and the learned judge accepted this as an indication upon the face of the will that she wrote it with reference to the law of England as well as the law of France, and that therefore he was entitled to apply the rules of construction which would by English law be applied to a will expressed in the same terms, including the rule of construction introduced by section 27 of the Wills Act. His conclusion depends on this, and on this alone. As regards text-writers, there is nothing to add to Stirling, J.'s, quotation from Mr. Dicey; the profession is still waiting for a new edition of Mr. Westlake's book, and Mr. Foote in his valuable work, the most recent on this subject, quotes Buckley, J., as having decided the particular point (in In re D'Este's Settlement Trusts), as he certainly did, but without comment. Some reasons were urged why this lady's will should be accepted on special grounds as an exercise of the testamentary power. She disposes of all the movable and immovable property which should be found to belong to her "as well in France as in England," and it was urged that these words are equivalent to those which influenced Stirling, J.'s, decision in In re Price. They seem to me essentially different. There is no indication of any reference to English law, and all the testatrix intends is that her will shall be construed largely so as to include property wherever situate, and especially property situate in England. Then it is said that although the codicils were unattested, the will was executed in the presence of two witnesses who attested it in a form sufficient to comply with the English law, section 9 of the Wills Act. It may be so, but the gift to Miss St. John is by an unattested codicil, and her title must depend on that. My attention was called to expert evidence intended to show that French courts would place a construction on this testamentary disposition favourable to Miss St. John. Comments were made on this evidence and objections were raised to the admissibility of some parts of it. I pass by both comments and objections alike, because it seems to me that the question for decision is one of English law, and I take it that, whatever else it might decide, the French court would necessarily follow English authorities on a question of English law.

The short result is that although the power was exercisable by will, and the lady's testamentary disposition, notwithstanding non-compliance with the provisions of the Wills Act, has been treated as a will and admitted to probate, yet it is not a will which can be construed according to the rule contained in section 27 of the Wills Act, and that in default of application of that rule it does not operate as an exercise of the testamentary power conferred on the testatrix. There will be a declaration that the power of appointment was not validly exercised, and that the fund goes as in default of appointment. I have only given judgment in the first case, but it applies to the second case, and the declaration will be in the same terms.

HALSEY v. BRUCE.

Settled land—Leaseholds—Enfranchisement—Purchase of freehold reversion—Mortgage of settled land—Capital moneys—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 18, 21 (6).

The word "enfranchisement" in section 18 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is applicable to the conversion of leasehold land into freehold by the purchase of the freehold reversion.

Where, therefore, settled land consists of a leasehold term, the tenant for life (or in the case of an infant absolutely entitled, the trustees of the settlement) can, by virtue of section 18, raise money by mortgage of the settled leasehold land in order to purchase with the money so raised the freehold reversion under section 21, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1882.

Summons.

The testator E. Bruce by his will, made in 1893, gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for his infant daughter absolutely; and the trustees were given by the will full discretionary power to sell the same.

The residuary estate consisted of leasehold premises—a theatre and a shop and house adjoining it, and certain property seats in the theatre—held from the freeholder under a lease dated the 4th of September, 1883, for a term of eighty-five years from the 12th of August, 1882, at a ground-rent of £1,000 per annum.

The freeholder had made an offer to the trustees of the will to sell them the freehold reversion of the premises for £27,500. On the 17th of June, 1905, the trustees entered into a conditional contract with the freeholder to purchase the reversion subject to the approval of the court; and also made provisional arrangements with an insurance company, whereby the company agreed to advance the whole £27,500 upon mortgage of the premises.

The infant daughter being absolutely entitled to the leasehold property, the property was constituted settled land, and the infant was to be deemed tenant for life thereof, by virtue of section 59 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; and by section 60 of the same Act the trustees were the proper persons to exercise the powers of the tenant for life.

The present summons was taken out by the trustees to obtain the sanction of the court to the conditional contract by them to purchase the freehold reversion of the lease.

There was no capital money available for such purchase under section 21, sub-clause (vi.), of the Settled Land Act, 1882; but the trustees relied on section 18 of that Act, which enacted that, "where money is required for enfranchisement . . . the tenant for life may raise the same on mortgage of the settled land or of any part thereof. . . ."

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and T. K. Crossfield, for the trustees.—The purchase of the freehold reversion comes within the meaning of the word "enfranchisement" in section 18; the word is not confined to copyhold or customary land; it has been used by the Legislature as meaning the acquisition of the reversion of a leasehold in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 124), ss. 20, 35, 36, 37. In Murray's Dictionary "enfranchisement" is defined as "the action of making lands freehold"; see also Coke upon Littleton, 137 a, b, as to the meaning of the word.

Peterson, for the infant.—The word "enfranchisemen," as used in the Settled Land Act, 1882, and in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, has reference only to copyholds or customary freeholds: see Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 3, sub-section (ii.), s. 4, sub-section 7; Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 3, sub-section 2. It is used in its ordinary legal sense in section 18 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

W. L. Richards, for other parties interested.

June 29.—KEKEWICH, J.—This, so far as I know, is a new point, and it is obviously one of considerable importance, because, although this particular event is not perhaps likely to occur again, there are, nevertheless, likely to be many cases to which the construction which I propose to put upon it could be applied. The facts here are simple. The infant tenant for life is entitled to a lease of considerable length of a theatre which is held upon a ground-rent of £1,000 per annum—that is to say, that rent is payable to the owner of the fee; and there now occurs an opportunity of purchasing that rent and converting the leasehold into a freehold, and it is said that it would be of great advantage to the infant to make the purchase. How is it to be done? The estate is perfectly solvent, but there is no capital money available for the purchase, and £27,500 is required to purchase the reversion. Now, can that be done? It is important to see exactly what the question is which arises upon these facts. If capital money were available for the purchase, there is no doubt the court might properly sanction it, because the infant is to be deemed a tenant for life under section 59 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the trustees could therefore exercise his powers and apply capital money under section 21 (6) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, "in purchase of the reversion or freehold in fee of any part of the settled land being leasehold land held for years or life, or years determinable on life"; and here the settled land is leasehold, and there is a reversion in fee to be bought, and it is therefore within that section. So far there would be no difficulty at all, but the question then arises, can you raise money to effect the purchase?—that is to say, can the trustees be authorized to mortgage the settled land in order to raise the money to make the purchase, and there comes in a question for serious consideration. Now, it is well settled that it is the policy of the Settled Land Acts to allow settled property to be sold, and to enable a tenant for life, or those having the powers of a tenant for life, to convert the property into money, and that must be borne in mind in construing the Acts, so that the court is bound to give a wide interpretation to the words of the Acts in order to assist that policy; but that does not apply to cases where the object is not to sell settled land, but, on the contrary, to acquire settled land, and the settlement itself does not enable it to be done. In the latter case it is necessary to apply the ordinary rules of construction to those other parts of the Acts which would enable this to be done—that is, to those parts of the Act which enable capital moneys to be raised or to be invested, or to be otherwise applied in improvements, &c., and which have received, if not a narrower, at least a stricter construction than those parts which are concerned with the selling of land. Therefore one must take care not to give too liberal a construction to those parts of the Act by reason of any notion that the Legislature must have intended to make easy what is here desired to be done, and which, under certain cirumstances, is authorized to be done. The question then comes to this. Section 18 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, allows money to be raised for certain purposes. It says "where money is required for enfranchisement, or for equality of exchange or partition, the tenant for life may raise the same on mortgage of the settled land or any part thereof, by conveyance of the fee simple or other estate or interest the subject of the settlement . . . and the money raised shall be capital money arising under this Act." As to the word "required," I do not think that raises any difficulty. It does not indicate absolute necessity, but it seems to me to mean that if there is something which ought to be done, and there is no money in hand to do it, then the money is "required," and that, therefore, in such a case it should be authorized to be raised for the purpose of effecting that needful object. That, I think, is the meaning of "required." Then comes the question whether the particular transaction here proposed can be called "enfranchisement." Of course, it does not come under "exchange" or "partition." The only question then is, does it come under the term "enfranchisement," and this must be considered with reference to the rest of the Act. Now, under section 21 of the Act of 1882 you find that capital money arising under the Act may be applied (4) "in payment for equality of exchange or partition of settled land." There you have grouped together two of the objects which are recognized in section 18, for which money may be required. Where is the other object—viz., "enfranchisement"? Well, you get it in sub-section 5 in purchase of the seigniory of any part of the settled land being freehold land, and in purchase of the fee simple of any part of the settled land being copyhold or customary land." There is no doubt that is "enfranchisement," though the word is not used. There you have grouped together the cases where land is not held in common socage, and it seems to mean that where land is not held in common socage then you may apply the capital money in getting rid of the burdens between yourself and the fee simple, and convert your tenure into a fee simple. There is no question that that may be done, and there is no necessity to go into the authorities upon that. There is no question that, under sub-section 5, you can purchase the fee simple of copyhold or customary land, and that undoubtedly is enfranchisement. But is that necessarily all that is included in the word "enfranchisement"? Well, the next sub-section (6) says you may purchase "the reversion or freehold in fee of . . . leasehold land." Now, is the purchase of the reversion or freehold in fee of leaseholds also strictly "enfranchisement," for it has nothing to do with copyholds or customary land. Now, in no sub-section of section 21 is the word "enfranchisement" used, and although it is used in section 18, there is really nothing in the rest of the Act to assist me to determine what it actually means there. Can I extend its meaning so as to include the purchase of the reversions of leaseholds? With regard to the interpretation of the word by the Legislature, I have been referred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act of 1860, ss. 20, 35, 36, and 37, where the word "enfranchisement" is certainly used as referring to the purchase of the reversion of a leasehold. I will only read one of those sections, as they are all upon the same lines. I will take section 36, which authorizes the raising of "a sufficient sum for the purpose of purchasing the reversion of or otherwise enfranchising the property in such lease or grant." Now there the Legislature says plainly that one way of enfranchisement is purchasing the reversion; that is clearly recognized there by the Legislature. There may be other ways, but that is one way of enfranchisement. Then reference has been made to several dictionaries and also to Coke upon Littleton, which show that the word means "freedom, obtaining freedom," and that as applied to leaseholds it means freedom from rent or from services, and, of course, if applied to leaseholds at all, that is all it can mean, and it is very appropriately so applied to them; and one must not ignore the fact that although no Act has been passed for the "enfranchisement" of leaseholds it is a fact that their "enfranchisement" is a matter which concerns many people, and I have myself been concerned in many transactions to enable leaseholders to acquire their freeholds, and in all those cases the common term used has been the word "enfranchisement." Of course, it would be wrong to rely too much upon that, but it certainly is the common term used in speaking of the acquisition of the reversion of leaseholds, and in so getting rid of the rent and services, which, when they are got rid of, leave a man master of his own property. Now, having regard to that, I think that there is nothing in section 18 in any way restricting the word "enfranchisement" so as to make it refer only to copyholds, and although (5) of section 21 does not refer to them, yet (6) of section 21 distinctly contemplates the purchase of the reversion of leaseholds. It would therefore appear that it is not unlikely that it was intended by the Legislature that money might be raised under section 18 for that purpose. I think, therefore, that I ought not to hesitate to hold that the word "enfranchisement" is of larger application and is applicable to the case of the purchase of the reversion under section 21 (6). [His lordship therefore being of opinion that the transaction was for the benefit of the estate, sanctioned the proposed mortgage and contract].

Electric lighting—Land acquired for particular purpose—Part not required for that purpose—Application to another permanent purpose—Injunction—Electric Lighting Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 56), s. 10—Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c, 19), Schedule, clauses 2 and 8.

Where a local authority acquires land, whether compulsorily or by agreement, for a particular purpose, it cannot use any part of the land so acquired for another permanent purpose.

Action.

This was an action brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the trustees of the will of the Right Honourable Augusta Baroness Llanover, dated the 16th of August, 1889, to restrain the defendant council from erecting any building or works not required and intended for the purposes of or in connection with the defendant council's electric lighting undertaking, and from permanently using the land purchased by the council from the said trustees, or any part thereof, for any other purpose than that for which it was originally acquired.

In 1901 the council obtained a provisional order under the provisions of the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, from the Board of Trade for supplying electric light to the urban district of Pontypridd.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an indenture dated the 3rd of December, 1902, the council, under the powers conferred on them by the said order, purchased, not compulsorily but by agreement, a piece of land from the then trustees for the purpose of erecting thereon an electric generating station.

In April, 1903, the council applied to the Local Government Board for permission to use a portion of the said land for the purpose of erecting a refuse destructor to be used in connection with their electric generating station. In reply, the board informed them that it was not empowered to sanction the use of the land for a purpose other than that for which it was acquired. In August, 1903, the council applied to the trustees to accept a conveyance of the portion of the land on which it was proposed to erect the refuse destructor and to reconvey the same to the council; this the trustees refused to do.

Therefore, in December, 1903, the council conveyed the said portion of land to a Mr. Davies in consideration of £250, and took a reconveyance from him in consideration of a like sum of £250; no money, in fact, passed between them.

In January, 1904, the council proceeded to erect the refuse destructor on the said portion of land, and in April, 1904, this action was commenced to obtain an injunction.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said that under section 10 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, the council had the power of supplying electricity and nothing else. This section, read together with section 8 of the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, meant that the council's powers of acquisition are limited to the special purpose, and the words "dispose of" in section 8 meant to sell out and out. It was quite clear that the suggestion that a refuse destructor is really part of the generating station was an afterthought, and could not be supported in fact. There was nothing in the Act of 1899 to justify what the council has done, and it was ultrà vires.

WESTERN SUBURBAN AND NOTTING HILL PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY v. RUCKLIDGE. (a.)

Practice—Writ of summons—Defendant out of jurisdiction—Substituted service of same writ within jurisdiction—Ord. 6, rr. 1, 2.

The plaintiffs obtained an order giving them leave to issue a concurrent writ and to serve the same out of the jurisdiction on the defendant, and also to serve the same by sending a copy thereof through the post addressed to the defendant at five different addresses, three of these addresses being in England and two in Belgium.

Held, that this order was regular within ord. 6, rr. 1, 2.

Motion.

In the course of this action a writ was issued on the 7th of December, 1904, and on the 13th of March, 1905, the plaintiffs obtained an order for substituted service.

This order was discharged on the 11th of May upon the evidence of defendant's daughter that the defendant had gone out of the jurisdiction before the date of the issue of the writ.

On the 5th of June the plaintiffs obtained a further order, giving them leave to issue a concurrent writ and serve the same out of the jurisdiction upon the defendant, and also to serve the same by sending a copy thereof through the post addressed to the defendant at five different places, three of these being in England and two in Belgium.

The defendant now moved to discharge this order on the ground that, as it appeared by the writ that the defendant was out of the jurisdiction, no order could be made for service within it.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said that this case was similar to Ford v. Shephard. He was satisfied that the defendant was trying to avoid personal service. The right order had been made.

Motion refused.

LARNER v. LARNER. (a.)

Married woman—Husband and wife—Action of detinue by wife against husband—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 12, 17.

Under section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, an action of detinue by a married woman against her husband in respect of her personal property is maintainable.

Appeal from the deputy-judge of the Brompton County Court.

The action was brought by a married woman living apart from her husband, against her husband, to recover certain of her goods or their value.

The defendant took the objection that an action of detinue by a married woman against her husband does not lie, but the deputy-judge overruled the objection and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cox Sinclair, for the defendant.—This action will not lie. The right conferred on a wife to sue her husband by section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is confined to actions "for the protection and security of her personal property." Those words do not include questions of title or possession. The proper remedy was for the wife to have applied under section 17 of the Act to a judge of the High Court or to a county court judge, who may make such order with regard to the property as he thinks fit.

Symmons, for the plaintiff.—The action does lie; section 17 is merely an alternative remedy. An action for detinue is an action for the protection of property.

He referred to Bashall v. Bashall, Times, Nov. 21, 1884.

Cox Sinclair replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case it has been contended on behalf of the defendant that the action will not lie. The question turns on sections 12 and 17 of the Married Women's Property Act. Section 12 provides that "every woman, whether married before or after this Act, shall have in her own name against all persons whomsoever, including her husband, the same civil remedies . . . for the protection of her own separate property as if such property belonged to her as feme sole; but except as aforesaid no husband or wife shall be entitled to sue the other for a tort"; and by section 17, "in any question between husband and wife as to the title to or possession of property either party may apply to a judge of the High Court or of a county court, who may make such order with respect to the property in dispute as he thinks fit." It is argued for the defendant that the question in this case relates to the title to and possession of property, and that the plaintiff's remedy is therefore by an application under section 17. But in my opinion on the true construction of section 12 the action does lie. It is clear that the section contemplates some torts in respect of which a wife can sue her husband, provided protection and security of her property be concerned. The question is, what torts are covered by the section, and the difficulty which I have had, and to which there does not appear to be any answer, is that if an action will lie against a husband for damaging a chattel of the wife's, as it clearly would, there does not seem to be any reason why an action should not also lie if the husband is also wrongfully detaining the chattel. It is said that in the latter case a question of title is involved, and that the wife is therefore relegated to her remedy under section 17. It is not unimportant to observe that section 17 is an amendment of a similar section (section 9) in the Act of 1870, whereas section 12 is new; in my opinion the language of section 17, enabling a husband or wife to have a dispute determined as to the title to or possession of property is not sufficiently strong to to take away the right of action conferred by section 12. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree. I was inclined at one time to think that section 17 barred any proceedings by way of action in a case of this kind, or, to put it more accurately, that, section 12 being the enabling section, section 17 had the effect of limiting the scope of section 12; but I have come to the conclusion that this is not the right view. The Act of 1882 is not a complete code dealing with the rights and position of married women. It deals only with their property, and no doubt in the drafting of section 12 the main idea was that it was necessary to give a married woman the right to take proceedings with regard to her property, and therefore the words "protection and security" were inserted in the section. It would have made the section clearer if the word "recovery" had also been used, and it is the absence of that word that has given rise to the difficulty. But although I appreciate the objection based on that omission, I see a still greater objection, that if section 12 is limited quoad the husband it is also limited as regards third parties. Further, when one comes to section 17 one finds that the application which may be made under that section is limited to a dispute between husband and wife as to the title to or possession of property. There is further no power under that section to award damages for injury to or detention of the property. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the language of section 12 must be considered wide enough to include actions for the recovery of all kinds of personal property, including choses in action. I say nothing as to an action for the recovery of real property.

JELF, J.—I agree. For my part I have a much more decided view as to the effect of section 12 than has been expressed by the other members of the court. The Act of 1882 was intended to place a married woman in a very different position as regards her separate property from that which she had previously occupied. It having been enacted that a married woman should be capable of holding property as if she were a feme sole, it became necessary to give her remedies with regard to her separate property, and it was only logical to give her the same remedies for the protection of her property as are possessed by any other person. So far from reading the words "protection and security" in section 12 as being a limitation on the remedies of a married woman in respect of her property, I am clearly of opinion the section includes actions by a married woman to recover her property, and a great deal more. The first thing necessary for the protection of property is means to prevent it from being taken from the owner, or to get it back if it has been taken. The section enables a married woman to prosecute amongst others her husband for stealing her property (providing they are not at the time living together), and it certainly seems a strong thing to say that the same section which confers that right does not enable her to sue her husband in detinue. The provisions of section 17 seem to me intended to enable certain simple questions in dispute between husband and wife to be dealt with in a summary way. But the section is confined to questions of title and possession; it does not apply as between a wife and third parties, and there is no power to have the question submitted to a jury or to award damages. It seems to me quite impossible to say that that limited permissive right can in any way restrict or cut down the effect of section 12. Actions of this description have, I believe, since the passing of the Act frequently been brought by married women in their own names both against third persons and their husbands.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal.

STONE v. HOSKINS. (a.)

Probate—Mutual will—Fresh will.

A husband and wife entered into an "arrangement" to make wills in each other's favour, and did so. The wife predeceased her husband, and at her death it was found that she had, since the making of her will, made other wills unknown to her husband, which reduced the gifts originally made to him.

The Court held that the mutual will had not become irrevocable by death, for the testatrix had not stood by it, but had executed a later will, and the husband was not prejudiced, for he had notice from the death.

The testatrix, Emily Hoskins, died on the 3rd of March, 1904.

From the evidence it appeared that there had been an agreement, or as it was said, "an arrangement" that the testatrix and her husband should make mutual wills in favour of each other, and on the 21st of November, 1900, the testatrix made a will by which she left all her property to her husband with the exception of £50.

The testatrix, however, without the knowledge of her husband executed three other wills, on the 29th of June, 1901, the 24th of June, 1902, and the 1st of February, 1904, respectively, and each time reduced the gifts to the husband.

The executors of the last will claimed probate, and the husband, as defendant, propounded the will of the 21st of November, 1900, and set up the alleged agreement. He asked the court to pronounce against the plaintiffs' will and alternatively counterclaimed that if the same was admitted to probate the executors should be directed to hold the property of the testatrix in trust for the persons benefited under the earlier will. The substance of the case he set up was that the testatrix, without notice to him, had attempted to depart from the bargain which had been carried out by the mutual wills.

Barnard, for the defendant.—Neither party could alter his or her will without the consent of, or notice to, the other party.

Bankes, K.C., and R. H. Pritchard, for the plaintiffs.—An agreement to make a will is not an agreement not to revoke.

They cited Hobson v. Blackburn, 1 Add. 274; Walpole v. Orford, 3 Ves. 402, 418.

Rayden, for a beneficiary.

GORELL BARNES, P., in delivering a considered judgment, said there were no doubt mutual wills made in accordance with an arrangement. The testatrix, however, departed from that arrangement and afterwards died, but the husband did not hear of her departure until after her death. He now claims that in the event which happened, of my pronouncing for the will, the executors of it should hold the property passing under it on the trusts of the arrangement. The contention of the defendant is that there was this arrangement prior to the marriage and it has been carried out by the wills of 1900, and as he has not departed from the arrangement on his part, he ought to have a declaration that matters should still stand on the basis of the arrangement. On the other hand the point is made that the arrangement contemplated by its very nature a power to revoke it in certain circumstances—i.e., that it is not of the character of a settlement, and the fact that it was to be carried out by will indicates its revocability. Unless the deceased died standing by her will, so to speak, she could depart from the arrangement by her husband's consent or notice given to him. It is, I know, objected here that notice was not given. This brings me to the consideration of such authority as there is on the point. I am indebted to Mr. Royden for the reference to Hargreave's Juridical Arguments, vol. 2, p. 304, where that very learned lawyer in his elaborate opinion on Walpole's case—Walpole (Lord) v. Orford (Lord), 3 Ves. 402—sets out at much greater length than the report in 1 Dickens the judgment of Lord Camden in Dufour v. Pereira, 1 Dick. 419. The case before me has been discussed on the lines there indicated. There it is said as follows: "A mutual will is a revocable act. It may be revoked by joint consent clearly; by one only if he gives notice I can admit, but to affirm that the survivor (who has deluded his partner in this will upon the faith and persuasion that he would perform his part) may legally recall his contract either secretly during the joint lives or after at his pleasure, I cannot allow. . . . If not revoked during the joint lives by any open act, he that dies first dies with the promise of the survivor that the joint will shall stand. It is too late afterwards for the survivor to change his mind, because the first dier's will is then irrevocable, which would otherwise have been differently framed if that testator had been apprized of this dissent. . . . Though a will is always revocable, and the last must always be the testator's will, yet a man may so bind his assets by agreement that his will shall be a trustee for performance of his agreement. . . . These cases are common, and there is no difference between promising to make a will in such a form and making his will with a promise not to revoke it. This court does not set aside the will, but makes the devisee heir or executor trustee to perform the contract."

It appears to me that the result is tolerably plain. If these two people had made wills which were standing at the death of the first to die, and the survivor had taken a benefit by that death, the view is perfectly well founded that the survivor cannot depart from the arrangement on his part, because by the death of the other party the will of that party and the arrangement had become irrevocable; but that case is entirely different from the present, where the first person to die has not stood by the bargain and her "mutual" will has in consequence not become irrevocable. The only object of notice is to enable the other party to the bargain to alter his or her will also, but the survivor in the present case is not in any way prejudiced. He has notice as from the death. I cannot see that the cases cited support the proposition for which the defendant contends, with the result that he must, I think, fail to obtain the declaration which he seeks. I pronounce for the will of 1904.

HOARE v. TASKER & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debenture—Issue as security for loan—Payment off of loan—Debentures returned to company with blank transfers—Registered owner—Subsequent transfer to purchaser for value—Priorities.

A company duly issued a series of debentures, each of which was to rank pari passu with the others. Certain of these debentures were issued as collateral security for loans made to the company. On repayment of the loans these debentures were returned to the company with blank transfers, but they were not transferred to the company, and the original holders continued on the register as the owners of such debentures. Subsequently these debentures were transferred to holders for value by completing the blank transfers.

Held, that the transferees were not entitled to rank pari passu with those debenture-holders to whom debentures had been at once issued for their full nominal value. The effect of what was done was to pay off an incumbrance which, even if it could be kept alive, could not be set up by the company, the original mortgagor against subsequent incumbrancers, and the transferees were in no better position than the company.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (53 W. R. 247, [1905] 1 Ch. 283), affirmed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 53 W. R. 247, [1905] 1 Ch. 283), upon the further consideration of a debenture-holders' action.

The articles of the company and the conditions of the debentures are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below.

In 1899 the defendant company, having power to issue first mortgage debentures up to £35,000, part only of which had been issued, and being in want of money, borrowed money from two gentlemen named Ashby and Herbert, and issued to the lenders debentures to twice the amount of their respective loans. The company paid off parts of these loans from time to time, and upon each occasion received back from the lender debentures of twice the value of the money so paid, and also, by request of the company, a transfer of those debentures executed by the lender in blank except as to his own name. From time to time the company received applications for new debentures. Whenever such an application was received, the company, on payment of the amount secured by the debentures, handed the debentures to the applicant, together with the transfers in respect thereof, with the blanks filled in by the company. In other cases the company deposited the debentures as security with persons who had made advances, but without the transfers. All the holders of these debentures were set out in the second schedule, parts 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the master's certificate, and their claim to be debenture-holders was adjourned into court. The question was, whether the transaction above referred to was in effect a transfer of the debentures, or whether it was a new issue of debentures which had been discharged. The debentures as originally issued were secured by a trust deed, and it was provided by the conditions that all the debentures of the series should rank pari passu as a first charge on the property and undertaking of the company, and that the company should not be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge upon its undertaking in priority to or pari passu with those debentures. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff in the debenture-holders' action and of other debenture-holders specified in the first schedule to the certificate, as to whose rights there was no question, that the persons mentioned in the second schedule were not entitled to the benefits of the trust deed. Kekewich, J., said that the question was of some importance to those interested in the issue of debentures, and he thought it was a completely new question. The debentures specified in the second schedule might be perfectly good as against the company, but the question was whether they were entitled to rank pari passu with the debentures specified in the first schedule. His lordship came to the conclusion that when the repayment was made the debt was gone, and that when the company borrowed further money, whether by depositing the debentures as collateral securities or by issuing them in the ordinary way, they really issued new debentures. Consequently the only persons entitled to rank as holders of the issue of debentures for £35,000 were those mentioned in the first schedule. Some of the persons mentioned in the second schedule appealed.

Younger, K.C., and Peterson, for the appellants.—These debentures were issued as collateral security for a loan. The loan was paid off, but the payment off of the loan was not a payment off of the debentures, which remained in the names of the persons to whom they were issued as collateral security. An issue of debentures by way of collateral security is perfectly valid: In re Regent's Canal Ironworks Co., 24 W. R. 687, 3 Ch. D. 43. The other debenture-holders have no right to complain of the bargain between the company and the lender that the debentures shall be security for the loan, and they can have still less right to complain that when the debentures cease to be security on payment off of the loan the company obtains value for them in cash. On the payment off of the loan the company acquired an equity against the holder that he should deliver up the debentures without further payment, and it is really this equity which is now being set up by the respondents. But they are barred by condition 9, which provides that payment shall be made without regard to any equities between the company and any intermediate holder. This case is not covered by the decision in In re George Routledge & Sons, 53 W. R. 44, [1904] 2 Ch. 474. That case decided that on the company becoming the registered holder of a debenture issued by itself both the debt and the security were gone, and the only contract between the company and the transferee in that case was to give the transferee the particular bit of paper which was absolutely inoperative. The result was that the transferee got nothing, but Buckley, J., did say that if there is a contract that a person is to have a loan on the terms that the lender is to have a binding security and he does not get that which he has contracted to have, he has the right to be placed in the same position as if he had got it. Here the transferees advanced their money on the understanding that they were to have valid debentures issued to them, and this part of the judgment is, therefore, in favour of the appellants. The company here was never the registered holder of the debentures. They remained in the names of the original lenders as trustees for the company and were thus kept alive: Palmer on Debentures, p. 120; Adams v. Angel, 25 W. R. 139, 5 Ch. D. 634; Thorne v. Cann, [1895] A. C. 11, 43 W. R. Dig. 121; Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. v. Willoughby, 46 W. R. 589, [1898] A. C. 321.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the plaintiff.—What was done amounted to a re-issue of these debentures. Condition 2 of the debenture prevents the new issue of a debenture which has been paid off. In any case the company cannot set up these debentures against persons who are in the position of prior mortgagees.

Sheldon, for other debenture-holders in the first schedule, cited Robinson v. Montgomeryshire Brewery Co., [1896] 2 Ch. 841, at p. 849, 45 W. R. Dig. 25; and Mowatt v. Castle Steel and Ironworks Co., 34 Ch. D. 58, 35 W. R. Dig. 82.

Younger, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Kekewich, J., ought to be affirmed. The same point appears to have been already decided by Buckley, J., in In re George Routledge & Sons (Limited). I have read the judgments of Stirling, L.J., and of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., in the present case, and it is sufficient for me to say that the conclusion at which I have arrived is fortified by the reasoning contained in those judgments.

STIRLING, L.J., then read the following judgment: The question on this appeal is whether the holders of certain debentures forming part of an issue by the company of first mortgage debentures to the nominal amount of £35,000 are entitled to the benefit of such debentures as against the holders of the other debentures. The powers of the company, as defined by the articles, are as stated in the report in [1905] 1 Ch. 283. The debentures were for sums of £20, £50, or £100 each. Each of them contained covenants on the part of the company that the company would, on the 1st of April, 1946, or on such earlier date as the principal moneys thereby secured became payable in accordance with the conditions indorsed thereon, pay to the person named in the debenture, or other registered holders thereof, the sum named therein, and would, in the meantime, pay interest on such sum at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum by equal half-yearly payments on the 1st of April and the 1st of October in each year. Each debenture also contained a charge of such principal and interest on the undertaking of the company and all its property, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including uncalled capital. The material conditions indorsed on each debenture are fully stated in the report. It is sufficient to point out that by condition 3 the company was empowered (but was not under any obligation) at any time after the 1st of July, 1906, to redeem the debenture upon payment of the principal and interest secured, upon giving the registered holder six calendar months' notice of its intention so to do. A large number of these debentures were issued to holders who paid to the company the full nominal amounts purported to be thereby received, and as to these no question arises. The dispute relates to debentures given to two gentlemen named Ashby and Herbert by way of security for temporary loans of sums of £1,000 and £700. On the occasions of these advances debentures to the nominal amounts of double the respective advances—that is, £2,000 and £1,400 respectively—were given to the lenders; and it was stipulated that the company should be at liberty to pay off the advances in such sums of not less than £100, and that on each such payment the lender should give up to the company securities to the nominal amount of twice the sum paid off. The debentures so given were registered in the names of Messrs. Ashby and Herbert respectively. The company availed themselves of the right of repayment thus reserved, and on each occasion of repaying part of a loan took from Messrs. Ashby and Herbert blank transfers of debentures of twice the nominal amount of the money repaid. After a shorter or longer interval of time these transfers were filled up with the names of persons who paid to the company the full nominal value of the debentures, and the names of these transferees were placed on the register of debentures in the place of Ashby or Herbert, as the case might be. The question to be decided is whether these transferees are entitled to rank pari passu with those debenture-holders to whom debentures were at once issued for the full nominal value. It was not disputed that if no repayment had been made to Ashby and Herbert, and the debentures had remained in their hands, they would have been entitled to prove in the action and to receive dividends on the full amount of the debentures in their hands pari passu with the other debenture-holders until they received in full the principal and interest due to them. This right was established by the Court of Appeal in In re Regent's Canal Ironworks Co. It was there decided that a company may issue or deposit debentures by way of collateral security for money lent, and that the holders of other debentures of the same issue have no equity to prevent such a bargain from being carried into effect. That case, however, does not govern the present, because there the holders of the debentures were in substance (though not formally) the original holders for value, standing in the position of Ashby and Herbert in the present case, and not in the position of the transferees from them. It is settled law that a mortgagor who pays off an incumbrance created by himself on real estate cannot set it up against a subsequent incumbrancer: Otter v. Lord Vaux. Dealing with the case just cited, Lord Cranworth, L.C., states the rule thus (6 De G. M. & G., p. 643): "The case is to all intents and purposes that of a mortgagor liable to pay a sum of money to his first incumbrancer and getting a transfer; but that transfer is something which, on general principle, he cannot set up as against a creditor claiming by a title subsequent to that of the person whose charge he has so paid off; he pays it off for the benefit of the inheritance; and all persons who are entitled to any portion of the inheritance under him are also entitled to the benefit of his having liquidated a demand prior to their title." Lord Cranworth speaks of a creditor claiming by title subsequent to that of the person whose charge is paid off; but, on principle, I can see no distinction between the position of such a creditor and that of one who ranks pari passu with the incumbrances paid off. This being so, it seems to me that, even if the company could keep alive the debentures handed over by Ashby and Herbert when they were paid off, and has effectually done so—points which are of considerable, but perhaps not of insuperable, difficulty—still the company could not set up those debentures against the holders of the other debentures. Further, I think that the transferees who dealt with the company and not with Ashby or Herbert are in no better position. In the first place, it seems to me that, in the circumstances of this case, the transfers could only confer a legal title by way of assignment under the provisions of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873; and that title would be "subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee in case the Act had not been passed," and consequently subject to the equities of the other debenture-holders. It may be that the holders acquired a title by estoppel against the company; but this estoppel would not bind the other debenture-holders: see Mowatt v. Castle Steel and Ironworks Co. Again, condition 9, which provides that "the principal moneys and interest hereby secured will be paid without regard to any equities between the company and any intermediate holder," does not appear to meet the present case. That clause is indeed sufficient to prevent the company from availing itself of any equity to which it was entitled against an intermediate holder (see In re Blakeley Ordnance Co., 16 W. R. 188, 3 Ch. App. 154); but the equity here set up is not that of the company, but of the other debenture-holders, who, in my opinion, could only be excluded from setting up their equity by clear language, as, for example, by words expressly authorizing the company to reissue debentures which had been paid off. I was at one time impressed with the distinction sought to be drawn in argument between redemption under the conditions of the debentures and payment off by virtue of the stipulation contained in a collateral contract; but the rule stated in Otter v. Lord Vaux appears to me to be independent of any such considerations. It would apply, for example, when the payment off was the result of a bargain voluntarily entered into between mortgagor and mortgagee before the time for redemption of the mortgage had arrived. For these reasons I feel constrained to come to the conclusion that the appeal fails. I much regret the result, for it is not suggested that there has been any want of good faith in the transactions which have given rise to the question; and the present holders (who, as I understand, were ignorant of the facts) may well be excused if they failed to detect the possible infirmity of the title which they accepted.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., then read the following judgment: In the course of the arguments on this appeal many important and difficult questions have been raised. But, in the view which I take, it is not necessary for our decision that a positive answer should be given to all of these questions. I propose, therefore, to deal very briefly with several of them. It has been argued that a company which has once issued debentures to the full authorized amount may nevertheless reissue debentures which have been paid off, although there is no express power reserved so to do. As at present advised, I think a company cannot under such circumstances reissue. The reissue is in substance the creation of a fresh charge. The extinguishment of the old charge must enure to the benefit of the persons entitled to pari passu charges: Frazer v. Jones. But it suffices in the present case to say that the company did not profess to reissue, and that the appellants must succeed or fail as transferees of issued debentures. I will only add that in any case in which a company reissues debentures the claims of the revenue authorities will demand consideration. Again, it was argued that a company, by registering a transfer of a debenture, is estopped from denying its existence and validity. But this will not suffice for the appellants, for assuming, without deciding, that they have a good title by estoppel against the company, the respondents, who are registered holders of the admittedly valid debentures, are in no way estopped from disputing the validity of the debentures registered in the names of the appellants. Mowatt v. Castle Steel and Ironworks Co. is a clear authority against any such contention. It is necessary therefore to consider whether, as against the respondents, the appellants can establish a right to rank as transferees and holders of debentures of the first issue. Now it has not been, and it cannot be, disputed that the debentures in respect of which the appellants claim were issued to Herbert and Ashby, who were registered as holders, and for this purpose it is not material that they were issued as so-called "collateral security" for loans of lesser amount than the face value of the debentures. The debentures thus issued were redeemed by the company when the loans were paid off. The debentures themselves were handed back to the company together with transfers in blank. From that time Herbert and Ashby had nothing to do with, and had no interest in, the debentures. The appellants did not contract with Herbert or with Ashby. They entered into direct relation with the company, and after a considerable interval paid to the company the face value of the debentures. The blank transfers were filled up, and the appellants were entered on the register as holders. It seems to me that the redemption of the debentures by payment off of the loans must involve precisely the same consequences as if the debentures had been redeemed by payment off of the amount due on the debentures themselves. In either case the debentures were spent; nothing was due under or in respect of them. But it is argued that they were kept alive, though in a state of suspended animation, and were capable of transfer at the dates when they were transferred to the appellants. It is well established that, if a limited owner, such as a tenant for life, pays off a charge on the inheritance, there is a presumption that he does not make a present of it to the owners of the inheritance. So long as he lives, he is the person whose duty it is to keep down and whose right it is to receive the interest. But on his death his executors are entitled to a charge on the inheritance, with interest from his death. The charge extends beyond the life estate, and no question of merger or extinguishment arises. Lord Cranworth, in Morley v. Morley, 4 W. R. 75, 5 De G. M. & G. 620, states the principle very clearly thus: "The result of the long series of authorities, proceeding upon a very intelligible principle, I take to be this, that when an incumbrance is paid off by the person having a partial interest (that is, an interest less than the whole inheritance), unless there is something to show a contrary intention, the presumption is that he meant to do that which in law and in equity he might have done—namely, to keep it alive for his own interest, and that the omission was a mere oversight; in such a case the court will supply that omission by giving him, or causing the proper parties to give him, if necessary, an assignment or an instrument which shall put him in the same opinion as if he had obtained it for himself." The presumption is different where the party paying off the incumbrance is entitled to the inheritance—where he is absolutely entitled to the fee simple. The presumption in favour of extinguishment, where the incumbrance is paid off by the owner of the inheritance, does not arise or may be rebutted under certain circumstances. In Thorne v. Cann Lord Macnaghten says: "Nothing, I think, is better settled than this, that when the owner of an estate pays charges on the estate which he is not personally liable to pay, the question whether those charges are to be considered as extinguished or as kept alive for his benefit is simply a question of intention. You may find the intention in the deed, or you may find it in the circumstances attending the transaction, or you may presume an intention from considering whether it is or is not for his benefit that the charge should be kept on foot." The same principle is again laid down in The Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. (Limited) v. Willoughby. It will be observed that Lord Macnaghten carefully limits the doctrine of keeping alive to an owner who is not personally liable to pay; and, so far as I am aware, there is no authority for extending it to an owner who is simply paying off his own debt. It is not easy to see how it can be to his interest to keep alive his own debt, which he cannot set up against his own subsequent or pari passu incumbrancers. Nor is it easy to follow the argument that a debtor who has paid off his debt and thus satisfied his legal obligation can keep it, or the security for it, alive for his own purposes. The language of Lord Cranworth in Otter v. Lord Vaux seems to me to indicate that in his view this cannot be done. He says: "The case is, therefore, to all intents and purposes that of a mortgagor liable to pay a sum of money to his first incumbrancer, paying it and getting a transfer; but that transfer is something which, upon general principle, he cannot set up against a creditor claiming by a title subsequent to that of the person whose charge he has so paid off." This, too, was the view of Buckley, J., in the recent case of In re George Routledge & Sons (Limited), though possibly his observations may be regarded only as dicta. If, therefore, it were necessary for the decision of the present case, I should be prepared to hold that the company could not keep alive their debt when once paid off. But, assuming, contrary to my present view, that it is possible for an owner in fee to keep alive his own debt, I think it is clear that his intention must be unequivocally manifested at the time when the debt is paid off, and that the presumption of extinguishment cannot be rebutted by subsequent acts. In the present case there is no expressed intention at the time, and there is nothing which can be referred to as indicating intention at the time, unless it be the taking transfers in blank. But, in my opinion, that is not sufficient. An act of doubtful and equivocal import cannot rebut the legal presumption. Even a contemporaneous transfer of the charge to a trustee is not conclusive evidence against the presumption. The intention to keep alive must, in the language of Lord Langdale, not be "left as a matter of implication and inference," but must be "clearly and unequivocally expressed": Hood v. Phillips, 3 Beav. 513, 519. Nor can it be said that the company had any interest in keeping alive the debt and the security, for they could not in any way use it against their own incumbrancers. I think the debentures when redeemed must be considered as dead and gone for all purposes and as incapable of transfer. They were no longer part of the series, they were merely pieces of paper; and, that being so, the ninth condition, upon which so much reliance was placed by counsel for the appellants, has no application. The result is that the instant the debentures were redeemed by the company, the redemption inured for the benefit of all persons entitled to the pari passu charge. The appellants cannot be in any better position than the company through whom they claim. Their title is subsequent in date to that of the respondents, and there being no question of legal estate, priority of date is the governing element. For these reasons I think the judgment of Kekewich, J., was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CAVALIER AND ANOTHER v. POPE. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Notice to landlord of defective state of repair — Contract by landlord to repair—Injury to wife of tenant—Remedy of tenant—Remedy of wife.

A. lets a house to B. C., the wife of B., as agent of B., subsequently agrees with A. that B. would continue in occupation of the said premises on the condition that A. does the repairs, which are badly needed. A. does not repair, and C. is seriously injured owing to the defective condition of the kitchen floor.

Held (Mathew, L.J., dissenting), that C. had no cause of action; not on the contract because she was no party to it; not in tort because it could not be shown that A. owed any duty to her so as to make him liable for misfeasance.

Per Mathew, L.J., C. had a cause of action, on the ground that A. induced her to continue on the premises by a representation which proved to be untrue.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., sitting with a common jury.

The action was brought in respect of injuries sustained by Minnie Cavalier, wife of James Cavalier, owing to the defective condition of the floor of the kitchen in a house owned by William Pope, the defendant, and let to James Cavalier.

The husband sued to recover damages he had sustained by reason of the injuries inflicted upon his wife, and Minnie Cavalier, the wife, sued in her own name to recover damages for the injuries done to her.

The jury brought in a verdict of £25 in respect to the husband's claim, and £75 in respect to the wife's claim, and Phillimore, J., gave judgment accordingly.

The defendant Pope appealed in respect of the sum awarded to the wife on the ground that she had no cause of action.

For the purposes of the appeal the following findings of the jury were undisputed: That the appellant, through his agent, had notice before the accident that the kitchen floor was out of repair; that the appellant, through his agent, had promised before the accident to put the said floor in repair.

Lush, K.C. (Lilley with him), for the appellant.—The wife here has no cause of action, as she was not a party to the contract, and can only base her claim, if any, in tort. This is a case of misfeasance, and to establish her claim for negligence she must prove some breach of a duty owed by the landlord to her (Hayn v. Culliford, 27 W. R. 541, 4 C. P. D. 185) unless she can bring her case within one of the three exceptions—viz., (1) Invitation to enter upon the premises; (2) public nuisance—e.g., the ruinous condition of the house constituting a menace to passers-by; (3) things noxious in themselves—e.g., firearms: Scholes v. Brook, 63 L. T. R. 837, 39 W. R. Dig. 133. This case falls within none of those exceptions. Certainly she was not invited upon the premises by the landlord, because the control of the premises was in the hands of the tenant. [ROMER, L.J.—Could it not be said that she had a remedy against her husband, who in his turn had a remedy over against his landlord by reason of his contract.] No; because her cause of action, if any, would rest upon the tort of her husband—viz., in inviting a person on to his premises without warning her of a concealed danger, and for tort there would be no remedy over against another. You must find a duty towards the wife owed by the landlord, and there is no such duty. If A. does not owe a duty to B., that position cannot possibly be altered by the fact that under his contract A. owes a duty to C. That is the real position here. The learned judge below rested his judgment upon a dictum of Lopes, J., at p. 313, Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Co., 25 W. R. 877, 2 C. P. D. 311. That dictum has been overruled: Lane v. Cox, 45 W. R. 261, [1897] 1 Q. B. 415. The very point in this case arose in this court in Broggi v. Robins, 15 T. L. R. 224, but was expressly reserved for a future occasion, the decision going on a different question. The question has been fully answered in the recent case argued in this court, Earl v. Lubbock, [1905] 1 Q. B. 253—the only distinction being that there the injuries were caused by defective repair of a chattel, which could involve no distinction in principle. If the injury had happened to the tenant, apart from contract, he would have had no cause of action, on the maxim caveat emptor; how can the wife be in a better position?

He also referred to Lord Herschell's remarks in Caledonian Railway v. Mulholland, 46 W. R. 236, [1898] A. C. 216; Le Lievre v. Gould, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 1 Q. B. 491; Pretty v. Bickmore, 21 W. R. 733, L. R. 8 C. P. 401; Gwinnell v. Eamer, L. R. 10 C. P. 658; Payne v. Rogers, 2 H. Blackstone 350.

Wilshere (Lever with him), for the respondents.—The wife does not base her action upon contract, but upon tort, the contract only being pleaded as an inducement to go on the premises. She was injured whilst lawfully upon the premises, and has a right of action against somebody. The landlord had full knowledge of the circumstances (Heaven v. Pender, (1883) 11 Q. B. D., at p. 512), and by his contract to repair he alone had effective control of the premises; in fact the tenant had no authority to do the repairs. A house is analogous to a dangerous instrument: Le Lievre v. Gould. There is a clear distinction between Earl v. Lubbock and this case. In Earl v. Lubbock the defendant had no knowledge of the defective condition of the cart, and he did not invite the driver to use the cart. Miller v. Hancock, 41 W. R. 578, [1893] 2 Q. B. 180, is a decision in point where a stranger received damages from the landlord. [ROMER, L.J.—If you look at all the judgments you will see that they were based on the fact that the staircase, alleged to be defective, was not let to the tenants of the flats but remained always in the occupation and under the control of the landlord. It would be absurd to say here that the landlord had control or occupation. He does not invite and could not invite anybody into the house.] I submit a duty was upon somebody, and the landlord by his contract submitted to that duty.

He referred to George v. Skivington, (1869) L. R. 5 Ex. 1, and Tredway v. Machin, 20 T. L. R. 726.

Lush, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: In this case the defendant let an unfurnished house to the male plaintiff at a monthly rent of £2 16s. 8d. The terms were not reduced to writing, and there is no finding that anything was then said about repairs. Some time after the letting, and before the accident hereinafter mentioned, the defendant's agent, as the jury found, agreed with the female plaintiff, acting as agent for her husband, to repair the kitchen floor, which was in a defective condition. The consideration of this promise was the withdrawal by the male plaintiff of a threat to give up the tenancy. Some months later, and before the defendant had done any repairs, the female plaintiff met with an accident owing to a chair on which she was standing going through the floor. The claim as pleaded was by husband and wife for damages for breach of contract. Phillimore, J., gave judgment for the husband, apparently on the footing of the contract, for damages sustained by him by reason of the accident to his wife. He held that the wife could not recover as for a breach of contract, but that the defendant was nevertheless liable for damages sustained by her through the defective condition of the floor, which the defendant was under contract to repair. Against this judgment in favour of the wife the defendant appeals. The learned judge, as I have said, was clearly of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action on the contract made by the defendant with her husband through her agency. No doubt counsel for the respondents did seek to support the judgment in their favour by contesting the learned judge's view on this point, and they sought to apply the authorities as to misrepresentation on the sale of chattels of a dangerous character intended for the use of persons not parties to the contract: Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519, and George v. Skivington, L. R. 5 Ex. 1, were cited. But even assuming that the latter case can be supported, there is, I think, a broad distinction between the rights arising upon the sale of chattels intended for the use of third parties and those which arise out of the failure of a contractor to put premises known to be dilapidated in repair. In this latter case there is neither fraud, misrepresentation, nor warranty, nor the handing over possession of a thing known to be dangerous without warning. There is nothing but remissness in carrying out a contract. The defendant himself was not even aware that such a contract had been made, and there is no evidence that the agent made any misrepresentation or did not intend, if this were material, that what he promised should not be performed. I need, therefore, say no more upon this point than that I cordially concur in the learned judge's view; neither is it necessary to consider whether, even if she was entitled to claim the benefit of the contract, the damages which she claimed could be treated as flowing from the breach.

It remains to be considered whether her claim can be supported on any other ground. The learned judge has based his decision in her favour on the authority of those cases, of which Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Co., 2 C. P. D. 311, is a type, which establish that, where premises are in such a condition as to be dangerous to passers by and particular damage results to a person so passing, an action lies against the person who is charged with the duty of keeping the premises in repair. These cases rest on the principle that the person who has control of the premises is liable for the consequences of a nuisance, and though that person is primâ facie to be found in the occupier, he may rebut that presumption by showing that, in effect, the control has been passed to another person, who has contracted to be responsible for the repairs. Whether the ground on which the liability has been thus cast upon the person responsible for the repairs is, as suggested by Heath, J., in Payne v. Rogers, 2 H. Bl. 350, avoidance of circuity of action, or the broader ground that the liability should rest on the person who, in fact, has the control, the liability has never, in any decided case that I am aware of, been placed on any one who was not deemed to have control. In all these cases there was a duty arising, as Lord Esher, M.R., puts it, "from proximity": Lane v. Cox, [1897] 1 Q. B., at p. 417; Le Lievre v. Gould, [1893] 1 Q. B., at p. 491. They are, in fact, cases of nuisance adjoining places of passage or public highways. Can the analogy of these cases be applied where there is no public nuisance, but merely a defect in the interior of the house, and an injury resulting therefrom to a member of the tenant's family? I think not. To hold otherwise would be to ignore the principle which limits the liability of occupiers towards licensees and guests to what has been described as setting a trap. If the view adopted by Phillimore, J., were sound, it would only be necessary for such persons to prove that they had sustained damage from the dangerous condition of the premises and that the person they sued was liable to repair them. But this is certainly not the law. Therefore, even if the defendant had by the contract of demise taken upon himself the burden of keeping the premises in repair, I cannot see how his liability could be higher than that of an invitor, and inasmuch as the condition of the floor at the time of the accident was probably better known to the plaintiff than to the lessor, including his agent, the "trap" element is quite out of the case. But were his duties as high as those of an invitor? I think Lane v. Cox is a strong authority that they were not. There the landlord had let an unfurnished house in a dilapidated condition without making any contract to repair. It was held that he was not liable to a workman who sustained personal injuries through the defective condition of the staircase while moving furniture for the tenant at his request. "It has been held," says Lord Esher, M.R., [1897] 1 Q. B., at p. 417, "that there is no duty imposed on a landlord by his relation to his tenant not to let an unfurnished house in a dilapidated condition because the condition of the house is the subject of contract between them. If there is no duty in such a case to the tenant there cannot be a duty to a stranger. There was, therefore, no duty on the part of the tenant to the plaintiff and there could be no liability for negligence." The court followed the authority of a passage in the judgment in Robins v. Jones, 15 C. B. N. S., at p. 240, delivered by Erle, L.C.J., but prepared by Willes, J. (see p. 223). "A landlord who lets a house in a dangerous state is not liable to the tenants, customers, or guests for accidents happening during the term; for, fraud apart, there is no law against letting a tumble-down house." If no duty was created towards the plaintiff in Lane v. Cox by the letting of the house in a dilapidated condition, what difference could it have made if he had contracted with the tenant to keep it in repair? What higher rights could this fact have given the plaintiff?

I think these considerations suffice to determine this case, but even apart from them I think the plaintiff's case fails. The circumstances here are peculiar. There was no contract for repairs on the creation of the tenancy. It was not made till some time afterwards, and then it was not a contract to keep in repair, but to do certain specific repairs. I think the effect of this contract was not to put the landlord into the control of the premises so as to fix him with liability for a nuisance existing thereon. Suppose the contract to repair had been made by the tenant with an independent tradesman and not with the landlord, and that the tradesman had been remiss in beginning the work and the accident had happened, could he have been made responsible to the plaintiff? I should have thought clearly not. Why is the landlord in any worse position in the circumstances of this case? With all respect, therefore, to the learned judge, I think this appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant. I do not refer to the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, which was not mentioned in the argument.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree with the judgment just delivered by my lord, and only desire to add a few words. The plaintiff, Mrs. Cavalier, has no contract with the defendant on which she can sue. Nor does she complain of any breach by the defendant of any public duty on his part. To enable her to succeed, she must establish that her injury was caused by his neglect of some private duty he owed towards her in reference to the dilapidated condition of the flooring in the interior of the house. Now, I take it to be clear that if a person takes as tenant an unfurnished house, he cannot, in the absence (as here) of a warranty or other special circumstances, hold the landlord liable because of damage arising to him during and by reason of his occupancy as tenant through the house being out of repair or dilapidated. And if the tenant brings his wife with him to live in the house, she cannot be in a better position than her husband by reason of her occupancy of the house. It follows that in the present case the plaintiffs, during and by reason of their original occupancy of the house, could have had no cause of action against the defendant in respect of any injury arising to them from the house being out of repair or dilapidated. It remains to be considered what difference was made by the landlord coming to an agreement with the plaintiff Mr. Cavalier after the original occupancy that he (the landlord) would repair the premises. It appears to me that that agreement gave to Mr. Cavalier a right to sue for damages for breach of the agreement, but that it did not otherwise alter or affect any duty previously owing to him by the landlord. It could not be successfully contended that by reason of the agreement the landlord is to be taken to have invited the tenant, pending the repairs, or after the expiration of a reasonable time when such repairs ought to have been done under the agreement, to remain in occupancy of the house on the footing that as between them the house was to be taken as repaired. Nor can it be said, in my opinion, that the agreement to repair brought the landlord within that class of case where the owner or occupier of dangerous premises is held liable for inviting an unsuspecting guest or stranger to come upon the premises. And the same observations apply to the wife. The contract with the husband to repair could not create a special private duty on the part of the landlord to the wife which would have had no existence in the absence of that contract. The wife could not be said to remain in occupancy of the house on the footing that as between her and the landlord the repairs were to be taken as effected, or on the footing that she was an unsuspecting person invited by the landlord to come upon or remain in dangerous premises. If any invitation to her can be implied at all, it must be an invitation by her husband which she accepted knowing all the facts. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant as against the wife.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I regret to say that I am unable to agree with the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J. The case is not free from difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion that Mrs. Cavalier is entitled to a remedy at law for the injury she has sustained. For the defendant it was contended that the husband could not recover damages for the injuries occasioned to his wife. It was said that there was no contract which bound the defendant to pay any such damages. The contract with the plaintiff, it was argued, entitled him only to damages for his personal injuries, and his wife could recover nothing because the defendant made no contract with her. My brother Phillimore properly held that the claim of the wife did not arise out of any contract with her, but he gave judgment in her favour on the ground that she must be treated as a stranger injured by the defective condition of the premises, and he dealt with the case as analogous to that of a passer-by in the street injured by the fall of some portion of a ruinous building. I do not think the judgment can be supported on this ground, for the reason given by the Master of the Rolls. But I think there is another principle to which the plaintiff's wife can have recourse. There was no doubt that she was induced to occupy the premises with her husband by a representation which proved to be untrue—viz., that the defendant had resolved that the premises should be properly repaired within a reasonable time. That he never intended to make his representation good is shown from the fact that before and at the trial the defendant denied that any statement had been made about repairs which was binding upon him. It is true that a considerable time elapsed without complaint on the part of the plaintiffs. But I do not see how the defendant can avail himself of this fact to support his defence. He had greater forbearance and indulgence from his tenants than he could reasonably have expected. He could not say that the plaintiffs had so acted as to lead him to think that they had released him from the fulfilment of the representation which induced them to continue their tenancy. It was said that their remedy was to leave the premises, but, as the landlords of such property well know, it is not easy for humble people to change their residence. If a husband and wife had been induced to take a dwelling-house upon the representation by the lessor that the premises were, for instance, in good sanitary condition, and it turned out that they were not to the knowledge of the lessor, it could not be disputed that an action would lie on the ground of deceit at the suit of either husband or wife who had suffered from illness in consequence of the misrepresentation. I see no reason for saying that a representation, though prospective, may not be equally deceptive. It is true that the plaintiffs knew of the condition of the premises, but they did not willingly incur the risk to which they were exposed by the conduct of the landlord. With respect to the law of the case, I think there is authority for the position taken on behalf of the wife. Langridge v. Levy can be supported on the ground that the son for whom the gun was purchased was induced to use it on the faith of the promise to his father that he could do so in safety. It is said that this useful and just decision, as it seems to me, has been doubted, but it has never been overruled. It has been followed in George v. Skivington, and has been referred to without disapproval in many well-known cases—e.g., Peek v. Gurney, 22 W. R. 29, L. R. 6 H. L. 377; Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761; Barry v. Croskey, 1 Jo. & H. 117; and Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503.

Settled land — Tenant for life — Lease — Principal mansion-house — Consent of trustees — Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 53—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 10.

A tenant for life of settled land, in exercise of the powers conferred by the Settled Land Acts, granted a non-repairing lease of a messuage and lands, part of the settled estate, to his wife for a term of twenty-one years. The trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, assented to the grant of such lease, but did not express such assent either to the lessor or the lessee orally or otherwise.

Held, that the lease was good as against a remainder-man, and not made in contravention of section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882; and, further, assuming that the demised messuage was the principal mansion-house within the meaning of section 10 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, that a sufficient consent had been given by the trustees under that section.

Action.

This was an action by the plaintiff, Sir Walter Gilbey, for a declaration that a lease of Farthinghoe Lodge, in the county of Northampton, granted to the defendant by her husband, the late G. A. G. Rush, as tenant for life was invalid as against the plaintiff.

Under the will dated the 22nd of June, 1854, of the late G. W. Rush, the Farthinghoe Estate and the Elsenham Estate, in the county of Essex, were settled to the use of the said G. A. G. Rush during his life without impeachment of waste, remainder to his first and other sons in tail, remainder to W. B. Rush, during his life without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over.

In the year 1902 G. A. G. Rush was in possession of the settled estates as tenant for life under the said will, and being desirous of granting a lease of Farthinghoe Lodge to his wife, the defendant, for a term of twenty-one years under the Settled Land Acts, instructed Mr. Maxwell, the family estate agent, and Mr. Smythe, the son of the family solicitor to prepare and draw up such a lease. These gentlemen were the trustees of the will of the late G. W. Rush for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and both approved of the project. They did not, however, consider Farthinghoe Lodge to be the principal mansion-house within the meaning of the statute.

By a lease dated the 26th of September, 1902, G. A. G. Rush, as tenant for life, demised Farthinghoe Lodge to the defendant for a term of twenty-one years from the 29th of September, 1902, at a yearly rent of £140. The lessee covenanted to yield up the demised premises at the end of the said term in as good a state of repair as they were at date of the lease, fair wear and tear and damage by fire excepted. There was no further covenant by the lessee to repair. After the grant of the lease G. A. G. Rush continued to occupy Farthinghoe Lodge jointly with the defendant until his death.

G. A. G. Rush died on the 2nd of November, 1903, without issue.

At the date of the action the plaintiff was in possession of the settled estates as the assignee of the trustee in bankruptcy of W. B. Rush, the next tenant for life under the will.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Wace, for the plaintiff.—This lease is invalid as against the plaintiff. It was not granted for the good of the estate, but in order to provide for the defendant's wife. The lease is an improper one; the rent is sufficient, but there is no covenant by the lessee to repair. In exercising the power given him by the Act the life tenant is in a fiduciary position; here the lease is in fraud of the power and is bad: Duchess of Sutherland v. Duke of Sutherland, 42 W. R. 12, [1893] 3 Ch. 169. Further, this is a lease of the principal mansion, and the consent of the trustees has not been obtained within the meaning of section 10 of the Settled Land Act, 1890: Bateman v. Davis, 3 Maddock 98; Greenham v. Gibbeson, 10 Bing. 363; and Pease v. Courtenay, 53 W. R. 75, [1904] 2 Ch. 503.

Lawrence, K.C., and Pollock, for the defendant.—This is a proper lease and one that the tenant for life had power to grant. Elsenham Hall is the principal mansion-house within the meaning of section 10, and not Farthinghoe Lodge. In any case the consent of the trustees has been given to the lease; that they did not consider Farthinghoe Lodge the principal mansion-house is immaterial.

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said: In this case it falls to me to decide two questions, arising under the Settled Land Acts, which are of great interest and importance and of some novelty. Before I state them it is necessary, however, to go briefly into the facts in order to show how the questions arise.

In 1902 Mr. G. A. G. Rush was tenant for life in possession of certain lands settled by the will of Mr. G. W. Rush. He was not in actual possession of the greater part of it, which was let to the plaintiff, but he was in legal terms tenant for life in possession, and was in physical possession of Farthinghoe Lodge and lands occupied therewith. There was a power of leasing under the will of G. W. Rush for a term not exceeding twelve years, and also, of course, the power of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts. This latter power Mr. G. A. G. Rush was minded to exercise in order to give a lease to his wife, the present defendant, and she was anxious to have such lease. She knew the property before her marriage and was devoted to it. She had spent money on improving it and desired to remain there as long as the law allowed. Such lease as he had power to grant the husband was willing to grant and the wife was willing to accept. I do not myself see any impropriety in that. It was a natural desire on the part of the husband to provide for his wife. Of course the wife regarded the possibility of the husband's death, and he did in fact die soon after the grant of the lease; she had good reason for thinking that that event might be far distant, but, of course, she desired a lease which would be prolonged beyond her husband's life if he died early. The real question is whether the lease was one which a tenant for life had power to grant. Every precaution had been taken to ensure that the lease should be a good one and its terms had been carefully considered. I can see no impropriety in the scheme. Nor do I think that there has been any want of good faith or that anything has been done in contravention of section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. That section is, I think, explained so far as this case is concerned by the words of Romer, L.J., in The Duchess of Sutherland v. The Duke of Sutherland, where he says: "In my judgment these leases were not granted by the late duke in bonâ fide exercise of his leasing powers for the benefit of the settled estate, but were granted for the purpose of conferring, as they did confer, a benefit upon his wife, the plaintiff, at the expense or to the serious injury of those who were to come after him under the settlement in the enjoyment of the estate." What I understand the learned judge to say is that if the lease is granted at the expense or to the serious injury of those who come after, the lease must fail. I do not read the passage as meaning that the lease must not be for the benefit of the lessee. Every lease is presumably for the benefit of the lessee or he would not take it. It is the contrast between the benefit conferred on the lessee and the injury to those that come after which constitutes the offence that brings the case within section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. I have therefore to consider if the benefit on the defendant was so conferred at the expense or serious injury of those who come after her. The evidence is so strong against that view that it is impossible to hold that any injury has been done or intended to those that come after. It has been suggested that so long as this lease endures the house cannot be altered, repaired, &c., and that this constitutes an injury to the estate. In my opinion the answer is that any lease would do that. The law allows a life tenant to grant a lease of any property provided that if it is the principal mansion he obtains the consent of the trustees, and this of necessity postpones any alteration or repair. I cannot accept this suggested view, which is negatived by the Act itself. It seems to me, therefore, that a good lease has been granted if it can be brought within the terms of the Settled Land Acts.

It is only necessary to deal with section 10 of the Act of 1890. Apart from that question there is no difficulty at all. That section, however, contains a proviso whereby "the principal mansion-house on any settled land" cannot be sold, exchanged, or leased by the tenant for life without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court. I have to consider, then, whether this Farthinghoe Lodge would properly be considered "the principal mansion-house on any settled land." I am not prepared to say that there may not be more than one principal mansion-house on land settled by the same instrument. On large estates there may be several. Whether or not there is more than one must be a question to be tried in each case. Upon consideration of the evidence in this case I have come to the conclusion that Elsenham Hall, and not Farthinghoe Lodge, is the principal mansion-house on the settled land in question. If I were dealing with the Farthinghoe Estate alone I would have no hesitation in saying that Farthinghoe Lodge would be the principal mansion-house, but in considering the union of the two estates I have to determine whether Farthinghoe Lodge, as compared with Elsenham Hall, is the principal mansion-house within the meaning of the section, and I hold that it is not.

That being so, it is not necessary to determine the second question, as to whether there has been a consent by the trustees; but the question has been argued before me, and I think it only fair to the parties that I should express my opinion upon it.

Assuming, then, that Farthinghoe Lodge is the principal mansion within the section on this settled land, the consent of the trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts become necessary. What consent is necessary? In the first place the consent must be given at the time, it cannot be retroactive (Greenham v. Gibbeson); and secondly, it must be considered ad hoc with reference to the particular transaction, with full responsibility and with a full knowledge coming home to the trustees that they are the trustees for the purpose of the transaction in question. The Act contains no definition of the consent required. It certainly need not be in writing, and it seems to me that it need not be communicated either to the lessor or the lessee so long as it is given. Of course it must be the consent of both trustees honestly given, and the consent of one assented to by the other without consideration might be difficult to support. Let us see what happened in this case. Mr. Maxwell, the family estate agent, was concerned in the lease from beginning to end, and approved of it heartily as being for the benefit of all parties. Mr. Smythe, the son of the family solicitor, is in a position not far different, though somewhat weaker. He was not in his father's office when the lease was negotiated, but joined before it was granted, and all the papers passed through his hands. He entirely approved, and thought it a good thing to be done; but no consent was expressed orally or otherwise either to the husband or the wife. Why should not that be sufficient? Section 10 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, puts a fetter on the action of the life tenant. If the trustees assent, it seems to me that by that assent all that is required is obtained. But the trustees are required to give their consent to the lease of the principal mansion-house, and it was suggested with some force that as neither of them considered Farthinghoe Lodge to be the principal mansion-house they did not think that their consent was required, and therefore they could not be said to have consented to a lease of the principal mansion-house. This somewhat troubled me, but the answer seems to me to be this—they both consented to the lease of Farthinghoe Lodge, and so long as they did that their opinion as to whether or not it was the principal mansion-house is immaterial. I must take it, therefore, that the trustees gave their consent within the meaning of the Act. This disposes of all the questions before the court, and there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

DAVIES v. WILLS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Lunacy—Lunatic entitled to both real and personal estate—Estate duty payable for real estate out of personalty—Charge for next-of-kin—Surplus rents—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 9, sub-section 1.

A testatrix, by her will, gave all her real and personal estate to D., her sole executor, upon trust, in certain events which had taken place, for her brother, a lunatic. She died in 1896. D., as committee as well as executor, paid all the estate duty, for realty and personalty, out of personalty. The lunatic died in 1903 intestate. The lunatic's next-of-kin claimed that they were entitled to a charge on the real estate for the duty so paid out of the personalty, on the ground that during the lunatic's life, the income of the realty being more than enough for his support, the surplus rents had been accumulating and were quite enough to have satisfied the estate duty:

Held, on the assumption that a charge on the real in favour of the personal estate was created by such payment, which point the court refused to decide, the accumulation of rents ought to have borne the charge, which must be considered to have been discharged thereout; and therefore that the claim of the next-of-kin failed.

Petition.

This was a petition for the distribution of the real and personal estate of a Mr. A. J. B. Davies, a person of unsound mind.

He died on the 20th of February, 1903, intestate.

The petition was intituled in three actions for the administration of certain estates, in all of which the lunatic was entitled to participate.

The sister of the lunatic, Mrs. F. J. Hole, who died in December, 1896, and to whose estate he was absolutely entitled at her death, by her will appointed Canon S. E. Davies her sole executor and trustee, and devised and bequeathed to him all her real and personal estate upon certain trusts, under which the lunatic became entitled as aforesaid. Canon Davies was appointed committee of the estate of the lunatic, and on Mrs. Hole's death paid in respect of the real estate the estate duty due thereon, out of the personalty—namely, the sum of £816 15s. 9d. He never applied in lunacy for any directions about this payment or for a charge on the realty for the amount so paid.

It was shown that the income derived from the lunatic's estate was more than enough to provide for his maintenance, and accordingly there was an accumulation of the surplus rents and profits of the realty after so providing. These accumulations between the deaths of Mrs. Hole and the lunatic amounted to more than the said sum of £816 15s. 9d. The lunatic's next-of-kin accordingly presented this petition, asking, among other things, for a declaration that they were entitled to a charge upon the lunatic's real estate for the said sum.

No evidence was produced of the alleged practice in lunacy, that when ordering payment of the duty, a charge on the real estate was given. The only evidence produced was a master's order of February, 1900, in the estate of M. J. Grimshaw, and the circumstances of such order did not appear.

Jenkins, K.C., and Dickinson, for the petitioning next-of-kin, cited the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 6, sub-section 2, and s. 9, sub-section 1.

H. B. Vaisey, for Canon Davies.

FARWELL, J.—This is a point which I think it is proper for this court to decide, although I should have been better satisfied if I could have seen my way to sending it to the Court of Lunacy. I am certainly not deciding it from any desire to trench on their jurisdiction, but because I do not see my way clear to send it to them to decide for me. [His lordship referred to the facts set out above, and read section 6, sub-section 2, and section 9, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894.] I assume for the purpose of my judgment in this case that the duty which was so paid by Canon Davies became thereupon a charge upon the real estate. I do not desire to decide that point, because there may be a question whether that section means anything more than that there shall be a charge upon the estate for the benefit of the Crown or for the benefit of any person who may find the money to pay the duty, being a person other than the person accountable. Now in the present case if A. J. B. Davis had not been a person of unsound mind, it was absolutely immaterial how the duty was paid, whether out of his realty or personalty; but, inasmuch as he was of unsound mind and Canon Davies paid the duty, properly in my opinion, out of his personal estate, I have to decide what the effect of section 9 has been in view of subsequent events. The income of the lunatic was more than sufficient to maintain him, it was produced in very nearly moieties by the realty and personalty. It was enough to maintain him, and to leave a balance of rents, after deducting the maintenance rateably from the rents of the realty and personalty, not only sufficient to keep down the interest on this charge, but also, if that be proper, to discharge it altogether. Now, assuming section 9, to have created a charge, it was a charge vested in Canon Davies, who was the person in receipt of the rents and profits, and who was also the legal owner of the personal property. This matter has never come before the Court in Lunacy. Probably the committee would have applied originally, if he had thought fit, but it was not necessary for him to do so, because he did not require to apply to the court for the payment of the money; consequently he made the payment merely by virtue of his power as executor. The payment having been so made, it is the duty of the court to consider whether that payment has operated to alter the rights of the real and personal representatives of the lunatic as between themselves. In lunacy, the court always, so far as possible, subject to the paramount duty of seeing to the interests of the lunatic, avoids interfering with the rights of the personal representatives and the heir-at-law inter se. Now, in the events that have happened, what is fair between the parties? What will interfere least with the rights of the real and personal representatives? It is admitted by counsel, and I think rightly, that the interest on this charge must be kept down out of the rents of the real estate, and, if that be so, it must logically follow that Canon Davies, the person entitled to the charge, must be treated as mortgagee in possession for all purposes. That is the view of Lord St. Leonards in Lord Leitrim v. Enery, 6 Ir. Eq. Rep., pp. 357 and 365: "If there be a surplus of the rents of the real estate after providing for the lunatic's maintenance, the estate may be made to discharge its own burden by applying the surplus rents from time to time in discharge of the incumbrance; and if the rents have been accumulated, although they form part of the personal estate, they may be applied in paying it off." In my opinion, I am bound to regard the charge as having been paid off in the way there suggested by the Lord Chancellor. There is therefore no charge now existing in respect of the estate duty, and the claim of the petitioners fails.

In re MARVIN.
CRAWTER v. MARVIN. (a.)

Executor — Retainer — Judgment creditor — Judgment against executor—Administration decree.

A simple contract creditor obtained judgment de bonis testatoris against the executrix. The executrix did not plead plene administravit or her retainer. Subsequently a decree for administration was made.

Held, that the judgment was conclusive proof that the executrix had assets to satisfy it, and that in the administration action the executrix could not claim to retain a debt due to herself as against the judgment creditor.

Further consideration.

The defendant was the executrix of Richard Marvin, who died on the 30th of June, 1899.

In April, 1900, the plaintiff Elizabeth Crawter, a simple contract creditor, issued a summons for administration.

In May, 1900, the plaintiff issued a writ in the Queen's Bench Division, and on the 18th of May, 1900, she signed judgment under order 14 against the executrix for £5,000 and £7 costs, "to be levied of the goods and chattels which were of the said Richard Marvin, deceased, at the time of his death in the hands of the defendant as executrix to be administered, if she has so much thereof in her hands to be administered, and if she hath not so much thereof in her hands to be administered, then £7, being the costs aforesaid, to be levied out of the proper goods and chattels of the said defendant."

On the 28th of May, 1900, a decree for administration was made.

In December, 1900, the conduct of the action was given to certain simple contract creditors.

A question was raised on further consideration, as to whether the executrix could retain a simple contract debt of £4,821 as against the simple contract debt of the judgment creditor on which £4,519 was certified to be due for debt and costs.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The short point is whether the executrix can retain her debt as against the judgment creditor. Before the decree for administration was made the plaintiff obtained the ordinary common law judgment de bonis testatoris against the executrix for her debt. The executrix did not plead plene administravit or her retainer.

Now it is pointed out in Williams on Executors (8th ed.), p. 1986, that the difference in effect between a judgment de bonis testatoris and a judgment de bonis testatoris et si non de bonis propriis against an executor or administrator is not so great as it may appear at first sight, "for although the judgment is only de bonis testatoris, yet the executor, upon a deficiency of assets, must ultimately pay the debt, as well as costs recovered, out of his own pocket, because the judgment is in law a proof that he has assets to satisfy it." The early history of the law is fully dealt with in the notes to Wheatley v. Lane, 1 Wms. Saund. 216*a*, 219*b*. The nature and extent of the right of an executor or administrator to retain a debt due to him from the deceased is dealt with in Williams on Executors (8th ed.), p. 1043, and at p. 1970 it is stated that "it is held to be optional in the executor or administrator either to plead a retainer for such debt, or to give it in evidence under a plea of plene administravit.

If, however, the executor does not set up the retainer in one form or another, the judgment is conclusive proof that he has assets to satisfy it.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that in an administration action an executor cannot claim to retain his debt against a judgment creditor. The question, of course, only arises in case of an insufficiency of assets. The executor claims to retain the assets to satisfy his own debt, and says to the judgment creditor "There is not enough to pay you." In my opinion he cannot do this in face of a judgment which is conclusive between the two.

This principle was recognized in In re Hubback, 33 W. R. 666, 29 Ch. D. 934. In that case one of two executors claimed to retain against a balance order directing a call to be paid out of assets in their hands "to be administered in a due course of administration." It was held that this was not a judgment to pay a definite sum de bonis testatoris to which the executor could have pleaded plene administravit or set up the retainer, and therefore there was no admission of assets, and the right of retainer was not destroyed. In the present case there was a judgment for a definite sum against the executrix. She did not plead plene administravit or retainer, and it is now too late to do so.

OATES v. MOONEY. (a.)

Practice—Co-plaintiffs—Striking out one of co-plaintiffs—Stay of proceedings—Discretion of court.

A co-plaintiff who has compromised with the defendants has no absolute right to have his name struck out. In a proper case his name will be struck out and added as a defendant upon security being given for the costs of the defendants. On an application by two defendants to strike out the name of one of three co-plaintiffs on the ground that she had entered into a compromise with them, the order was refused by the court.

Attorney-General v. Cooper, 3 My. & Cr. 258, and Brown v. Sawer, 3 Beav. 598, followed.

Adjourned summons.

A testatrix, S. Mathews, by her will and codicil left the sum of £1,500 upon trust for the plaintiff Mrs. Oates for life and then for three of the testatrix's grandchildren absolutely.

In 1893 Mrs. Oates mortgaged her life interest in the fund to the City Assets Co. (Limited).

The form of mortgage contained a power for the mortgagees to take any proceedings they should think proper for the protection of the estate of the testatrix and to use the name of the mortgagor, if necessary, for that purpose.

In 1904 the City Assets Co. sub-mortgaged this security to the plaintiff H. J. Simpson, together with a policy on the life of Mrs. Oates.

In 1904 an action was commenced by Mrs. Oates, H. J. Simpson, who was also a mortgagee of the reversionary interest of H. R. Mumford, a grandson of the testatrix, in one-third of the fund, and Isabel Bateman, the mortgagee of the reversionary interest in another third, against Mooney and Lickorish, the trustees of the will, and a solicitor named Bellord. It was alleged that the firm of Lickorish & Bellord had acted as solicitors for the trustees and had received the sum of £1,500 for which they and the defendant Mooney were jointly and severally liable.

The defendant Lickorish became bankrupt in 1904 and did not appear.

Affidavits were filed by Bellord and Mrs. Oates, from which it appeared that in March, 1905, the defendant Bellord arranged with Mrs. Oates, who was over eighty years of age, to compromise the action on the terms of paying her an annuity of £30 a year during her life and £30 paid down in advance. This compromise was arranged without the knowledge of Mrs. Oates' mortgagee or of the solicitors to whom Mrs. Oates had given a retainer jointly with her co-plaintiffs. The solicitors for the co-plaintiffs had refused to recognize this compromise, and leave had been obtained to deliver interrogatories to the defendants in the names of all the co-plaintiffs.

This was a summons taken out in the action by the defendants Bellord and Mooney asking that proceedings might be stayed between the plaintiff Mrs. Oates and themselves, or in the alternative asking that the name of Mrs. Oates might be struck out from the record.

E. A. Nepean, for the summons, argued that a solicitor whose authority had been revoked could not continue the proceedings, and that this summons was the proper course to adopt for staying proceedings so far as Mrs. Oates was concerned.

W. Baker, for the co-plaintiffs, contended that this summons was incorrect. One co-plaintiff cannot retire from an action as of course. The application, too, was entirely bad on its merits in the circumstances, and moreover, Mrs. Oates being a necessary party, there was power to use her name by virtue of the clause on that behalf contained in the mortgage deed.

SWINFEN EADY, J., stated the above facts, and continued: The applicant's case is that he, a solicitor, went to Mrs. Oates behind the back of her solicitors and her mortgagee and, by promising her an annuity of £30 a year and £30 down, obtained from her some document accepting a compromise of the action. The plaintiffs oppose the application upon the ground that under the terms of the mortgage deed they have power to use the name of Mrs. Oates. I cannot decide this point on the summons, but it will be reserved to the hearing, and the defendant can then plead the compromise in his defence. But I cannot stay proceedings summarily.

In several cases it has been pointed out that it is not a matter of course to allow one of several co-plaintiffs to withdraw and have his name struck out. If co-plaintiffs disagree the general rule is that the name of one is struck out as plaintiff and added as defendant. But in Daniell's Chancery Practice, vol. 1, p. 224, of the 7th edition, it is stated that "an order to strike out the name of a co-plaintiff will not be made as a matter of course even on the terms of giving security for costs." In Attorney-General v. Cooper, 3 Myl. & Cr. 258, an information was filed at the instance of several relators, and on their application an order of course was obtained to amend by striking out the names of all the relators except one. The Six-Clerk conceiving such amendment to be irregular refused to enter it, and the Vice-Chancellor refused a special application to thus amend upon an undertaking to give security for the defendants' costs to the time of the application. In 1837 the matter came before the Lord Chancellor. He discussed the question whether there was any ground for the application that the names of some of the relators should be struck out, and said that they must shew "that justice will not be done or that the suit cannot be so conveniently prosecuted unless the alteration is made." He then examined the circumstances and refused the application. In Brown v. Sawer, 3 Beav. 598, it was decided that where there are two co-plaintiffs one cannot sever as of right. The Master of the Rolls there considered that "justice will not be done unless the alteration is made," and made the order prayed, on the terms of security being given for the costs of the original defendant. That practice would be followed in a proper case, but this summons is irregular and also fails upon its merits. The co-plaintiff here is a necessary party to the action and I cannot stay proceedings. I dismiss the summons with costs, but the applicant may amend his defence by pleading the compromise.

Summons.

Thomas Horatio Marshall, the plaintiff, upon his marriage with Lucy Martina Bree created a settlement dated the 29th of November, 1862, whereby certain lands, tenements, and hereditaments stood limited to the use of the plaintiff for life, with remainders to the use that if his wife Lucy Martina should survive him she might receive a jointure of £400 a year during her life, reducible to £200 a year in the event of her second marriage, and to further uses limiting powers of distress and entry for the purpose of enforcing payment of the said jointure, and subject and charged as aforesaid to the use of the trustees of the settlement for a term of 100 years to commence from the decease of the plaintiff upon the trust thereby declared to raise the sum of £5,000 for portions for the children of the marriage upon attaining the age of twenty-one years or marrying, and subject thereto and to the trusts of the term to the use of the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, for ever.

The question raised by this summons was whether the plaintiff was, under this settlement, a tenant for life or had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Lands Acts.

H. Johnston, for the plaintiff, argued that though perhaps not technically a tenant for life, because the remainder in fee was also limited to him after the intervening jointure and term for portions, the plaintiff had as a matter of fact the first life estate, and that the settled property did actually "stand for the time being limited to or in trust for persons by way of succession" in accordance with the definition of a settlement in the Settled Land Act, 1882, and thus came within the policy and scope of these Acts.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in delivering judgment, referred to the terms of the settlement, and continued as follows: It will be observed that the husband, who is the settlor, takes an estate for life, and also the remainder in fee, subject to the jointure and portions, and the question is whether there is a settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Act or whether there is an estate in fee simple in possession in the plaintiff, subject to the charge of jointure and portions. In considering this question I bear in mind what was said by Chitty, L.J., in delivering the judgment of Lindley, M.R., and himself in In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275, at p. 288: "The broad policy on which the Act is founded is laid down by the House of Lords in Lord Henry Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 40 W. R. 243, [1892] A. C. 356. The object is to render the land a marketable article, notwithstanding the settlement. Its main purpose is the welfare of the land itself, and of all interested therein, including the tenants, and not merely of the persons taking under the settlement. The Act of 1882 had a much wider scope than the Settled Estates Acts. The scheme adopted is to facilitate the striking off from the land of the fetters imposed by settlement; and this is accomplished by conferring on tenants for life in possession, and others considered to stand in a like relation to the land, large powers of dealing with the land by way of sale, exchange, lease, and otherwise, and by jealously guarding those powers from attempts to defeat them or to hamper their exercise. At the same time the rights of persons claiming under the settlement are carefully preserved in the case of a sale by shifting the settlement from the land to the purchase-money which has to be paid into court or into the hands of trustees. The Act of 1882 and the subsequent Acts ought, then, to be construed by the court with regard to these broad principles and in a spirit of wise and reasonable liberality." The question in that case was whether it was necessary for the jointress and younger children to join in the conveyance for the purpose of releasing their rights. The learned judge then proceeded to consider the provisions of sub-section 1 of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and said (at p. 290): "The right interpretation of the words 'stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession' is a critical point in this case. The words have no technical force. I see no sufficient reason for restricting their meaning. I think that, according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words, they include the case of a jointure and portions for younger children limited to arise on or after the death of a tenant for life, and the terms of years limited to trustees to secure them. The jointress and the portioners take an interest in the land, and they succeed to their interests in the land on or after the death of the tenant for life. I state this proposition generally, and without reference to the Acts imposing a duty on successions; but such Acts, if referred to, would support this proposition. It may be that conveyancers, when they employ the phrase that the lands stand limited to uses, often mention only the leading estates in the land—namely, the estates of freehold—and refer to jointures and portions as charges or incumbrances to which the freehold estates or some of them are subject. Such a mode of reciting title is often sufficient for the purpose which it is intended to serve. But it is quite correct in point of law to set out among the limitations to which the land stands limited the limitations in favour of the jointress and the portioners and the terms for securing them, and this is often done by conveyancers." That reasoning is directly applicable in the present case. The jointress and portioners will succeed to their interests upon the death of the tenant for life, and the trustees of the term to secure the portions will then become entitled in possession to the term of years thereby limited to them to commence from the decease of the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that under or by virtue of the settlement of the 29th of November, 1862, the lands in question or some estate or interest in them stand limited to or in trust for persons, by way of succession, within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and that under sub-section 5 the plaintiff is the tenant for life of those lands for the purposes of the Act. In my judgment, the doubt expressed in the last edition of Wolstenholme's Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts (8th ed., at p. 307), as to whether there is a "settlement" in such a case as the present, where the husband is the settlor, is not well founded. My decision leaves open the question, upon which Vaughan Williams, L.J., expressed a doubt in In re Mundy and Roper's Contract (at p. 298), whether the land will continue to stand limited by way of succession after the death of the tenant for life, and when the remainder shall have fallen into possession, subject to any terms previously created. My decision in the present case is in entire conformity with what was said by Farwell, J., in In re Phillimore, 52 W. R.

682, [1904] 2 Ch. 460. There Captain Phillimore, being the owner in fee of certain freeholds and absolutely entitled to certain leaseholds, declared trusts under which he made himself tenant for life, with trusts in remainder to pay certain annuities, and subject thereto for himself absolutely. That, said the learned judge, was obviously a settlement within the meaning of the Act.

Jenney v. Andrews, 6 Madd. 264, followed.

Action.

A settlement was executed on the 3rd of November, 1840, on the marriage of Haim Guedalla, by which a sum of £2,000 3½ per cent. bank annuities was settled upon certain trusts under which he, in the events which happened, became entitled to a general testamentary power of appointment over the fund.

On the 5th of September, 1892, Guedalla made his will, reciting the power and appointing the annuities to Edward Lee absolutely.

Lee was also appointed his sole executor.

On the 17th of August, 1900, a receiving order was made against Guedalla, and on the 1st of October, 1900, he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

The official receiver was the trustee in his bankruptcy.

Guedalla died on the 2nd of October, 1904, without having obtained his discharge.

At the time of his death he was indebted to various persons in sums amounting to about £170 incurred since the date of the receiving order, and not provable in the bankruptcy. The question arose whether Edward Lee, the executor, was entitled to receive from the trustees of the settlement the funds representing the bank annuities, or whether those funds ought to be transferred to the trustee in bankruptcy for administration by him as part of the bankrupt's estate, and were assets for payment of debts provable in the bankruptcy.

This action was brought by Lee against the trustee and against Wolfe Levy, representing the creditors whose debts were provable in the bankruptcy, claiming declarations that the plaintiff was entitled to receive the funds and administer them; that neither the trustee in bankruptcy nor any of the creditors whose debts were provable in the bankruptcy was or were entitled to prove in respect of such debts in the administration by the plaintiff of the estate of Guedalla; and that the appointed fund was assets out of which the plaintiff would be entitled to retain any sum claimable by him against the estate of the deceased.

Norton, K.C., and T. Ribton, for Lee.

R. J. Parker, for the defendants.

WARRINGTON, J. (after stating the facts).—The real question which I have to decide is whether, under the circumstances I have mentioned, this fund is one which is to be administered and dealt with in all respects as if it had been property vested in the trustee in bankruptcy. It is not contended that it did vest in the trustee, but it is said, applying the equitable doctrine relating to funds subject to powers of appointment which have been exercised by the donee, that the fund should be treated in all respects in a court of equity as if it had been the property of the donee, that if it had been the property of the donee it would have vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, and that being so, it must be administered and dealt with as if it had been so vested. That seems to me to be the real question. There is a subsidiary question, which is this: Whether, assuming the answer to what I consider the real question to be in the negative, then should the fund be distributed amongst the two classes of creditors pari passu?

Now, as I have said, I will consider the real question first. For that it is necessary to look at the provisions of the existing Bankruptcy Act of 1883. First, I think it is desirable to look at section 44, which provides what property shall be divisible amongst the creditors. Section 44 provides this: "The property of the bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors, and in this Act referred to as the property of the bankrupt, shall not comprise the following particulars"—which I need not read—"but it shall comprise the following particulars: (i.) All such property as may belong to or be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or may be acquired by or devolve upon him before his discharge; and (ii.) the capacity to exercise and to take proceedings for exercising all such powers in or over or in respect of property as might have been exercised by the bankrupt for his own benefit at the commencement of his bankruptcy or before his discharge. . . ." Now, that section, it will be observed, enumerates, not the classes of property which are vested in trustees, but the property of the bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors, and it plainly does not in terms include property over which the testator has a power, not for his own benefit, but a testamentary power which he may exercise in any way he pleases.

Now, the only section which it is necessary to refer to is section 9. That is the section which enacts what shall be the effect of a receiving order made under the Act: "On the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose."

Now, the first question is, What is the position of property over which a person has a testamentary power which he exercises? Is it to all intents and purposes his property, or does it only constitute assets which, subject to certain restrictions, are applicable by the executor, in due course of the administration of the estate, to the payment of such debts of the testator as his own property is not sufficient to pay? It is admitted that it does not go further than that. Now, to a certain extent there is a doubt, according to the doctrine of the court of equity, that funds under those circumstances are treated as the property of the donee of the power. For that reference has been made to the case of Lord Townshend v. Windham, (1750) 2 Ves. sen. 1, which is a very peculiar case; but I think in all cases in which those expressions have been used the judges who made use of them had nothing to consider except the relative position of the volunteers under the exercise of the testamentary power and the creditors of the testator. I think that is shown quite clearly in Lord Townshend v. Windham by the comparison which the Lord Chancellor (Lord Hardwicke) makes in that case between the position of creditors under the statute of Elizabeth and the position of creditors under the execution of such a power as the present; and when the Lord Chancellor in that case said that the fund must be treated as regards the creditors as if it had been the property of the testator, I think he meant nothing more than that the disposition which he had made by his will in favour of volunteers could not have effect given it in priority to the creditors any more than it could have that effect given to it with regard to property of his own. There is no authority which goes so far as to say that you must treat such a fund—to this extent the property of the debtor—so as to divide it amongst the creditors in a preceding bankruptcy. So far as any authority is concerned there is authority to the contrary. It is true that is under an old Bankruptcy Act, and it might be necessary carefully to analyze the distinction between the law of bankruptcy at the time of that decision and the law at the present time; but I do not think in this case any such analysis is required. The case I am referring to is Jenney v. Andrews, (1822) 6 Madd. 264, 23 R. R. 216. In that case the donee of the power had become bankrupt, and had obtained a certificate. Meanwhile, before his bankruptcy he had made his will and appointed the fund, as in the present case, and he died without having revoked his will. It was held that the fund was not available for payment of the creditors in the bankruptcy, and the Vice-Chancellor says: "Where there is a general power of appointment by will and an appointment is made, the appointee is a trustee for creditors, but it is not for creditors at the time of the execution of the will, but at the death of the testator. The certificate of the bankrupt deprives the assignees of all claim for the benefit of the creditors under the commission." Now, in the present case one does not have to go so far as that. I think it is enough to say that the property divisible amongst the creditors does not include this particular fund. If that is so, the trustee is not entitled to have this fund, and for that I think Jenney v. Andrews is also an authority. It is through the trustee in bankruptcy that the creditors in bankruptcy are entitled to a dividend on their debt. It seems to me, therefore, that on the true construction of the Bankruptcy Act, notwithstanding the doctrine of equity with regard to testamentary powers which have been exercised, it is impossible to bring this fund within the definition of property divisibl in the bankruptcy; and, further, that it is impossibl to say that this is property which, in equity, independent of the express statutory provisions which plainly would not apply, ought to be administered as if it had been property divisible amongst the creditors in bankruptcy.

Then there is the further question: Is this a fund which is divisible amongst all creditors pari passu, including those who were creditors in the bankruptcy? Now, there the question is rather a different one. I am assuming now, for the purpose of deciding this case, that the executor is the person on whom devolves, according to the ordinary doctrines of equity in this matter, the duty of distributing this fund amongst the creditors. Are the creditors in the bankruptcy creditors whom the executor is to include in making the distribution? I think not. The general effect of the provision of the Bankruptcy Act appears to me to be this—that it substitutes for the personal relief against a debtor which the creditor possesses certain rights given by the Act of resorting to his property and having that property divided amongst the creditors. In this case there has been no order of discharge. The debtor is, therefore, not actually released from his debt, but it seems to me, by the effect of section 9, that as from the receiving order, the order never having been discharged, and it having been followed by an order of adjudication, the creditors were deprived of their right of action. I do not see how it is possible for the creditors in the bankruptcy by any process whatever to get at the executor. It seems that the executor has nothing to do with the creditors in the bankruptcy who were entitled to have divided among themselves the assets divisible in the bankruptcy, and to have those assets divided amongst them to the exclusion of subsequent creditors. The creditors in the bankruptcy had to look to the trustee in bankruptcy and to the property which under the Bankruptcy Act was divisible, and have nothing to do with the executor or the property which is divisible by the executor in that capacity. In the view I take, therefore, I conceive that as to the fund in question, so far as creditors are concerned, the only creditors who can have any right to be paid out of it are the creditors who have become such subsequently to the bankruptcy, and who therefore have the executor to look to, and not the trustee in bankruptcy.

A further question was raised by Mr. Norton with regard to the right of the executor to retain; but if the only creditors to be paid are those whose debts have been incurred since the bankruptcy, the right of retainer becomes immaterial, inasmuch as the fund is solvent. I need say nothing about that, except perhaps that, so far as I form any opinion on the subject, I think the right of retainer would not have existed against such a fund.

to the defendants. The net rent accruing to the plaintiff after payment of rent to the superior landlord was £1,625 per annum. The plaintiff agreed to sell the defendants his reversion in consideration of a cash payment of £1,000 and the execution of a deed whereby the defendants covenanted to pay to the plaintiff £1,625 per annum to the end of the term. The defendants claimed to deduct income tax from the annual sum of £1,625 under section 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853.

Held, that the object of the transaction being to secure to the plaintiff to the end of the term the same net amount that he had previously received as rent, the payments were payments of an annuity or other annual payment within the meaning of section 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, and were not payments of a fixed amount by instalments, and therefore that the deduction had properly been made.

Action tried by Walton, J., without a jury, to determine whether certain annual payments were subject to deductions for income tax or not.

The plaintiff, Alfred Chadwick, was one of the lessees of certain premises near London Bridge, and he brought this action to recover from the Pearl Life Assurance Co. the sum of £50 5s. 9d. as the balance of money due to him from the defendants in pursuance of a deed of covenant dated the 6th of February, 1904. The particulars showed that the claim was in respect of certain annual sums payable to the plaintiff under that deed. The total amount of the sums so payable to the plaintiff as his individual share of the £1,625 hereafter mentioned was £1,038 4s. Of that amount the defendants had paid £987 18s. 3d., leaving the balance now sued for, and which represented deductions in respect of income tax from the periodical payments which the defendants were liable to make under the deed of covenant. The defendants, who had been sub-lessees of the property, had purchased from the plaintiff his interest in the leasehold reversion in the property in consideration of £1,000 and the execution of the deed of the 6th of February, 1904, whereby the defendants covenanted that until and including the 25th of December, 1912, they would pay the further sum of £1,625 per annum to the plaintiff in equal quarterly instalments.

Montague Lush, K.C. (T. T. Paine with him), for the plaintiff.—The question in this case is one of principle. The defendants contracted for the absolute purchase of the vendor's entire interest in a term of years for £1,000 down and the balance by deferred payments. The part of the purchase-money that was paid down in cash was admittedly capital; it would be impossible to say that one part of the consideration was capital and the other part income. There can be no doubt that these instalments ought to be treated as payments of capital by instalments, and therefore not subject to the deduction of tax. Lord Macnaghten in London County Council v. Attorney-General, 49 W. R. 686, [1901] A. C. 26, points out that "income tax means a tax on income and can mean nothing else." The question turns on the documents, which show that the consideration here in the assignment for the sale by the vendor of his interest in the property was partly £1,000 and partly something else. The covenants in the deed of covenant of even date make it quite clear that part of the consideration in the latter deed was the defendants' covenant to pay £1,625 to the plaintiff until 1912 by equal quarterly payments, as payments by instalment of the purchase sum.

Secretary of State for India v. Scoble, 51 W. R. 675, [1903] A. C. 299; Foley v. Fletcher, 3 H. & N. 769; and East Indian Railway Co. v. Secretary of State for India, (1904) 21 Times L. R. 3, 53 W. R. Dig. 70, were relied on.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Grimwood Mears, for the defendants.—The deductions were rightly made by the defendants, because these instalments were payments of "an annuity or other annual payment" within the meaning of section 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853. As no gross sum was here ascertained as the total amount which would have to be paid by the defendants, the present case is distinguishable from Scoble's case. The question depends here on the proper construction of the two contemporaneous deeds. When the two deeds are carefully looked at it is clear that the object of the arrangement was that for the whole term of the plaintiff's leasehold interest, which was sold outright, the plaintiff was to receive the same rent that he would have received had he not sold. The case comes within the very words of section 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which is the original section under which annuities and other annual payments were charged with duty. The defendants were obliged to make this deduction, the language of section 24, sub-section 3, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, being imperative on that point: see judgment of Lord Macnaghten in London County Council v. Attorney-General, [1901] A. C. 26, at p. 40. In Delage v. Nugget Polish Co., 92 L. T. 664, 53 W. R. Dig. 70, the plaintiff had sold a secret process for making blacking to the defendants on the terms that the defendants were to pay him an annual sum—fixed at 8 per cent.—of the gross receipts, and in that case Phillimore, J., held that the defendants were entitled to deduct income tax. The transaction here was a sale of the plaintiff's reversion upon the terms that he was to continue to receive his present income until the close of the year 1912. The net beneficial rent previously received by the plaintiff was the same sum of £1,625 subject to the tax. A covenant to pay £1,625 per annum free of income tax would have been void under the decision in Attorney-General v. Shield, (1858) 3 H. & N. 834, 28 L. J. Ex. 49, 7 W. R. Dig. 42. The offer was made upon the basis of the income previously obtained by the plaintiff, and the object of the transaction was to secure to the plaintiff the value of the reversion while he remained in the same position as regards income.

T. T. Paine replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 14.—WALTON, J., gave the following judgment, in which, after stating the facts as set out above, he said: This action was brought for the balance owing in respect of three instalments, the balance being £50 5s. 9d. which has been deducted by the defendants in respect of income tax. The question which I have to decide is whether the defendants were entitled to make such deductions. They contended that they were authorized and entitled to make the deductions by section 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853. That section is in these words: "Every person who shall be liable to the payment of any rent, or any yearly interest of money, or any annuity or other annual payment, either as a charge on any property, or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract . . . shall be entitled and is hereby authorized, on making such payment, to deduct and retain thereout the amount of the rate of duty which at the time when such payment becomes due shall be payable under this Act." I think those are the only words of the section which it is necessary for my present purpose to read. The defendants say that they are in the words and within the meaning of the Act, a "person liable to the payment of an annuity or annual payment"—that is to say, the £1,625—"as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of a contract." That is the deed of covenant which I have referred to. If this be so, then it seems to me clear that the defendants are entitled and authorized to make the deduction in question and therefore to succeed in their action. It does not appear to me necessary to consider the question whether they were bound to make the deduction under section 24, sub-section 3, of the Customs Act of 1888.

As to the general history and effect of the Income Tax Acts in their bearing upon annuities, it is sufficient for me to refer to the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in London County Council v. Attorney-General, 49 W. R. 686, [1901] A. C. 26, the part of the judgment to which I refer being at pp. 37 to 40. What I have to decide here is whether the annual payment of £1,625 payable under the deed to which I have referred is "an annuity or annual payment" within the meaning of the words which I have cited of section 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, and in considering this the general scheme of the transaction must be kept in mind. It must be admitted that there may be in the words of the Act, an annual payment payable as a personal debt, by virtue of a contract which is not an annuity or annual payment within section 40—e.g., where a debtor repaid a sum borrowed in fixed annual payments, or such cases as Foley v. Fletcher, 28 L. J. Ex. 100, 3 H. & N. 769, and Secretary of State for India v. Scoble, 51 W. R. 675, [1903] A. C. 299. In the present case the agreement in substance was that the defendant company, in consideration of the assignment to them of a certain leasehold interest in an unexpired residue of a term ending on the 25th of December, 1912, would pay to the assignors a fixed amount of £1,000 and make to them an annual payment of £1,625 by equal quarterly payments until the expiration of the term. The £1,625 was the net rent which the assignors at the date of the assignment were receiving under certain sub-leases which they had made of the leasehold premises. It is said that the annual payments of £1,625 are really in substance instalments of the price or of part of the price payable for the leasehold interest sold. I asked counsel for the plaintiff in the course of the argument what was the gross amount payable, but I received no satisfactory answer. It is plain to me that no estimate of any gross amount was involved in the contract between the parties. What the vendors bargained for was that they should continue to receive until the end of the term the same amount of income which they were receiving from the property at the date of the assignment, and should be paid in addition to this, a lump sum of £1,000. In my judgment the annual payments of £1,625 were not paid as instalments of a debt, but were amounts payable and receivable as income, just as an annuity is what is payable for a certain number of years under a covenant or contract made in consideration of a sum of money paid by the annuitant as the price of the annuity. It seems to me to make no difference whether the contract to make the annual payments is entered into in consideration of money paid or in consideration of property assigned.

For these reasons I think that the present case is not within the cases quoted by Mr. Montague Lush, but comes within section 40 and is similar to the case of Delage v. Nugget Polish Co., 21 Times L. R. 454, 92 L. T. 682. Therefore there will be judgment for the defendants with costs.

REX v. HANKEY AND OTHERS (JUSTICES). (a.)

Motor-car — Refusal by owner of driver's name and address—Conviction—Omission of averment that driver committed an offence—Motor-car Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. 36), ss. 1, 60—Motor-cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, Art. IV. (6).

A conviction of an owner of a motor-car under section 1, sub-section 3, of the Motor-car Act, 1903, stated that the defendant "being . . . the owner of a certain motor-car . . . which was then being driven upon the highway . . . did unlawfully . . . after due notice had been given to him, refuse to give the name and address of the person who was then and there driving the same, such name and address being required in order that proceedings might be taken against him under section 1 of the Motor-car Act, 1903, and Art. IV. (6) of the Motor-cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904."

Held, that the conviction was bad, in that it did not sufficiently allege that the driver had committed an offence under the section.

Held, also, that it was not a condition precedent to the duty cast upon the owner of a motor-car by section 1 (3) to furnish the name and address of the driver of the car, that the driver should previously have been asked for and should have refused to give his name and address.

This was a rule nisi obtained by the Earl of Craven for a certiorari to quash a conviction against him by the justices of Wokingham, Berks, for that being on the 2nd of July, 1904, the owner of a certain motor-car, No. A.C. 143, which was then being driven upon the highway at Twyford, Berks, he did unlawfully on the 4th of August, after due notice had been given him, refuse to give the name and address of the person who was then and there driving the same, such name and address being required in order that proceedings might be taken against him under section 1 of the Motor-car Act, 1903, and article 4 (6) of the Motor-cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904.

The grounds upon which the rule nisi was obtained were: (1) That the conviction was bad on the face of it because it did not allege that the driver had committed an offence under section 1 of the Act, and did not allege that the driver had refused to give his name or address or had given a false name or address; (2) that the justices had no jurisdiction to convict in the absence of evidence to the above effect.

Section 1 (3) of the Motor-car Act, 1903, is as follows: "If the driver of any car who commits an offence under this section refuses to give his name and address, or gives a false name and address, he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act, and it shall be the duty of the owner of the car, if required, to give any information which it is within his power to give, and which may lead to the identification and apprehension of the driver, and if the owner fails to do so he also shall be guilty of an offence under this Act."

Article 4 of the Motor-cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, contains the following provisions: Every person driving or in charge of a motor-car when used on any highway shall comply with the regulations hereinafter set forth—namely, (6) He [the driver] shall, on the request of any police-constable in uniform, or of any person having charge of a horse, or if any such constable or person shall put up his hand as a signal for that purpose, cause the motor-car to stop and to remain stationary so long as may be reasonably necessary.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cecil Walsh showed cause against the rule.—It is not necessary under section 1, sub-section 3, of the Motor-car Act, 1903, that the driver should have been asked for and should have refused to give his name or address before the owner can be convicted. Such a construction would defeat the whole object of the latter part of the section, which was framed to meet the difficulty in the case of drivers who did not stop so that their name and address could be taken by giving a remedy against the owner. It is not enough for the police to know in such a case the registered number of the car, for this would not help if the owner persisted in refusing to give the driver's name and address. Moreover, the owner of the car here has adopted the wrong remedy. He ought to have appealed to quarter sessions as a person adjudged to pay a fine exceeding twenty shillings under section 11 (2) of the Act. This rule should therefore be discharged.

Avory, K.C., and Moresby White (G. H. Condy with them), in support of the rule.—Certiorari is the absolute right of a party aggrieved by a wrongful conviction. Here the conviction is bad on its face because the defence alleged is insufficiently described; moreover, it couples the offence alleged under section 1 (3) of the Act with that alleged under art. 4, r. 6. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The rule is that a conviction must be as precise as an indictment: Smith v. Moody, 51 W. R. 252, [1903] 1 K. B. 56, per Channell, J., at p. 63.] The mere fact that the police state they want to take proceedings against a driver is no evidence that he has committed an offence. It is submitted that on the true construction of section 1 (3) of the Act an owner is not bound to give the driver's name and address unless and until the driver has been asked for them and has refused them.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It is with considerable reluctance I find myself driven to the conclusion that this conviction cannot be supported. But there is an established rule of many years' standing upon which we feel ourselves constrained to act, and driven to act now, which is that where a conviction contains matters of uncertainty it is bad. In this case the offence charged was that the owner of a motor-car did not give to the police certain information in his power; and the main point taken in opposition to this charge was that the obligation of the owner to give information as to his driver's name and address did not arise until the driver of the car had himself refused these particulars. I do not, however, construe section 1 (3) in that way. Possibly the language of the section ought to be different, but the words which create the offence on the part of the driver are these: "If the driver of any car who commits an offence under this section refuses to give his name and address or gives a false name or address he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act." So far, therefore, the offence is that of the driver and is complete in itself; but then the section goes on to create a different offence on the part of a different person: "And it shall be the duty of the owner of the car, if required, to give any information which is within his power to give, and which may lead to the identification and apprehension of the driver, and if the owner fails to do so he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act." It seems to me that to say that the obligation on the part of the owner to give information is only to arise where the driver has refused his name and address would be to make the section meaningless and reduce its usefulness to nothing so far as obtaining information is concerned, for it would give the go-by to the case of a driver speeding away as quickly as possible and giving no one an opportunity of ascertaining his name and address. I am therefore of opinion that we should decide this point against Mr. Avory.

The next point, however, is of greater difficulty. It is alleged in the conviction that the owner unlawfully after due notice refused to give the name and address of the driver, "such name and address being required in order that proceedings might be taken against him under section 1 of the Act and article 4 of the order." I am by no means sure that there is not some objection to that conviction on the ground of two offences being coupled together. The word is not "or" but "and" which couples the sentence stating that proceedings might be taken against the owner under section 1 of the Act and article 4 of the order. I am not clear that an owner is bound to give his driver's name and address in a prosecution under article 4. These are two different offences. If that had stood alone I do not know that I should have thought that the conviction was open to serious objection. But the main question arises upon the words "in order that proceedings might be taken against him under section 1." I think that this is very nearly a good allegation, having regard to the words of sub-section 3, but yet it is open to the view that it does not allege in terms that any offence has been committed by the driver; it is ambiguous in this, that it may mean that the driver's name might be wanted, so that the police might consider whether they would or would not institute proceedings against him. Bearing in mind the doctrine that a conviction must have the certainty of an indictment, I think that it is safer to hold that this conviction does not allege in sufficiently clear terms what offence had been committed by the driver.

The rule must therefore be made absolute to quash the conviction.

SMITH v. COLES. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Employment in agriculture—Agricultural work—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 22), s. 1, sub-sections 1 and 3.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1897 and 1900, it appeared that the applicant was a carpenter, that he was employed on a farm as the farm carpenter, that he acted as gamekeeper for three months in the year, and that he helped in such work as harvesting, rick-making, and carting.

Held, that there was evidence which justified the county court judge in finding that the applicant was employed in agriculture within the meaning of the Act of 1900.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Salisbury

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1897 and 1900.

The applicant for compensation was Samuel Smith, who was accidentally injured on a farm where he was employed as a carpenter, gamekeeper, and in other ways.

The question was whether his employment came within the meaning of the expression "the employment of workmen in agriculture" in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900.

The evidence was as follows:

The applicant was forty-five years of age, and had been taught carpentering by his father, with whom he worked for twenty-five years. He had been in the service of his employer, Mr. Coles, for four years and a-half before the accident, as farm carpenter and keeper. He had a carpenter's shop on the farm, where he worked alone. He did not mend gates, that work being done by the estate carpenter. He acted as keeper for three months in each year, and during that time he went out every day and trapped vermin. He worked at putting up wire netting when and where necessary. He also helped in carting work. He lent a hand at hay harvest and corn harvest, but he never went out ploughing. His regular wages were 22s. a week. He was paid for overtime at carpentering, and he also got extra pay when he acted as keeper.

On the 8th of November, 1904, after he had been carpentering all the morning, he received orders from Mr. Allen Coles, his employer's son, to do some repairs to the fence of an enclosure. On his way across some fields to the enclosure and also on his way back he was accompanied by Mr. Allen Coles, who carried a gun with him and shot rabbits. They had reached the farmyard, and the applicant was walking to the carpenter's shop, when he was accidentally injured in the leg by a charge of shot from Mr. Allen Coles's gun. The applicant went to the hospital, and subsequently gangrene set in and the leg had to be amputated. The employer paid the applicant a weekly sum for several weeks, but then ceased to make any further payment.

The main contention on the part of the employer before the county court judge was that the applicant's employment was not an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900, applied.

The material provisions of the Act are as follows: Section 1, sub-section 1, "From and after the commencement of this Act, the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply to the employment of workmen in agriculture by any employer who habitually employs one or more workmen in such employment." Sub-section 3: "Where any workman is employed by the same employer mainly in agricultural but partly or occasionally in other work, this Act shall apply also to the employment of the workman in such other work. The expression 'agriculture' includes horticulture, forestry, and the use of land for any purpose of husbandry, inclusive of the keeping or breeding of live stock, poultry, or bees, and the growth of fruit and vegetables."

The county court judge held that the applicant was engaged in agricultural employment, and therefore his employment was one to which the Act applied, and he made an award of compensation.

The employer appealed.

Robert Wallace, K.C., and Macgillivray, for the employer.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900, only applies to agricultural labourers. The applicant is not an agricultural labourer, but a carpenter. The Act of 1897 applied to employment in a particular place, viz., a railway, a factory, a mine, a quarry, an engineering work, or a building. In the Act of 1900 there is no reference to any place at all. It extends the application of the original Act to the employment of workmen in agriculture. The point to be considered is not the place where the work is done, but the kind of work. A large farm may require the employment of carpenters, stonemasons, and blacksmiths. But the men engaged in these ancillary mechanical trades, though they are employed by an agriculturist, are not employed in agricultural work, and are therefore not within the Act.

C. E. Dyer (T. H. Walker with him), for the applicant.—The Act applies to all agricultural work. Agricultural work includes all work which is necessary for properly carrying on a farm. It is indispensable to the good management of a farm that the fences and hedges should be kept in good order. A farm carpenter is therefore within the Act. The definition of "agriculture" in sub-section 3 shows that the Act is not limited in its application to mere agricultural labourers. Further, the applicant has done a great deal of purely agricultural work. He seems to have done every kind of agricultural work except that of ploughing.

Robert Wallace, K.C., in reply.—The definition of "agriculture" indicates an intention that the Act should apply to work on things that grow. A hedger has to do with things that grow, and therefore he may be within the Act. But a man who makes or repairs fences does not work on things that grow. He is no more within the Act than a man who builds or repairs outhouses, or a blacksmith in a shop on the homestead, or a clerk in the farm office.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by an employer from an award of compensation in favour of a workman. The question is whether the employment in which the applicant was engaged comes within the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1900, which enacts as follows: "From and after the commencement of this Act, the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply to the employment of workmen in agriculture by any employer who habitually employs one or more workmen in such employment." The applicant has admittedly suffered personal injury by accident, and the only question is whether he was employed in agriculture, so that if all the other conditions enabling him to claim compensation are fulfilled, he comes within the terms of this Act of 1900. He actually received the injury at a time when he was apparently not engaged in any agricultural employment whatever. It seems that he was in company with the son of the owner of the farm on which he was employed, who was carrying a gun and shooting rabbits. The applicant himself had been doing some fencing work, and was on his way back to the farm when the young man with whom he was, accidentally let his gun go off and injured the applicant in the leg. No question now arises as to whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the applicant's employment. No such point was taken at the hearing of the arbitration, and the case is not now before us on that point.

The only point we have to consider is whether the county court judge, who held that the applicant was employed in agriculture, could have arrived at that conclusion without misdirecting himself on a point of law. It is contended on the part of the employer that the applicant is a skilled artizan, a carpenter, and does not come within the expression "the employment of workmen in agriculture." It is necessary to read some further provisions of the Act. Sub-section 3 of section 1 is as follows: "Where any workman is employed by the same employer mainly in agricultural but partly or occasionally in other work, this Act shall apply also to the employment of the workman in such other work." Then follows an important factor—viz., the definition of agriculture: "The expression 'agriculture' includes horticulture, forestry, and the use of land for any purpose of husbandry, inclusive of the keeping or breeding of live stock, poultry, or bees, and the growth of fruit or vegetables." We must look at the evidence as to the nature of the applicant's employment. He was undoubtedly a skilled carpenter. His father had been a carpenter, and he had been taught carpentering by his father. But besides his carpentering work he appears to have acted as a handy man about the farm. He certainly did a considerable amount of work which might fairly be described as employment in agriculture. He was also employed as a keeper for two or three months in the year. His own evidence was this: He had been at carpentering all the day; as gamekeeper he looked after partridges, hares, and rabbits; he was keepering three months in the year; he might be described as working carpenter on the farm; he lent a hand at hay harvest and also at corn harvest; he made corn-ricks and straw-ricks; he did no ploughing. Another witness, who was a carter, said that he had worked on the farm with the applicant, who helped him with the threshing; that he had seen the applicant rick-making, gamekeeping, harvesting, and mangel-carting; that he did work like other labourers. On this evidence the county court judge held that the applicant was engaged in agricultural employment within the Act. In the circumstances it seems to me that there was evidence fit for the consideration of the county court judge that this man's duties embraced work which was purely agricultural employment. I think there is no doubt about that, and therefore it is not necessary to consider the nature of his carpentering work, or to decide whether, if his only work had been that of a farm carpenter, which work is in a sense ancillary to agricultural operations, the case would have been brought within the Act. I am far from saying that employment in work ancillary to agricultural operations may not be deemed to be employment in agriculture. But, in my opinion, that point does not arise in this case. There was plenty of evidence of employment in work which was purely agricultural work, and therefore the question was reduced to a question of fact, and the county court judge was the proper person to decide that question. In my opinion there has been no misdiscretion on any point of law, and there is no ground for interfering with the finding of the county court judge.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It ought to be borne in mind that the Workmen's Compensation Acts are expressed not in technical language, but in popular language; and in my opinion they ought to be construed and considered not technically, but in a popular sense. I think that it is unadvisable to define the word "agriculture" as used in the Act of 1900. The Legislature themselves did not attempt to define agriculture, but only pointed out that they meant it to include certain things which might otherwise have been in doubt. Taking the expression "employment in agriculture" in its popular sense, I think it is not necessarily limited to those persons who are mainly employed in any particular year in the manual occupations of tilling, sowing, and reaping. For instance, suppose a man is employed on a farm in one particular year mainly in the necessary work of hedging and ditching; I should not be disposed to say that such a man was not employed in agriculture. In the present case we have to deal with a man who was always employed on and for the purposes of a farm. Sometimes, for the greater part of his time, he was engaged in what were admitted to be purely agricultural pursuits, at other times he did carpentering work, the making and repairing of fences and so forth, which is work essential to the proper conduct of a farm, and for a small portion of his time he appears to have assisted in keeping down rabbits and to have acted as a gamekeeper. In these circumstances I think it is impossible to say that the county court judge misdirected himself on a point of law when he found that the applicant was employed in agriculture.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion. The Workmen's Compensation Act of 1900 applies the original Act of 1897 to a new class of persons. The statute is comprehensive in its terms. Though it is not distinct in the description of the class, it appears that the whole class of persons employed in agricultural operations is intended to be protected by the Act. We are now asked to read in a comprehensive exception, and to say that the Act only applies to labourers in fields, such person as are employed in sowing, reaping, and carrying away the produce of a farm. There is no indication of any intention on the part of the Legislature so to limit the Act. If the contention put forward on the part of the employer was correct, we should have this extraordinary result, that persons employed on a farm in such capacities as that of a shepherd or a steward would not be entitled to the benefit of the Act. The court ought to be slow to allow an interpretation to prevail which would introduce an exception which has not been made by the Legislature. I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Disclaimer of onerous property—Time for disclaimer—First appointment of trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 21, 55 (1)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 13.

The "twelve months after the first appointment of a trustee," within which, under section 55 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as amended by section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, onerous property may be disclaimed by the trustee of a bankrupt, begin to run from the date of the certificate of the appointment of the trustee under section 21 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and not from the date of the order of adjudication.

Appeal from Mr. Registrar Giffard.

This case raised a question of considerable importance under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883—namely, whether the period of twelve months, within which, under section 55, as amended by section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, the "trustee" is at liberty to disclaim onerous property belonging to the bankrupt, commences to run from the date of the order of adjudication or from the date of the certificate of the trustee's appointment.

The facts were shortly these: The order of adjudication against the debtor was made on the 2nd of October, 1902. Thereupon a trustee was appointed by the creditors, and his appointment was certified on the 16th of October, 1902. The bankrupt, being possessed of certain leasehold property in Limehouse subject to onerous covenants, the trustee gave notice to the landlords of his intention of disclaiming the bankrupt's interest in the lease; and on the 14th of October, 1903, he executed his disclaimer, which was duly filed in the bankruptcy. On his applying for his release the Board of Trade raised objections to the disclaimer on the ground that the properties had not been disclaimed "within twelve months after the first appointment of a trustee," in accordance with the terms of section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as amended by the Act of 1890. The trustee then maintained that the disclaimer was within the twelve months, which, he said, did not expire until two days after the date of his disclaimer; whereas the contention of the Board of Trade was that the twelve months ran from the 2nd of October, 1902, the date of the adjudication, and the consequent automatic "appointment" as on that date of the official receiver as "trustee," so that the disclaimer was too late. The trustee, under the direction of the board, then applied, under section 13 of the Act of 1890, for leave to extend the time in which to disclaim the property.

The application came before Mr. Registrar Giffard, who refused to grant an extension of time, being of opinion that no extension was necessary, since, according to his view of the Act, the time for disclaiming ran from the date of the certificate and not from the date of the adjudication. The trustee appealed. Section 55 provides that, where any part of the property of the bankrupt consists of land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants, the trustee "may, by writing signed by him at any time within twelve months after the first appointment of a trustee, disclaim the property." The various other enactments bearing upon the question will be found referred to in the judgments of the Court of Appeal. It was said that the Board of Trade regarded the question as one of considerable importance as possibly involving a serious liability upon the official receiver, inasmuch as the effect of granting a release to a trustee was that the official receiver thereupon became trustee (section 82, sub-section 4), and, as such, succeeded to the original trustee's liabilities, including those arising out of onerous property of the bankrupt not validly disclaimed.

Hansell, for the appellant.—On the true construction of the Bankruptcy Acts the twelve months run from the date of adjudication, not from the certificate of appointment of a trustee.

He referred to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 12, 20, 21, 31, 54, 55 (1), 70 (1 a, b, g), 121, 125 (5); Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 13; In re Parker, 15 Q. B. D. 196, 33 W. R. Dig. 20; Turquand v. Board of Trade, 11 A. C. 286, 34 W. R. Dig. 14; In re Baker, 8 Morrell 116.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 4.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question in this case is whether the time for disclaiming runs from the certificate of the appointment of the trustee or from the adjudication. By section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as amended by section 13 of the Act of 1890, the trustee may, by writing signed by him at any time after the first appointment of a trustee, disclaim the property. These words seem certainly to refer (in the absence of anything in that Act showing intention) to an appointment of a trustee under section 21, which provides that, where a debtor is adjudicated bankrupt, or the creditors have resolved that he be adjudicated bankrupt, the creditors may, by ordinary resolution, appoint some fit person, whether creditor or not, to fill the office of trustee of the property of the bankrupt, or they may resolve to leave his appointment to a committee of inspection thereinafter mentioned; and sub-section 2 provides that the person so appointed shall give security, in the manner prescribed, to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, and that the board, if satisfied with the security, shall certify that the appointment has been duly made, unless the board objects to the appointment on certain specified grounds. Sub-section 4 of the same section provides that the appointment of a trustee shall take effect as from the date of the certificate. I am inclined to think that sub-sections 2 and 4 of this section, as to the giving of security and as to the certificate of appointment, apply only to a trustee "so appointed"—that is, appointed by the creditors as provided by sub-section 1—and have no application to the official receiver when he is the trustee. In practice no certificate is given of his appointment; no security is taken from him. It is, however, to be observed that section 21 not only provides for the appointment of a trustee by the creditors after an adjudication, but also for the appointment of a trustee by the Board of Trade in cases where a trustee is not appointed by the creditors within four weeks from the date of the adjudication, or where negotiations for the composition scheme or schemes have been closed by the refusal of the creditors to accept, or of the court to approve, a composition or scheme. Section 54, by sub-section 1, provides that until a trustee is appointed the official receiver shall be the trustee for the purposes of the Act, and that immediately on the debtor being adjudicated bankrupt the property of the bankrupt shall vest in the trustee, and sub-section 2 provides that on the appointment of a trustee the property shall forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee appointed. This property would seem to vest, having regard to the judgment of Lord Selborne in Turquand v. The Board of Trade, independently of any appointment within the meaning of that word as used in section 21. But then sub-section 2 of section 54—which provides that on the appointment of a trustee the property shall forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee appointed—in my judgment contrasts the case where the property of the bankrupt vests in the official receiver independently of any appointment of him as trustee, and the case where the property of the bankrupt passes to a trustee forthwith on his appointment. There can be no doubt but that in sub-section 2 the word "appointed" is used in the sense in which it is employed in section 21. It is true that Lord Selborne says on p. 289 of 11 App. Cas.: "A certain time is allowed to the creditors to choose a trustee for themselves. If they do, when that choice is complete it supersedes the earlier official appointment," meaning thereby, I think, the appointment of the official receiver as trustee under sub-section 1 of section 54. And it is also true that Lord Esher in In re Parker, 15 Q. B. D., at p. 203, says: "Section 20 had said that the property shall vest in 'the trustee.' What trustee? There is no one but the official receiver at that moment. 'Until a trustee is appointed the official receiver shall be the trustee for the purposes of this Act.' The property of the bankrupt therefore vests in the official receiver who has just been appointed." But the use of these expressions by Lord Selborne and by Lord Esher in no way proves that the words "first appointment" in section 55 do not exclusively refer to an appointment under section 21. The provisions of sub-section

1 of section 54 will necessarily in every case in which the creditors appoint the trustee make the official receiver the trustee before there is a creditors' trustee, because a creditors' trustee is appointed by a meeting called after the adjudication.

This brings me to section 55, the disclaimer section, and to the question of the meaning of the words "may, by writing signed by him, at any time within [twelve] months after the first appointment of a trustee, disclaim the property." Sub-section 1 of the section runs thus: "Where any part of the property of the bankrupt consists of land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants . . . the trustee notwithstanding that he has endeavoured to sell or has taken possession of the property, or exercised any act of ownership in relation thereto, but subject to the provisions of this section may, by writing signed by him, at any time within [twelve] months after the first appointment of a trustee disclaim the property." In my opinion the words "after the first appointment" refer to an appointment under section 21 either by the creditors or by the Board of Trade under sub-section 6 of that section. I do not think they refer to the official receiver becoming trustee under sub-section 1 of section 54 until a trustee is appointed. It follows that the twelve months mentioned in sub-section 1 of section 55 will run from the certificate of the first appointment of a trustee, and not from the date of the official receiver becoming trustee, on the debtor being adjudicated bankrupt, until a trustee is appointed. It is said that the effect of the court so holding will be that the official receiver being trustee cannot exercise the power of disclaimer at all, and that this is inconsistent with the decision of the House of Lords in Turquand v. The Board of Trade, and of the Court of Appeal in In re Parker, because the judgments both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, when the House reviewed the decision of the Court of Appeal, in effect decided that—to use the words of Lord Blackburn in his speech as reported in 11 App. Cas., p. 291—"the official receiver, whilst he is trustee after adjudication, may exercise the powers of a trustee." But I do not think, nor do we intend, that the effect of our decision shall be that the official receiver on becoming trustee will not have the power to disclaim. One of the powers of the trustee appointed by the creditors is to disclaim. I think that the official receiver, as trustee, can exercise that power. It is said that if the official receiver has that power the twelve months limited for the exercise of it must run from the vesting of the property in the official receiver—that is, from the moment of adjudication; but I do not think that this follows. The official receiver, in becoming trustee immediately upon the debtor being adjudicated bankrupt, may exercise the power of disclaimer which section 55 gives to the trustee appointed by the creditors, for twelve months from that appointment, without being subject to this limitation in time for the exercise of the power, which limitation by its very terms runs from a date which has no relation to to the trusteeship of the official receiver, because he is never appointed. As the twelve months from the appointment had not at the time of the application for extension expired in this case I think no extension was necessary, and that the extension was properly refused. The result is that Mr. Registrar Giffard is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. I only wish to say this for myself—that the only difficulty I have felt arises from the apprehension that some injustice might be done to persons interested in onerous property owing to there being no limit of time for disclaimer when the official receiver is trustee before a trustee is appointed under sub-section 1 of section 54. But that difficulty is, in my opinion, removed when it is considered that sub-section 4 of section 55 provides that any person interested in onerous property may require the trustee, which includes, as my lord has pointed out, the official receiver when trustee under sub-sections 1 and 2 of section 54, to decide whether he will disclaim or not.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

LORD KINNAIRD AND OTHERS v. FIELD (No. 2). (a.)

Practice—Counterclaim—Plaintiff—Action brought in Chancery Division—Counterclaim for slander—Trial by jury—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, rr. 2, 7—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 100.

Where an action is properly brought in the Chancery Division a defendant who raises by counterclaim issues of slander, libel, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, seduction, or breach of promise of marriage, is not entitled to have all the issues of fact in the action tried by a judge with a jury as of right under rule 2 of order 36, that rule not applying to the case of a counterclaiming defendant. But in such a case the court will, in the exercise of the discretion given by rule 7 of the same order, direct the issues raised by the counterclaim, to which rule 2 would apply if the counterclaim were an original action, to be tried by a judge with a jury, the original action and any other issues raised by the counterclaim being tried in the Chancery Division in the ordinary way.

This was an appeal by the defendant against the refusal of Warrington, J., of his application that the action and his counterclaim might be transferred to the King's Bench Division and tried by a judge with a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, as the council of the Evangelical Alliance, against their former secretary, in effect to enforce the specific performance of an agreement for the compromise of a former action brought by him.

The defendant put in a defence and a counterclaim, seeking damages against the plaintiffs in respect of alleged slander, libel, and malicious prosecution. He alleged that by rule 2 of order 36 of the Rules of Court he was entitled as of right to have the whole issue to be tried by a judge with a jury, or by a judge sitting with assessors, or by an official referee or special referee with or without assessors.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100: "In the construction of this Act, unless there is anything in the subject or context repugnant thereto, the several words hereinafter mentioned shall have, or include, the meanings following (inter alia)—'action' shall mean a civil proceeding commenced by writ or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of court, and shall not include a criminal proceeding by the Crown; 'plaintiff' shall include every person asking any relief (otherwise than by way of counterclaim as a defendant) against any other person by any form of proceeding, whether the same be taken by action, suit, petition, motion, summons, or otherwise."

The defendant appealed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant in person.—A counterclaim is really in the nature of a cross-action, and it has been held that the claim and counterclaim are for all purposes except execution two independent actions: Stumore v. Campbell, 40 W. R. 101, [1892] 1 Q. B. 314. Before the Judicature Acts an action for slander would have been properly tried by a judge with a jury, and it is provided by section 22 of the Judicature Act, 1875, that nothing in the Act or in the rules or orders made under it is to prejudice the right of any party to an action to have the issue for trial by jury submitted and left by the judge to the jury before whom the same shall come for trial. Under ord. 36, r. 2, the right to a jury is expressly given to a plaintiff in slander actions; rule 7 of the same order, which provides for trial by a judge without a jury, refers to actions in which neither party has insisted on his right to a trial in the manner prescribed by rule 2: Jenkins v. Bushby, 39 W. R. 321, [1891] 1 Ch. 484.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Greenwood, for the plaintiffs.—This action has been properly commenced in the Chancery Division. Ord. 19, r. 3, allows a defendant to set up by way of counterclaim any right or claim so as to enable the court to pronounce a final judgment in the same action on both the claim and the counterclaim. But this gives him no right to have the action transferred, and if a transfer of the counterclaim is necessary this would be a good ground for having it tried separately. Ord. 36, r. 2, does not apply here. The definitions of "action" and "plaintiff" exclude counterclaim, and these definitions are incorporated into the rules and orders, rule 1. The result is that to give the defendant the right he now claims he must show that there is something in the rule or its context repugnant to this definition. This is all that the courts have ever done—viz., if a rule would obviously work injustice by not including a counterclaiming defendant as a "plaintiff" they have held the definition to be repugnant: Jones v. Macaulay, 39 W. R. 211, [1891] 1 Q. B. 221.

The defendant replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a case involving the construction of rule 2 of order 36. This rule is somewhat difficult of construction, and Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., are prepared to put upon it the construction which has been contended for by counsel for the respondents. There is, according to my view, no reported case which in any way determines this question. I may say further that I think the decided cases go to show that the word "action" was occasionally used in these rules and orders as including a cross-action and counterclaim. At all events the decision in Jones v. Macaulay on ord. 27, r. 11, shows that the word "plaintiff" is used in these orders as including a plaintiff on a counterclaim. It is undoubted that in reference to many matters the plaintiff in a counterclaim is regarded as the plaintiff in an action, and I think that in Stumore v. Campbell Kay, L.J., happily described the result of the legislation effected by the Judicature Act, 1873, when he said that all that the Judicature Act did with reference to a counterclaim was to allow a cross-action to be brought which should be tried at the same time as the original action. Under these circumstances, speaking for myself, I should have been disposed to look at ord. 36, r. 2, to see really what was the principle which was enunciated by that rule. I cannot doubt myself but that the principle there enunciated is this, that as regards actions for slander, libel, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, seduction, or breach of promise of marriage the party who is making complaint in respect of any of these matters ought to have a right to have the question of the justice of his complaint tried before a judge and jury independently of the discretion of any judge. Unless that was the view of the Legislature I cannot understand why it should have provided, as it has provided, by rule 2, that the plaintiff in such cases should have a right to insist upon having his action tried by a jury. If that is the true principle of this rule it obviously can make no difference, so far as that principle is concerned, whether the claim is made by the plaintiff in an original action or by the plaintiff in a counterclaim. Every reason which could have led the Legislature to say that the plaintiff in such a case was entitled as of right to a jury in an original action equally applies to an action by counterclaim. But it is said, and there is great force in the argument, that the words of the rule are such as to exclude the existence of this right in a portion of the class of persons apparently included in this principle. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:] It is said that not only does the wording of the rule point exclusively to a plaintiff in an action who has issued his writ, but the fact that the definitions of "action" and "plaintiff" in section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, are such as to make it difficult to include a plaintiff in a counterclaim, ought in cases of doubt to cause the rules to be construed in the same way, especially as rule 1 of order 71 in express terms incorporated the definitions in section 100 into the rules themselves. Warrington, J., has decided this case upon the basis of the construction contended for by the respondents, and I do not think that I ought under these circumstances to do more than give a decided expression to the doubts which have passed through my mind and particularize the reasons which I think are somewhat weighty in favour of the opposite view. Therefore I tried before delivering this judgment to see whether the parties would not accept a decision in this case which would have prevented the necessity of laying down a construction of this rule which I cannot help thinking will be found extremely inconvenient hereafter, as, for example, in a case where the court is trying two common law actions in respect of a chain of facts which may properly be described as one. But our suggestions were not acceded to. This is a case in which it is very urgent that our decision should be given today. Under these circumstances with some hesitation I accept the view taken by Warrington, J., although I consider that conclusion is somewhat difficult to reconcile with the spirit of the Judicature Act itself. Having decided this much, we must consider what order ought to be made in this case. We might make an order simply affirming the decision of Warrington, J., but we have power independently of rule 2 of order 36, under rule 7 (a) of order 36, to order any cause, matter, or issue to be tried by a judge with a jury, and if the appellant thinks fit to apply to us to order any particular issues to be tried with a jury we shall have to consider it. Subject to that observation I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—This is an application by the defendant in the action asking that the action may be tried by a jury. The action is one brought by the plaintiffs to enforce an agreement for the staying of a previous action between the same parties. That action was stayed upon terms, and the plaintiffs in the present action complain that the terms of that agreement have been violated by the defendant, and they claim specific performance, an injunction, and damages. The agreement was not one which in any way related to the sale or purchase of land, and I doubt whether specific performance of it would be ordered by the court, but at any rate it is not a case of specific performance specially assigned to the Chancery Division. The whole action might perfectly well have been brought in the King's Bench Division, although it is equally correctly brought in the Chancery Division, being an action which before the Judicature Act might have been brought in the old Court of Chancery. To that action the defendant has put in a defence and a counterclaim, and in the counterclaim he alleges in the first six paragraphs that he has suffered damage by reason of the various acts on the part of the plaintiffs defamatory of himself, those acts being partly in the nature of libel and partly in the nature of slander. In respect of these matters he claims damages. He also claims specific performance of an undertaking given to the court on the 29th of June, 1903. As to that, I think that specific performance could not be decreed. He also claims four months' salary and an injunction. A reply to the counterclaim has been delivered and notice of trial given by the plaintiffs before a judge without a jury. The defendant has given notice of his desire to have the action and counterclaim tried by a jury. The first question to be determined is whether he is entitled as a matter of right to have the issues of fact tried by a jury. The rule is confined to actions of slander, libel, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, seduction, or breach of promise. The original action does not fall under any of those heads, and the only way in which this rule could be invoked would be by alleging that inasmuch as the counterclaim contained issues of libel and slander, the counterclaim ought to be treated as an action of libel and slander. I have great difficulty in seeing how that can be. I feel the force of the remarks made by my lord, but it appears to me that rule 2 of order 36 does not apply, considering that we must bear in mind that rule 1 of order 71 incorporates the provisions of section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, which gives definitions of various terms used in the rules. [His lordship read the definitions of "cause," "action," "plaintiff," and "defendant."] Now, I do not think that a counterclaim is an "action" within that definition. It is certainly not a civil proceeding commenced by writ, nor can it be met by the subsequent words of the definition, "or any other such manner as may be prescribed by rule of court." From the definition of "plaintiff" is excluded a person seeking relief by way of counterclaim as a defendant. Under these circumstances it appears to me that rule 2 of order 36 does not in terms cover the case of a defendant who has brought a counterclaim claiming relief in respect of the matters mentioned in the rule. At the same time I think that the framers of this rule have clearly indicated an intention that any person who is making a claim for relief in respect of these matters should have these issues tried by a judge and jury if possible, and I think that the greatest weight ought to be given to this consideration in exercising any discretion which the court possesses under the subsequent rules. Rule 3 does not apply as it relates to matters assigned to the Chancery Division. Rule 4 enables the court to direct a trial without a jury of any issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, arising in a case which without any consent of parties was formerly triable without a jury. That includes all that large class of cases which are not now assigned to the Chancery Division, but which would have been tried by the old Court of Chancery previously to the passing of the Judicature Act. Then rule 6 deals with "any other cause or matter." That includes all matters not mentioned in the previous rules, and provides that as regards those matters either party may demand a jury. None of these rules, in my opinion, applies to the present case. But then we come to rule 7. That rule provides by clause (a) that "in every cause or matter unless under the provisions of this order a trial with a jury is ordered, or under rule 2 of this order either party has signified a desire to have a trial with a jury, the mode of trial shall be by a judge without a jury," but it empowers the court to order any cause, matter, or issue to be tried with a jury. That embraces the present case. Here the defendant has seen fit to counterclaim in respect of libel and slander, and, speaking for myself, I should be prepared to exercise that discretion by directing that the issues in those portions of the counterclaim which relate to libel and slander should be tried by a judge and jury. This view of the case has really never been considered by Warrington, J. Therefore, while deciding that the defendant is not entitled as of right to a jury, that is the order which in the absence of special circumstances I should be disposed to make in favour of the counterclaiming defendant.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This appeal has not been argued upon any matter of form. In form this was an application to transfer the whole action to the King's Bench Division; but it has been argued as an application based on ord. 36, r. 2, and the main question which we have to decide is whether as a matter of right a defendant who counterclaims to an action brought in the Chancery Division can by the mere fact of tacking on to his counterclaim a claim for slander successfully assert a right to deprive the plaintiff of the privilege of having the action tried without a jury and insist upon the right of having the whole action tried by a judge and jury. I have arrived at the same conclusion as Stirling, L.J. I do not think that the word "action" in rule 2 applies to a counterclaim or that the word "plaintiff" applies to a counterclaiming defendant. Primâ facie the meaning of these words in that rule is governed by section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, which makes it quite clear that a "plaintiff" does not include a counterclaiming defendant, and that an "action" does not include a counterclaim, unless there is anything in the context which is repugnant to the meaning given in the section. I look in vain for anything in this rule to enable me to construe "action" and "plaintiff" in any other than their natural meaning. I am therefore driven to the conclusion that rule 2 of order 36 does not confer any such right upon a counterclaiming defendant as is alleged by the appellant. But although I think that, I also think that in any case in which the defendant by his counterclaim claims relief in respect of any of the matters specified in rule 2 there is very strong ground for applying to a judge to exercise his discretion in such a manner as to give the defendant a right to have either the whole action or at least the particular issues relating to the specified matters tried by a jury. Now as I read rule 2 it applies to the whole action and to all the issues to be tried in the action and also to everything which is being tried in the counterclaim, and it does not contemplate the trial of particular issues. But the court has, under the subsequent rules, the widest discretion either to order the whole action to be tried by a jury or leave the action and such part of the counterclaim as does not relate to the matters enumerated in rule 2 to be tried by a judge alone and send the rest to be tried by a jury.

In the present case I think it would be extremely wrong to make an order directing the whole action to be tried by a jury. It is to be in the list for to-morrow. It would have been tried already but for this pending appeal. Therefore we ought not in the exercise of our discretion to make such an order as the appellant asks for. But if he thinks fit to sever the issues, and asks that the issues relating to defamation only shall be tried before a judge and jury, the rest of the action and counterclaim coming on for trial to-morrow, I think, subject to anything that may be said on behalf of the respondents, we should accede to the application.

The appellant declining to make any such application, the appeal was dismissed.

In re MACKAY.
MACKAY v. GOULD. (a.)

Limitation Statutes—Legacy—Action to recover—Express trust—Implied trust—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.

An executrix by investing and otherwise dealing with the property of beneficiaries, and by acting as defendant on behalf of herself and other beneficiaries, does not constitute herself an express trustee, and therefore an action against such executrix by a legatee to recover a legacy is capable of being barred by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

Action.

The question in this case was whether a legatee's claim in respect of a legacy was barred by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

Section 8 provides that "no action or other proceeding shall be brought to recover . . . any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same."

The plaintiff was the sole surviving child and beneficiary under the will of Alexander Mackay made on the 26th of August, 1856. By this will he left all his property to his wife and children, and appointed his wife his sole executrix. He died on the 14th of September, 1856, leaving his wife and two children—namely, the plaintiff and one son. The son died in September, 1874.

In 1857 the widow married George Richard Barry.

In 1866 Mrs. Barry, as executrix, advanced the sum of £31,641 12s. 6d., substantially the whole of the testator's estate, to Mr. Barry, and accepted from him as security the mortgage of certain estates.

Mr. Barry died in January, 1867, having appointed Mrs. Barry his sole executrix.

In 1867 the action of The Agra Bank (Limited) v. Barry, reported 7 L. R. H. L. 135, was commenced, being a suit instituted to obtain priority over the said mortgage. Mrs. Barry was defendant in that action on behalf of herself and the other beneficiaries.

By the judgment of the House of Lords the validity and priority of the mortgage was upheld.

In 1868 an action was commenced to administer under the direction of the court the estate of the said G. R. Barry, which was insolvent, and by an order of the 1st of August, 1882, Mrs. Barry was held entitled to retain the sum of £8,683 5s. 1d. along with other personal estate of the said G. R. Barry in part satisfaction and discharge of the moneys due to her as executrix of the testator under the said mortgage.

The plaintiff came of age in 1876.

During the lifetime of Mrs. Barry the plaintiff received from her certain moneys, part of the testator's estate. Mrs. Barry, by her will made on the 9th of December, 1882, appointed the defendants her executors, and left all her property away from the plaintiff. She died in 1885 leaving personal estate of the value of £8,200. The plaintiff alleged that this constituted part of the testator Mackay's estate, and that it was held by Mrs. Barry in trust for herself and the plaintiff as joint tenants. She therefore commenced this action for a declaration that she was entitled to the whole of the testator Mackay's estate as sole surviving beneficiary under his will, an account of the moneys representing that estate and of the defendants' dealings therewith, and payment of the moneys that should be found due to her upon the taking of the account.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and H. L. Fraser, for the plaintiff.—Mrs. Barry had not so fully informed the plaintiff as to her rights under the testator's will as she was bound to do (In re Roberts, Roberts v. Roberts, [1905] 1 Ch. 704, 53 W. R. Dig. 36; Brittlebank v. Goodwin, 12 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 744, L. R. 5 Eq. 545); and her failure to perform this duty amounted to a fraud in law; Thompson v. Eastwood, 2 A. C. 215, 25 W. R. Dig. 341; In re McCallum, McCallum v. McCallum, 49 W. R. 129, [1901] 1 Ch. 143. Mrs. Barry by defending the action of The Agra Bank (Limited) v. Barry on behalf of herself and the other beneficiaries, and by retaining the property and investing it for the beneficiaries, had converted herself into an express trustee: In re Timmis, Nixon v. Smith, 50 W. R. 164, [1902] 1 Ch. 176.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Christopher James, for the defendants.—Mrs. Barry had done nothing whereby it could be held that she had converted herself into an express trustee (In re Rowe, Jacobs v. Hind, 58 L. J. Ch. 703, 37 W. R. Dig. 4; In re Davis, Evans v. Moore, 39 W. R. 627, [1891] 3 Ch. 119); and therefore the statute applied. On the other point raised they cited In re Lewis, Lewis v. Lewis, [1904] 2 Ch. 656.

KEKEWICH, J., found as a fact that, although the plaintiff had not received all that she was entitled to under the testator's will, she was aware, during Mrs. Barry's lifetime, of the contents thereof. The question whether the plaintiff's claim was barred by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, depended on whether the defendants were representatives of an express trustee, or merely representatives of an executrix. If they were representatives of an express trustee the statute did not apply, but if they were representatives of an executrix the statute did apply and the claim was barred. Mrs. Barry was the defendant in an action concerning the whole estate on behalf of herself and the other beneficiaries, and in an affidavit she said that the moneys were trust property. If she had recovered the property she would have held it as a trustee, but only in a loose sense. The fact that executors perform their duty by suing for cestuis que trust is no reason for converting them into express trustees. To hold otherwise would be contrary to In re Rowe and In re Davis. The statute therefore applies and the plaintiff's claim is barred. It has also been said that Mrs. Barry was under an obligation to fully inform the plaintiff of her rights under the testator's will. On this point it was a question how far the decision in In re Lewis was consistent with a dictum of Giffard, V.C., in Brittlebank v. Goodwin, but having regard to the facts it is not necessary to determine that question now.

PESCOD v. MAYOR, &c., OF THE CITY OF WESTMINSTER. (a.)

Metropolis—Widening streets—Compulsory purchase—Severance—Sub-lessee—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, 1817 (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), ss. 80, 96.

Where a local authority took a house let in separate floors for street widening under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, s. 80, the owner of the ground-floor is not necessarily entitled to restrain the local authority from taking more than is wanted to be thrown into the street. Where the danger, inconvenience, and excessive cost of severance resulted in a bonâ fide adjudication that it was necessary to acquire the whole building, this was not vitiated by a prior agreement to re-sell the surplus portion, subject to the owner's right of pre-emption under section 96.

Teuliere v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, 30 Ch. D. 642, 34 W. R. Dig. 102, and Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, followed.

The plaintiff was the lessee for a term of 2½ years unexpired of the basement, ground floor, and entresol of No. 30, Piccadilly, where he carried on the business of a tailor under the name of Nicholls & Co. Part of the basement and ground-floor had been sub-let by him to a tobacconist, Notaras, for the residue of his lease except the last day thereof.

The defendants, the Westminster City Corporation, in order to carry out the scheme of the London County Council for the widening of Piccadilly, put into operation their statutory powers of acquiring land under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), by giving a notice to treat, dated the 10th of June, 1905.

The plaintiff alleged that the adjudication made by the defendants that the whole of No. 30 would be necessary for the purpose of widening was wrong and ultra vires and was not made bonâ fide. He claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding under their notice to treat.

The plaintiff's premises consisted of: (1) On the ground-floor two shops having a total frontage to Piccadilly of 18ft. and a total depth of 64ft., the width of the back being 25ft. for a depth of about 32ft.; (2) the basement beneath the whole of the ground-floor; (3) a large room of about 650ft. superficial area on the entresol floor, 26ft. from the street. The plaintiff had no interest in the front portion of the entresol floor nor in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, or 4th floors of the house fronting Piccadilly except in respect to a claim for flues and to a cistern. These floors had a separate entrance and extended over the two shops and the entrance, a front of 25ft. The plaintiff's room on the entresol floor at the back had no building over it.

The plaintiff alleged that all that was necessary for the widening of Piccadilly was a strip 22ft. 6in. in width, and that he was willing to sell that part and could not be required to sell the whole. The adjudication that it was necessary to take the whole house could not be bonâ fide, because the defendants had previously agreed to resell to the Piccadilly Hotel (Limited) the portion not actually required for street widening. It was further shown that along most of the line of widening only the part actually to be laid down into the street had been acquired by the defendants.

Macmorran, K.C., and Lyttelton Chubb, for the plaintiff, argued that the business could be carried on in the curtailed premises, and that, as this was so, the plaintiff could not be forced to sell so as to allow his immediate landlord, the Piccadilly Hotel, to acquire his lease from the defendants: Teuliere v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, 30 Ch. D. 642. Even if the corporation should be put to extra expense thereby, they were bound to incur it, and would have the power to enter the plaintiff's premises to shore them up and maintain them during the period of working, and could easily place a passage over their underground alterations so as to give access to the plaintiff's shop from the street.

Aldis v. Corporation of London, 47 W. R. 514, [1899] 2 Ch. 169, and Manchester Ship Canal Co. v. Manchester Racecourse Co., 49 W. R. 418, [1900] 2 Ch. 352, [1901] 2 Ch. 37, were cited.

Eve, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the defendants, argued that the adjudication made was entirely bonâ fide. The tenure of the house in question was so divided that the contemplated alterations would make the house quite useless to the tenants other than the plaintiff, who all wished to be bought out. The defendants' action was entirely in the public interest, and good rents had been obtained for all land not necessary for the actual widening. As to the contention that the plaintiff would be able to carry on his business during and after the alterations, surveyors were called to show that this was not so, and that not only would the rest of the house—which the plaintiff claimed must be left standing to support his cistern and flues—be quite useless, but that the underground operations of the defendants in preparing the new street would entirely cut the plaintiff off from Piccadilly and prevent for long periods any satisfactory communication with the street for the purposes of his business. It had been already admitted on an interlocutory motion for an injunction that the plaintiff had a right of preemption over the premises in accordance with section 96 of the Act.

Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, and Fernley v. Limehouse Waterworks, 68 L. J. Ch. 344, 47 W. R. Dig. 130, were cited.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in a considered judgment, stated the nature of the plaintiff's action and the facts of the case above-mentioned, and continued: The plaintiff contends that it is physically possible to pull down and remove so much of the entire building as lies to the south of a line shown in red ink on the plans, and which is 22ft. 6in. back from Piccadilly. This is the new building line of Piccadilly. He contends that so much of the building as is north of that line must be left standing, at all events that portion in which he is interested, that care must be taken in pulling down the front portion, so as to support properly the back portion left standing. The result of doing what the plaintiff contends for would be to leave a portion of the house 25ft. wide by about 18ft. deep resembling a tower of four floors, with the whole front removed and exposed, and no means of access to it, as the staircase is in the front portion to be pulled down and there is not sufficient room to erect a fresh staircase. Some of the witnesses described this portion as about 18ft. square, but this is a mistake. The width of the building, so far as the plaintiff's interest extends, is only 18ft. on the Piccadilly front; but the entire width of the building, including the separate entrance to the floors, and the width of the upper floors, is 25ft., as plainly appears from the model verified by Mr. Andrew Young. This tower 25ft. by 18ft. would be of no use whatever. Mr. Alexander H. Turner, an experienced house agent now carrying on business in South Audley-street, but formerly of Piccadilly, nearly opposite the premises in dispute, a witness called by the plaintiff, said that he could not even suggest any manner in which the rear portion of the four floors could be utilized, after the front portion had been removed in the manner proposed by the plaintiff. The conclusions of fact to which I come are that it would be physically possible to pull down the front portion and leave the rear portion standing, but that the cost of so doing would be very excessive—that it could not be done without entering upon every floor of the rear portion remaining standing, and placing struts and ties to uphold it, when the front part had been removed, and also entering upon the adjoining land each side and placing raking shores there to afford the rear portion external support; and that the opinion of Mr. Stenning, the architect and surveyor, was well founded that when this had been done the district surveyor would immediately come in and condemn the back portion as a dangerous structure. It was also put in evidence that the plaintiff has another action pending in this court against the Piccadilly Hotel Co. (Limited), who, he alleges, have acquired the leasehold interest in the whole house, subject to his own underlease of a part. That company, he alleges, have acquired and pulled down the buildings surrounding No. 30, and to a small extent have commenced the demolition of No. 30. He claims that the premises in his lease are heated by means of four fireplaces, all provided with chimney flues passing up through the building (some six storeys in height) above the roof, and that the premises are provided with a water supply by means of a cistern placed immediately under the roof, with pipes passing down through the building to the plaintiff's said premises, providing him with an excellent supply of water at high pressure. The plaintiff in that action claims an injunction to restrain any interference with the upper portion of the premises No. 30 so as to interfere with his chimneys and flues, water tanks, and supply pipes. The position, therefore, is that the rear portion would be useless and probably dangerous to leave standing, but that the plaintiff is seeking to restrain its being pulled down, as thereby damage would be occasioned to the easements and appurtenances of his premises. There are other difficulties in the plaintiff's way. If the front portion only of his premises is acquired there must be a considerable time when he will be totally excluded from his premises by reason of the danger involved in pulling down, and when this is completed he would be cut off from access to the public street until the roadway and the path can be formed and made into a fit state to throw open to the public. The defendants explained that they have to construct vaults under the path, and to turn arches over them, and the headway above the arches where the men will be working is too low to allow of wooden gangways being placed in position so as to give temporary access to the plaintiff's shop over the heads of the workmen engaged.

The plaintiff based his case upon this: that as the whole ground area proposed to be taken under the notice to treat was not intended to be thrown into the public roadway, the defendants must be restricted to the part actually intended to be so dealt with, as he was willing to convey that part only. In my opinion, the plaintiff has not any absolute right to restrain the defendants from taking more land than is intended to be actually dedicated to the public. The statute contemplates that they may take more—section 80 empowers the local authority to lay the sites of houses, walls, and buildings, and also other lands, tenements, and hereditaments acquired by them "or so much thereof as they . . . shall think proper, into the said streets or public places." Lord Chelmsford pointed out in Thomas v. Daw, 15 W. R. 113, L. R. 2 Ch. 1, at p. 7, that the words "or so much thereof" must be construed to apply to houses as well as to lands, otherwise this absurdity would follow—that the commissioners would be imperatively bound to lay the whole of the sites of the houses into the streets. Again, section 96 of the Act enables the local authority to resell lands purchased by them, after they have first been offered for sale to the persons from whom they were purchased. This also shows that the statute contemplated that they might take more land than the actual strip required for street widening. In my judgment the question which I have to determine is whether the defendants have honestly and in good faith adjudged that the whole of the house or building No. 30 projects into, or obstructs, or prevents them from altering, widening, or extending Piccadilly, and that the possession, occupation, and purchase of the whole of the house will be necessary for that purpose. That is the adjudication which the defendants have made, and I have arrived at the conclusion that they have done this in good faith and that in their view the possession, occupation, and purchase of the whole building will be necessary to enable them to widen Piccadilly as they propose. The position and dimensions of the building, the structural arrangement of its contents, the considerable portion of its site actually intended to be thrown into the public street, and the sub-division of the house into portions held for different terms, with the claim to chimneys and flues going up the full height of the building, and to a water-cistern at the top with service pipes from it, all point to the wisdom and prudence of the course adopted by the defendants. With this, however, I am not concerned. If, however, it were necessary for me to form a judgment as to whether the possession, occupation, and purchase of the whole building were necessary to enable the defendants to widen Piccadilly to the extent proposed I should decide that question in the affirmative. It was insisted by the plaintiff that, as a matter of law, the defendants could not take compulsorily more than the site intended to be thrown into the street, if, as was the case, he was willing to part with that portion. Such a rule, if is existed, would be productive of the greatest inconvenience where a house is divided into different floors which, or parts of which, are leased separately, and where some of the lessees might require the whole of their interest to be purchased, while others took the opposite view and claimed to retain everything not intended to be thrown into the street. Moreover, such a rule would enable the owner of a very limited interest in a small part only of a house to require that part to be left, although the removal of the portion necessary to be pulled down might render the whole of the rest of the house perfectly useless. The language of the Act itself does not afford any support for such an argument. In Teuliere v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, 30 Ch. D. 642, Pearson, J., put the case of a vestry taking so much of the buildings that the portion left was a mere wall, or a staircase and one or two kitchens, and said that it would be unreasonable as regards the owners, for the vestry not to take the whole, and as regards the vestry to make them pay for all damage by severance. He certainly, therefore, took the view that if only a small portion of the building was left, not actually required for the street, the owner would have no right to restrict the vestry to the portion intended for the street and to make the vestry pay compensation for severance. Again, in Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, it was said by the present Master of the Rolls (at p. 754): "If a particular part of a house can be pointed to which the vestry, bonâ fide, find is the only part which obstructs the improvement, and that part is separable from the house, so that it can be removed without destroying the house as a house, then I should say that there is nothing to prevent the vestry from compulsorily taking that part only. If, on the other hand, the thing, in respect of which they form their judgment that it obstructs and is necessary to be removed is so indissolubly linked with the whole fabric of the house that, in the opinion of the jury, it cannot be removed without practically destroying the identity of the house as a house, then I think the vestry are not entitled to say that 'part thereof' only obstructs or that 'part thereof' only is necessary to be removed for the purpose of the improvement. Under those circumstances I am of opinion that the vestry could not stop short of taking the whole." In the present case it is quite clear that the portion of the building which is necessary to be removed, to lay the site of it into the street, is so indissolubly linked with the whole fabric of the house that it cannot be removed without practically destroying the identity of the house as a house. The identity is altogether gone when nearly two-thirds of the main building is removed and four upper floors are left as a mere shell with no means of access and no space to make one. Under these circumstances the defendants could not stop short of taking the whole. I may add that when once the conclusion of fact has been arrived at that it is essential for the defendants to acquire the whole building for the purpose of widening Piccadilly, the adjudication of the defendants to that effect does not become ultrà vires, nor can mala fides be attributed to the defendants, because, before the date of the adjudication, an arrangement had been come to with regard to the resale of so much of the site of the building as was not required for street widening. So far as the plaintiff's interest is concerned this is subject to his right of pre-emption; and upon the facts it is clear that the defendants are not putting in force their compulsory powers colourably only as regards street widening in respect of any part of the building. There is no ground for the contention that as regards the rear portion the ostensible purpose of the defendants is not the real one, and that the real purpose is to resell the back portion to the hotel company; I am quite satisfied that the real purpose of the defendants, the purpose for which their compulsory powers are being used—honestly and bonâ fide—is to acquire the whole building for the purpose alone of street widening. The result is that the action fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Will—Charity—Public institutions—Charitable institutions and other general purposes of locality.

A testator in the events which happened gave part of his residuary estate upon trust for charitable, educational, or other institutions of the town of Kendal, and also for such other general purposes for the benefit of the town of Kendal or its inhabitants as his trustees should think fit. Certain institutions at Kendal, a hospital, grammar school, and free library were suggested by the testator, without binding his trustees to adopt the suggestion, as suitable institutions.

Held, that the gift was a valid charitable trust.

Summons.

A testator, James Allen, by his will, dated the 4th of January, 1896, appointed executors and trustees thereof and made certain specific and pecuniary bequests and gave his residuary estate in moieties, one moiety being given to his trustees to hold upon trust for his nephew, A. T. J. Walker, for life, and then to his children upon attaining twenty-one or marrying, and the other moiety to a niece upon like terms.

In clause 8 of the testator's will he directed as follows: "Subject to the trusts contained in the preceding paragraphs of this my will, I direct my trustees to stand possessed as well of my nephew's settled trust fund as also of my niece's settled trust fund and of the two half-parts of the trust fund given under clause 6 of this my will, upon trust for such charitable, educational, or other institutions of the town of Kendal, and also for such other general purposes for the benefit of the town of Kendal, or any of the inhabitants thereof, as my trustees shall in their absolute uncontrolled discretion think fit. And I desire, without in any way binding my trustees thereto, that the following institutions shall be carefully considered by them in such distribution—namely, (1) The Kendal Memorial Hospital, either by way of endowment or by way of enlargement or otherwise as to my trustees shall seem best; (2) the Kendal Grammar School, either by way of establishing one or more exhibition or exhibitions (to be called the James Allen exhibition) to the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, or otherwise for the benefit of or the general endowment of the said grammar school as to my trustees shall seem best; and (3) the Kendal Public Free Library. I declare that any moneys dealt with under this clause may be paid over by my trustees to the treasurer, committee, or governing body of any institution or body which may be intended to be benefited, and the receipts of such treasurer, committee, or governing body shall be a sufficient discharge to my trustees, or the moneys may be retained by my trustees, and the income applied by them for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them."

The testator died on the 28th of February, 1896.

The testator's nephew, A. T. J. Walker, survived the testator but died without issue.

This was an originating summons taken out by the surviving trustees of the will of the testator for the determination of the question whether, upon the true construction of the will and in the events which had happened, any and which of the gifts under clause 8 were to any, and what, extent good charitable, and valid gifts.

T. T. Methold, for the trustees, stated the above facts.

Eve, K.C., and A. B. Marten, for the next-of-kin of the testator, contended that upon the true construction of the will the gifts in clause 8 were wide enough to include objects which were not charitable within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the Crown, argued that this was a good and valid charitable gift as being a gift to the inhabitants of a limited district for public purposes. The will must, on the authorities, be construed to refer to public purposes only, and the discretion given to the trustees was not wider than was permissible to a testator.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in delivering judgment, stated the facts above-mentioned and read clause 8 of the will. He then continued as follows: It is first necessary to consider what is the true construction of the will. The trust for "such charitable, educational, or other institutions for the town of Kendal" is followed by the words "such other general purposes for the benefit of the town of Kendal, or any of the inhabitants thereof, as my trustees shall think fit." The context shows that the testator when specifying "other institutions of the town of Kendal" meant institutions of a public character for the general benefit of the town or its inhabitants. The enumeration of particular institutions which follows further shows the kind of objects which he was contemplating; he mentions an institution of each kind, not in any way binding his trustees thereto, but asking that they should carefully consider each one in the distribution. The first mentioned is the "Kendal Memorial Hospital," which is a charitable institution for the benefit of the town or its inhabitants, intended for the use of the suffering poor. The next mentioned —the Kendal Grammar School—is an example of an educational institution for the benefit of the town or its inhabitants. The third is the Kendal Public Free Library, and that is an example of another institution of the town of Kendal of a public character and for the general benefit of the town and those inhabiting it. The testator describes himself as of Kendal, and his obvious intention was to benefit the town in which he dwelt. In my opinion, the benefits conferred by clause 8 are (as a matter of construction) limited to general or public purposes for the town of Kendal and the persons dwelling in that town. Now a gift for public purposes in a specified locality is a valid charitable trust; although a gift for public purposes generally is void as being so general and undefined that it cannot be executed by the court. Vezey v. Jamson, 1 S. & St. 69, is an instance of the latter class of gift. This decision of Sir John Leach's was referred to with approval by Lord Davey in Hunter v. Attorney-General, 47 W. R. 673, [1889] A. C., at p. 323. Lord Davey there said that there is a long series of authorities extending from Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves., p. 399, 10 Ves. 321, to In re Macduff, 45 W. R. 154, [1896] 2 Ch. 451, in which it has been held "that where charitable purposes are mixed up with other purposes of such a shadowy and indefinite nature that the court cannot execute them (such as 'charitable or benevolent' or 'charitable or philanthropic' or 'charitable or pious' purposes), or where the description includes purposes which may or may not be charitable (such as 'undertakings of public utility'), and a discretion is vested in the trustees, the whole gift fails for uncertainty." The cases of Blair v. Duncan, 50 W. R. 369, [1902] A. C. 37, where the gift was "for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper," and Grimond v. Grimond, [1905] A. C. 124, 53 W. R. Dig. 184, where the gift was to and among "such charitable or religious institutions and societies" as the trustees might "select," may be mentioned as subsequent authorities of the same series as that to which Lord Davey referred. The reason why a trust for public purposes generally is void was pointed out by the Lord Chancellor in Grimond v. Grimond. He said: "The testator here has not given a class from which he allowed his trustees to select individually, but he has left his directions so vague that it is in effect giving someone else power to make a will for him instead of making a will for himself, which I conceive to be the objection always entertained when the directions are so extremely vague that you cannot say what it is that the testator meant. In this case the testator has not made any will himself; he has allowed someone else to make a will for him after his death, and that the law will not allow." On the other hand, a trust for public works, or objects of public utility at a particular place is sufficiently certain, definite, and limited, to be valid. In Goodman v. Mayor of Saltash, 31 W. R. 293, 7 App. Cas. 633, at p. 639, Lord Selborne stated that the fishery there in question might have been originally granted to the free burgesses of Essa, subject to a condition or proviso that the free inhabitants of ancient messuages within the borough should be entitled to fish, as they had been accustomed to do, in every year from Candlemas to Easter. He then continued: "In such a grant there would be all the elements necessary to constitute what, in modern jurisprudence, is called a charitable trust. . . . A gift subject to a condition or trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish or town, or of any particular class of such inhabitants, is (as I understand the law) a charitable trust." There are many instances in the books in which such gifts have been held to be valid charitable trusts. In Mitford v. Reynolds, Ph. 185, the testator left "the remainder of his property to the Government of Bengal, to be applied to charitable beneficial and public works at and in the city of Dacca, in Bengal, for the exclusive benefit of the native inhabitants in such a manner as they and the Government might regard as most conducive to that end." Lord Lyndhurst held that such bequest was a valid charitable bequest, within all the authorities; and referred to the case of Jones v. Williams (Ambler, 651) before Lord Camden, where there was a bequest of £1,000 to supply water to the town of Chepstow for the use of the inhabitants, which was considered a charitable bequest within the statute of Elizabeth, and to the case of Howse v. Chapman, 4 Ves. 542, where Lord Loughborough decided that a gift for the improvement of the city of Bath was, from its general nature, a good charitable bequest. Again, in Dolan v. Macdermott, the bequest was "for such charities and other public purposes as lawfully might be in the parish of Tadmarton, in the county of Oxford." It was objected that the gift was bad on two grounds—first, because it was for public purposes, which were not charitable, and, secondly, because these purposes were simply defined to be in the parish, and not for the benefit of it, and that the gift was therefore too wide. Lord Romilly, however, pointed out that, although the will made a distinction between "charities" and "public purposes," yet numerous public purposes, such as mending or repairing the roads of a parish, supplying water for the inhabitants of the parish, making or repairing bridges over any stream or any culvert that might be required in the parish, although they are public purposes in the ordinary sense of the term, as distinguished from charities like almsgiving charities, and the like, yet are in a legal sense charities, as they are all charities within the statute of Elizabeth. Therefore, if the testator meant to promote public purposes for the benefit of the parish of Tadmarton, they were charities which could be carried into execution and were sufficiently defined. He then held that the words of the gift meant "for such public purposes for the benefit of the parish of Tadmarton as my trustees shall think fit," and that the gift was accordingly valid. This decision was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) on appeal (17 W. R. 3, L. R. 3 Ch. 676). He said it was clear that the testator, when he used the word "charities," did not point to private charities, because he accompanied the term with the words "and other public purposes," evidently implying that the word first used meant public charities. Therefore, that the will meant that the residue was to be laid out for the benefit of the parish of Tadmarton in "public charities," using that term in the popular sense, and in other public purposes ejusdem generis, being charities within the statute of Elizabeth and the technical doctrine of the court, although not within the popular meaning of the word "charities." That case bears a close resemblance to the present, and in principle is in no way distinguishable from it. There is one other case to which I will refer, as it is closely in point: Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Wrexham v. Tamplin, 21 W. R. 768. The testator there bequeathed to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Wrexham "a legacy or sum of £1,000, to be spent and applied in the discretion of the said mayor and the corporation in the best way, for the use or benefit of the said borough town or of the inhabitants thereof, or of the institutions in the said borough." The question was whether this was a good charitable gift. In opposition to the gift, reliance was placed on the alternate words "or of the institutions in"; and it was contended that there was nothing to limit the institutions to charitable institutions, in the legal sense of the term, but that the gift might be applied to a club or a co-operative store, and that, as consistently with the will the gift might be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the gift was bad. Wickens, V.C., however, decided otherwise. He thought it was clear that public institutions were meant, and that to hold that the expression might include a private institution would be to do what is deprecated by Lord Cairns in Dolan v. Macdermott; that the practical rule is whether, on the fair and natural construction of the words used, all the purposes are charitable or public purposes. If so, the gift would be good; and he held it to be so in that case. I am of the same opinion in the present case, and determine that the whole of the gift in question contained in clause 8 of the will is a valid charitable gift.

Practice—Originating summons—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 54a, rr. 1, 4—Construction—Jurisdiction—Questions of fact.

An executor handed over securities to a legatee by a deed of 1897 upon terms which included a guarantee by the executor that until the 31*st of December*, 1903, the securities should be of a certain value. The legatee mortgaged his interest in the estate by a deed which did not mention the guarantee. The mortgagees, by a deed which recited the guarantee, sold the mortgaged property to L., who brought an action in the King's Bench Division against the executor claiming the alleged difference between the amount realized and the guaranteed value of the securities. By agreement the action was dropped and another action was brought in the Chancery Division. A deed was then executed by the mortgagees conveying all the premises comprised in the mortgage, by way of confirmation to L. L. then discontinued his action and took out an originating summons asking for a declaration that, according to the true construction of the deeds, the benefit of the guarantee had been assigned to and vested in him, and for an account.

Held, that inasmuch as questions both of fact and of construction were involved, and a decision of the questions of construction would not, in whichever way they were decided, necessarily put an end to the litigation, an originating summons under order 54a was not the proper mode of procedure.

Originating summons.

The respondent to the summons, W. Hatfield Green, was the executor and trustee of a will under which his nephew, W. J. Hatfield Green, took an interest. Some doubt arose as to how far the gift to the nephew took effect, and by a deed of the 10th of December, 1897, W. Hatfield Green agreed to transfer certain securities to him. The nephew released the uncle except in respect of two items of property, indemnified him against claims by next-of-kin, and charged the transferred securities for that purpose. The certificates of the securities were to be held by the uncle during the continuance of the charge. The charge was to exist until the 31st of December, 1903, when, if no claim had been made by other persons, the uncle was to hand over the certificates to the nephew, and the uncle guaranteed that the annual income from the securities should be £123 1s. 8d. at least until the 31st of December, 1903, and that the aggregate value of the securities should then be not less than £2,461 13s. 6d.

The nephew executed a mortgage for £200 on the 9th of March, 1898, of all his estate and interest in the testator's estate and under the deed of the 10th of December, 1897, to F. Austin and J. A. Holdsworth. This mortgage recited in part the will and the deed of the 10th of December, 1897, but did not mention the guarantee. On the 29th of April, 1898, the nephew mortgaged the same property to the same mortgagees to secure another sum of £200. The guarantee was not referred to in this mortgage. By a deed of the 24th of March, 1899, which recited the will, the deed of the 10th of December, 1897, including the guarantee, and the two mortgages, Austin and Holdsworth, in consideration of £800, conveyed to the applicant, J. D. B. Lewis, "all the premises comprised in and assigned by the hereinbefore recited indentures of the 9th day of March, 1898, and the 29th day of April, 1898, as the same are more particularly described in the first schedule hereto," and all the interest of the nephew under the will. No reference to the guarantee was contained in the schedule.

Lewis issued a writ in the King's Bench Division on the 4th of November, 1904, against W. Hatfield Green, claiming £1,476 10s. 6d. under the guarantee, alleged to be the difference between the guaranteed value of the capital and income, and the amounts received and realized. The respondent pointed out that it was an inconvenient action to try in the King's Bench Division. That action was accordingly discontinued, and the costs were by agreement made costs in Chancery proceedings which it was arranged to commence. Lewis proposed to proceed by originating summons, but the respondent's solicitors replied that questions of fact would arise, and that the proper course was by writ. Accordingly on the 26th of November, 1904, Lewis issued a writ in the Chancery Division.

On the 3rd of January, 1905, Austin and Holdsworth executed a deed conveying and assigning to Lewis by way of confirmation all the premises comprised in the mortgages.

On the 10th of January, 1905, Lewis served notice discontinuing the Chancery action, and took out an originating summons under order 54*a* against W. Hatfield Green asking for a declaration that according to the true construction of the above-mentioned deeds the benefit of the guarantee had been assigned to and was vested in him. The respondent's solicitors protested against this change of procedure, but Lewis persisted, and the summons now came on for hearing.

H. Terrell, K.C., and C. Church, for Lewis.

Rowden, K.C., and Sargant, for the respondent.

WARRINGTON, J., after stating the above facts, said: This summons is issued under the Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 54*a*, r. 1, which provides this: "In any division of the High Court, any person claiming to be interested under a deed, will, or other written instrument may apply by originating summons for the determination of any question of construction arising under the instrument, and for a declaration of the rights of the persons interested." Then there are provisions for service which I need not mention, and rule 4 is as follows: "The court or judge shall not be bound to determine any such question of construction if in their or his opinion it ought not to be determined on originating summons." In the first place, the order is confined to questions of construction. Of course, in a sense, every question of construction may involve some question of fact. It may be a question about which there is no dispute, but in order to raise any question of construction some facts must be proved or admitted. But for all that, the order is confined to enabling the court to decide questions of construction and nothing else, and the order does not enable the court to grant any relief, it can only determine the question of construction, and declare the rights of the parties. So in any case I could not order the account to be taken which is asked for by the summons.

This originating summons now comes on for hearing, and the objection is at once renewed which was made as soon as it was issued, that the procedure under order 54*a* is not the appropriate procedure. What is said is this: "The construction of the deeds will not settle the matter, because on a case of mixed fact and law I, the respondent, have another defence to the action—namely, that the deed of the 3rd of January, 1905, in the circumstances which I shall prove when the action comes on for trial, was in fact and in law, quite independently of construction, ineffectual to pass the benefit of the guarantee to the applicant. Further than that, I shall say also when the matter comes on for trial that, even assuming that the benefit of the guarantee has passed to the applicant, I, the respondent, have a complete answer to the action, arising partly from the conduct of the person to whom the guarantee was given; and, further, I have also a complete answer, because I shall have to call upon the applicant to prove damages for breach of the guarantee, which he will not be able to establish."

Now under those circumstances, the applicant persists in asking me to determine these questions of construction. In my opinion I ought not to do so.

It seems to me that under such circumstances as those under which this summons was issued order 54*a* is not the appropriate mode of procedure. The result will be this: The court may, after considerable litigation, involving an argument in a court of first instance, an argument in the Court of Appeal, and possibly an argument in the House of Lords, come ultimately to the decision that on the questions of construction raised by this summons the applicant is right. Well, what then? No relief can be given on that. There are other points which have to be decided. They can only be decided by bringing an action, and in that action it may turn out that, notwithstanding the applicant is right on the questions of construction, he is ultimately found to be wrong. The respondent will have had to pay all the expenses of the litigation on the question of construction, which will be utterly useless. It seems to me that where one finds circumstances such as I find here the procedure under order 54*a* is improper. It is only intended to enable the court to decide questions of construction where the decision of those questions, whichever way it may go, will settle the litigation between the parties. It is not intended that questions of construction which, if they are decided in one way only will settle the dispute between the parties, should come up for decision on an originating summons. It would be most inconvenient to resort to the order in a case where it is quite uncertain what may be the ultimate decision on the point of construction, and where, if the decision is in one way, it involves further litigation. I think the summons in this case is misconceived, and, having regard to the warning which the applicant had from the respondent's solicitors, I think the only thing I can do is to refuse to make any order on the summons, except to order the applicant to pay the costs of it.

GILBERT v. JONES. (a.)

Common lodging-house—No charge made for lodging—Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851—London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902, Part I.

The Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, being a sanitary Act, it is immaterial that any institution be carried on for gain, or that any charge be made to the inmates for the purpose of bringing the institution within the provisions of the Act.

The principle laid down in Logsdon v. Booth, 48 W. R. 266, [1900] 1 Q. B. 401, and Logsdon v. Trotter, 48 W. R. 365, [1900] 1 Q. B. 617, followed.

Case stated by one of the Metropolitan police magistrates sitting at the Worship-street police-court.

On the 15th of November, 1904, two informations were preferred by the respondent against the appellant (a) for that he, the appellant, on the 1st of November, 1904, at a house known as the Providence-row Night Refuge, Crispin-street, Stepney, being a person having, or acting in, the care or management of the said house as a common lodging-house did, contrary the provisions of the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, when required by Horatius Arthur Jury, an officer of the local authority under the said Act, refuse to give him free access to the said house or any part thereof; and (b) for that he, the appellant, on the 1st and 2nd of November, 1904, did keep the same house as a common lodging-house and receive lodgers therein without having applied for and obtained a licence under Part IX. of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902.

The appellant was convicted on the said informations and ordered to pay a fine of 1s. on each information, the magistrate having decided that the case came within the decisions of Logsdon v. Booth,

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

48 W. R. 266, [1900] 1 Q. B. 401, and Logsdon v. Trotter, 48 W. R. 365, [1900] 1 Q. B. 617, and that therefore the house in question was a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Acts above referred to. The question for the consideration of the court was whether he was right in so deciding.

The following proved or admitted facts at the trial appeared from the case stated: That the appellant kept the said house. That H. M. Jury, the officer above referred to, was refused access to the said house by the appellant on the date named. That the appellant had not applied for a licence in respect of the said house under Part IX. of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902. That the persons admitted to the said house were destitute and of the very poorest class, but in other respects did not differ from the class who habitually frequent the cheapest common lodging-houses. That the persons admitted to the said house were, while they were in the said house, treated and dealt with in a manner similar to that in which the habitual frequenters of common lodging-houses are dealt with and treated, and that on the night of the 1st of November, 1904, about 150 men and seventy women slept in the said house. That the persons admitted slept in bunks placed in open dormitories, each dormitory containing about seventy persons: that separate dormitories were provided for men and for women. That each person admitted to the said house was provided with supper and breakfast; and that these meals were taken by such persons together in common rooms. That the said house was clean, well kept and well conducted. That the said house was known as the "Dormitory" among those admitted to it and others of the same class, to distinguish it from the ordinary houses used by frequenters of common lodging-houses. That no payment of any kind was made by or on behalf of any of the persons admitted Ricketts, for the appellant.—It is entirely contrary to the ordinary meaning of a common lodging-house to include a house of this description, where no payment is made. [He read definitions from all the standard dictionaries.] In both the Logsdon cases some payment was required, and that was sufficient to bring the houses there within the received meaning of a common lodging-house. Both the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, and the City of London Sewers Act, 1885, can be usefully referred to, where it will be seen that "hire" is a term of the definition in each case: It will be argued here that the Act of 1851 is a sanitary Act, and therefore the fact that a payment is or is not made is immaterial; but it must be remembered that it is also strongly a penal Act, and therefore a most rigid construction is demanded. If I chose out of charity to open my kitchen for the accommodation of certain guests chosen on account of their destitute condition, would it be using ordinary language to describe it as common lodging-house?

Avory, K.C. (Walter Ryde with him), for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It is contended that we ought to place a different construction upon this case than was applied in the two cases referred to by the magistrates, and say that if no charge at all is made to the guests then none of the provisions of the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, apply. We must not fritter away the decisions in those cases. There had been a previous decision of Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., and Mathew, J., to the effect that if the undertaking was not carried on for the purpose of gain it was not a common lodging-house. That decision was closely considered by Lord Russell, L.C.J., and the other judges who constituted the court in Logsdon v. Booth, and they came to the conclusion that the fact that the institution was a charitable one, was not sufficient to differentiate the case so as to exempt it from the provisions of the Act. It was a strong case, because it overruled the previous case. That was further considered and approved in Logsdon v. Trotter. Now, as the question of gain is not material to the distinction, as it has in fact nothing to do with the question, I can see no difference between the case where a small payment is made, not intended to go into the pocket of the owner of the house, and the case where no payment at all is made. These are sanitary Acts. There is no intention to interfere with the work done by such institutions. But from the point of view of a sanitary Act I can see no distinction between this case and the cases to which I have called attention. I think the magistrates were right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

REX v. DRINKWATER. (a.)

Licensing law—Removal of licence—Power to attach conditions to licence—Licensing Acts, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 50; 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 22; and 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 4, sub-section 2.

Section 4, sub-section 2, of the Licensing Act, 1904, does not apply to orders for removal of a licence, and licensing justices are, therefore, not entitled under that section to attach conditions to an order for removal, securing the monopoly value of an on-licence to the public.

Rule nisi for a mandamus.

The rule called upon seven justices of the peace in and for the city of Coventry, being the licensing committee for the city, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to hold an adjournment of the general annual licensing meeting, and to hear and determine the matter of an application by Arthur Augustus Wincott that the licence theretofore granted in respect of a house and premises in Far Gosford-street, Coventry, known as the Hare and Hounds, might be removed to a house about to be erected upon a piece of land at Bramble-street, Coventry.

The following facts appeared from the affidavit of Mr. Wincott: At the general licensing meeting, held on the 8th of February, 1905, Wincott applied for an order under section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874, for the provisional removal of the existing full on-licence of the Hare and Hounds, of which he was the owner, to a house and premises about to be erected at Bramble-street on land of which he was one of the owners.

The justices refused the application, and the following minute of their decision was drawn up and read out by the justices' clerk: "We are of opinion that upon the facts proved the removal of the Hare and Hounds to the proposed new site would be of public advantage, and should be permitted by the licensing justices. Acting, however, upon the opinion of their legal adviser, Mr. Wilks, the licensing justices consider they cannot make the order asked for, except as upon an application for a new licence."

An affidavit in opposition to the rule was sworn by Mr. A. H. Drinkwater, the chairman of the licensing committee, as follows: "Upon the evidence before us we considered that a case had been made out for the provisional grant of a licence to premises to be constructed in Bramble-street, and that the removal or doing away with the licence to the said premises in Far Gosford-street would be an advantage. Although we had no specific evidence on the point, we were satisfied from our own knowledge of the district that the removal of the licence . . . would be a very great pecuniary gain to the applicant, and we were not disposed to make an order sanctioning the removal of the licence unless the pecuniary gain so acquired should be secured in the interests of the public. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that we had no power to attach any conditions as to requiring payment of the monopoly value in the making of an order sanctioning the removal of the licence. We were, however, advised that we have the same power to make an order sanctioning the removal of such licence as we have to grant a new licence; and as licensing justices in the grant of a new on-licence have power to attach to the grant of the licence such conditions both as to payments to be made and as to any other matters they think proper in the interests of the public, we consider that an order sanctioning the removal of such a licence should not be made unless some such conditions should be attached to the order, requiring, inter alia, a payment to be made by the applicant. We did not go into the question of amount, as we had no evidence before us to enable us to fix what the amount should be. As the applicant wanted an order sanctioning the removal free of all conditions as to payment we refused the application."

Avory, K.C., and W. Mackenzie, for the respondents, showed cause against the rule nisi.—The justices had under section 4, sub-section 2, of the Licensing Act, 1904, the same power to attach conditions to the making of an order or provisional order for the removal of an on licence as they would have had if the application had been for a new on-licence. Section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1892, gives the justices the same power to sanction a removal as they have to grant a new licence, and the definitions of new licence in section 74 (now repealed) and section 32 of the Act of 1874 cover the case of a removal of a licence.

Pickford, K.C. (Bruce Williamson and H. Maddocks with him) in support of the rule.—For thirty years a statutory distinction has existed between removal of licences and granting of new licences. The words in section 50 of the Act of 1872 were inserted to give the justices full discretion. Section 4, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1904 does not apply to removals at all.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. If the grounds of the justices' decision were as stated in the affidavit in support of the rule, that they could not make an order for the provisional removal of the licence in question except as upon an application for a new licence, the matter would be almost too clear for argument, because their decision would be that the old law in regard to removal of licences was altered and that an application to remove the licence to a place which has not been previously licensed could only be dealt with as an application for a new licence. Such a decision would obviously go too far. It would be going much too far to say that in every case of an application to remove a licence no questions as to the value of the property, or as to new and improved conditions in respect of the new premises, or as to the desirability of removing the licence from a place where there are too many licensed premises to a place where there are few or none, and the like, may be considered, but that the application must be dealt with only as though it were an application for a new licence, and the fact that there was an existing licence must be wholly disregarded. To say that would, in my view, be to repeal the whole of the legislation in respect of the removal of licences. I confess I have difficulty in reconciling the affidavit made by one of the justices with the minute of their decision read out by their clerk; but it may be, as suggested, that they meant to say that they thought they were bound to deal, or had power to deal, with the application for a removal order upon the same basis and from the same point of view as if it were an application for the grant of a new licence, and that they were bound to impose, or entitled to impose, conditions upon the applicant for a removal, in order to secure a pecuniary gain for the benefit of the public. Whichever view they took, the state of the law as regards this matter is, in my opinion, this: There have been parallel lines of legislation, one with respect to orders sanctioning the removal of licences, and the other with respect to granting new licences. I agree that to a great extent the same considerations had to be applied to the one as to the other exercise of jurisdiction. In both cases it was necessary to consider the convenience of the public, the fitness of the premises, and other like matters. It is true that section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, says: "Subject as aforesaid, such justices shall have the same power to make an order sanctioning such removals as they have to grant new licences"; but I think there is something to be said for the view that, section 50 being the enabling section, some such words were required, and the insertion of them does not, to my mind, warrant the contention that the "same power" means that the justices' power is to make an order sanctioning a removal under all the circumstances, and exactly in the same way as in the case of a new licence. Again, section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874, which enabled orders to be made for provisional removal, does not seem to me to destroy the argument that the legislation has run on parallel lines in respect of the power of making orders for removal and provisional removal, and in respect of grants of new licences, and that an absolute discretion has been preserved to the justices with regard to making these removal orders. Passing to the Licensing Act, 1904, it involves difficulties of construction which must be solved to a large extent by keeping in view its main object and extent, which were to give a value to existing licences, to secure them to the holders, and to secure for the benefit of the public the monopoly value of new licences. Section 4, sub-section 2, provides that the justices "on the grant of a new on-licence" may attach conditions to the grant. The language, therefore, does not in terms include within its operations an order sanctioning the removal of a licence, and it is a fair argument that, if the Legislature had meant to bring both classes of jurisdiction within the operation of that one section and make them subject to one condition, you would expect to find express words in the section such as "either on the grant of a new on-licence or on the removal of an existing on-licence," and the interpretation clause (section 9, sub-section 4) to some extent supports that view, because, in defining what is a "new on-licence" and an "existing on-licence" it draws a clear distinction between licences which were not in existence at the date of the passing of the Act, and licences which were in existence at that date. There is another consideration, which, though not conclusive, has some weight in enabling us to determine whether section 4, sub-section 2, relates to and includes the case of a removal of a licence. Clause (a) of sub-section 2 deals with the question of monopoly value represented by the difference between the value which the premises will bear, in the opinion of the justices, when licensed, and the value of the same premises if they were not licensed. It is difficult to see how, if that is the problem to be dealt with and solved, the element that an existing on-licence has been removed from another house can properly enter into the calculation. In the case of the removal of an existing licence the public cannot be intended to get the monopoly value in respect of the new house as if there had been no licence in existence; they are only entitled to the monopoly value on the grant of a new licence. That, in my opinion, points to the conclusion that an order sanctioning the removal of an existing licence involves different considerations from those which arise with respect to the grant of a new licence, and supports the argument that the words "on the grant of a new licence" ought not to be construed as equivalent to "on the removal of an existing licence" simply because by earlier legislation the same powers were given to justices to make orders for removal as were given to them to grant new licences. I am therefore of opinion that upon an application for the removal of a licence the justices have not the power to impose the condition given to them in respect of granting new licences by section 4, sub-section 2, of the Licensing Act, 1904. I wish, however, to say that I do not indicate or suggest that the justices have not a discretion as to whether they will or will not make an order sanctioning the removal; and, speaking for myself, I think they are entitled and ought to take into consideration the circumstance, if it exists, that a great pecuniary gain would be conferred upon the applicant, and the public would lose that pecuniary gain, which might have been preserved to them if the application had been for the grant of a new licence. It must not be thought, therefore, that I suggest that the justices have not a discretion to refuse to make a removal order upon that ground amongst others. It is a matter for them to take into consideration, but they must consider it with reference to the question of making or refusing to make the removal order, and they must not attach conditions which they have no power to attach under the statute. The rule must be made absolute, and the justices must deal with the question of making or refusing the order for removal on its merits when it comes before them.

ADAMS v. SHADDOCK. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Engineering work—Tramway, alteration of—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A workman was employed by a contractor who had entered into a contract with a telephone company to carry telephone wires across and under a certain street. The telephone company had statutory power to carry the wires under the street. Two tramway lines, one up and one down, were laid along the street. The contractor made a trench from one side of the street as far as the outside rail of the down line, and also a trench in the space between the up and down lines, and was proposing to connect these two trenches by means of a hole under the down line for the purpose of carrying the wires. One of his workmen was engaged in making the hole by means of an iron bar when a passing tramcar killed him. His widow claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, upon the ground that at the time of the accident the deceased workman was employed on or about engineering work—namely, the alteration of the tramway. The county court judge found that the work was not an alteration of the tramway, and that the Act did not apply.

Held (by Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J., Romer, L.J., dissenting), that the space between the up and down lines was part of the tramway, and that, as there was a physical alteration in the surface of the street at that place, the deceased man was employed on or about the alteration of the tramway, and the Act applied.

Appeal from an award made by Judge Lush-Wilson, K.C., under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 at the Plymouth County Court.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman who was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The workman was in the employment of a contractor who had entered into a contract with a telephone company to carry a telephone wire across and underneath a road at Devonport along which an electric tramway was laid. The telephone company were acting under their statutory powers in having the wire laid across the road. There were two lines of tramway along the road, one up and one down. The contractor's workmen dug a trench for the telephone wire from one side of the road up to within about two feet of the outside rail of the down tramway line and also a trench in the space between the up and down lines, and it was intended to dig a similar trench on the far side of the up line to the opposite side of the road. It was intended to connect these trenches by holes or tunnels under the up and down lines. The deceased man was employed by the contractor in making a hole or tunnel with an iron bar under the down set of lines so as to connect the trench outside the rails with the trench between the up and down lines, when he was killed by a passing tramcar. The working of the tramway was not stopped or interfered with by the work.

His widow claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, upon the ground that the deceased man at the time of the accident was employed "on or in or about engineering work"— namely, the "alteration of a railroad," within section 7 of the Act, a tramway having been held in Fletcher v. London United Tramways Co., 50 W. R. 597, [1902] 2 K. B. 269, to be a "railroad" within the meaning of that word in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act.

The county court judge held that the employer was not liable upon the grounds, first, that the words "work of alteration of a railroad" must probably be confined to work undertaken by or for and on behalf of the proprietors of the railroad, and was not intended to and could not include a collateral operation by or for and on behalf of a stranger in pursuance of an independent right, even though the operation might to some extent interfere with the railroad; and, secondly, that the work in question was not an alteration of a railroad. Putting it at its highest, the work could only be described as an interference with or alteration of the soil on which the rails rested. The proprietors of the tramway did not own such soil. They merely had a restricted right of user or easement over such soil. The property of the tramway company was not in any way altered by reason of the work. The result was that the deceased man was not employed on or in or about engineering work, and that therefore the applicant had no remedy under the Act. He accordingly made an award in favour of the employer.

The applicant appealed.

John Sankey, for the applicant.—The deceased workman was, at the time of the accident, employed on or in or about the alteration of the tramway, that is to say, a railroad, within the definition of engineering work in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The tramway includes the concrete and made soil upon which the rails rest, and also the space between the up and down lines. The repair of that part of the road is, by section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870, imposed upon the owners of the tramway. The digging of the trench between the up and down lines was an alteration of the tramway. The county court judge arrived at his conclusion of fact by means of a misdirection.

He referred to Coles v. Anderson, 21 Times L. R. 204.

W. Shakespeare, for the employer.—The decision of the county court judge that the deceased workman was not employed on or in or about the alteration of the tramway was a decision upon a question of fact, and this court cannot disturb it unless there is no evidence to support it. The mere opening of the road between the up and down lines cannot be described in popular language as an alteration of the tramway. It did not in any way interfere with or affect the working of the tramway or the tramway lines. There was no intention on the part, either of the telephone company, which had statutory power to open up the road, or of the contractor to touch the tramway. It is impossible to say that there is no evidence to support the finding of the county court judge. Moreover, the decision was right. It has not been proved that the tramway company are bound by section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870, to repair the part of the road between the up and down lines, because there is no evidence that the distance between those sets of lines is not more than four feet. Therefore no argument can be based upon the obligation of the tramway company to repair that part of the road.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is one of the numerous conundrums which the Act calls upon us to solve, and I cannot say that I have formed a very clear or entirely satisfactory judgment in the matter, particularly in view of the fact that the members of the court are not at one upon the point. I have not arrived at a conclusion with any great degree of certainty, because the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, does not admit of any very certain conclusion in the interpretation of its definitions. The workman here was employed by a contractor who had entered into a contract with a telephone company to carry a telephone wire across and under a public high road upon which tramway lines were laid. The deceased man was engaged on that work, and the question is whether he was engaged on "engineering work" within the Act. Employment on "engineering work" is one of those employments which come within the Act. Section 7, sub-section 2, defines engineering work, so far as material, as meaning "any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad." In this particular case the work which the workman was employed to do was not work with which the tramway company were concerned. The work was undertaken by strangers to the tramway company, who had statutory powers to carry the wire across and under the roadway. The contractor made a trench up to, or rather nearly up to—that is to say, to within about two feet of the outer tramline, at right angles thereto, and then, instead of continuing the trench, he made a small tunnel to carry the wire under one set of tramway lines and the road between those lines to the space between the up and down lines. In that intervening space between the up and down lines he made another trench, and then again he intended to make a tunnel under the other set of lines to carry the wire under those lines until it arrived outside the lines altogether, and then to make another trench to carry the wire to the other side of the road. That work undoubtedly involved an alteration of the physical condition of the surface of the roadway between the up and down lines of tramway. The contractor had in point of fact to cut an opening in the road which was part of the high road upon which the tramway was laid. The deceased workman was employed upon that work. The question is whether he was employed on or in or about engineering work, that is to say, the work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad—namely, a tramway. We have to apply that definition; and I think that we are justified in looking at the scheme of the Act, which is to single out certain classes of employment and to place workmen engaged in those employments under the protection of the Act. It was obviously intended by the Legislature that there should be some distinction between different employments. It looks probable that the Act contemplates different elements of danger in different employments, and those employments which the Legislature thought to have special elements of danger were brought within the Act. Obviously the governing notion is that the work must be such as will bring the man employed upon it into specially dangerous relations. Therefore, by whomsoever the workman is employed, whether by the tramway owners or by somebody else, if he is employed upon work which entails a physical alteration of the railroad, in the present case a tramway, the employment is brought within the line of danger, and is one of the employments to which the Act extends its protection. In this case there was a physical alteration made in the surface of the road along which the tramway lines are laid, and the question is whether that can be described as a work of alteration of a railroad within the meaning of the Act. The argument that the definition of engineering work does not cover the particular work in question is mainly founded upon this, that the intervening space between the up and down lines of tramway, being upon the high road, is not part of the railroad within the meaning of the definition.

Properly speaking, the term railroad, when applied to a statutory tramway such as the one in question, might not embrace that part between the rails, but might be limited to the rails themselves. Inasmuch as the surface upon which the tramway was laid was originally part of the highway, and remains part of the highway, it was originally repairable by the highway authority, and now by statute it is only made repairable in the first instance by the tramway company, leaving with the highway authority the underlying obligation, or at all events the right, of themselves intervening and doing the repair, if the tramway company neglect to repair, upon giving the company a certain notice. It is contended that that part of the road between the up and down lines cannot, therefore, be described as part of the railroad, and that a person employed on or about the alteration of that part of the road cannot be said to be employed on or about the alteration of a railroad. I have come to the conclusion, not without hesitation and difficulty, that the definition must be taken to embrace the work which was done in this particular case, and which undoubtedly did involve an alteration of the physical condition of that part of the road where the tramway is laid. The question comes to this, was the alteration of the part of the road between the up and down lines of rails an alteration of a railroad? What does the word railroad embrace? Taking the word railroad as expressing what the ordinary man in the street would consider would come within that term, there are many things called railroads quite apart from what is included in the word "railway." It has been decided that a tramway comes within the term railroad. We are told by the House of Lords to give to the words of the Act a practical common-sense meaning, and not to put a strained or artificial construction upon them. It seems to me that the word "railroad" as applied to those old private tramways which existed before the Tramways Act, 1870, and which were common in certain colliery districts, would in ordinary parlance include the roadway upon which the tramway was laid as well as the rails upon which the wheels ran, and the whole thing, roadway and rails, would be included in the term railroad. It seems to me that in such a case an alteration of the space covered by the tramway would be an alteration of the railroad within the definition in the Act. Applying that to the present case, if the carrying of the wire involved the digging of a trench in the roadway between the up and down lines of the tramway, it seems to me that it would be an alteration of the railroad. I do not think that the case can depend upon whether or not there is an obligation upon the tramway company to repair that part of the highway. If that part of the highway can be fairly described as part of the railroad, it does not matter upon whom the obligation of repair rests. The workman was, by virtue of his employment, brought upon that thing, in respect of which the Legislature deems it right that there shall be special protection. He was employed on engineering work, although the tramway company were not the undertakers. The person who employed him was undertaking the work, which involved the physical alteration of what would, in the popular sense of the term, be deemed a railroad. It seems to me that, giving the word its fair meaning and construing it in favour of the workman, the county court judge has arrived at the conclusion in favour of the employer by a misdirection. The case seems to me to come within the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—In my opinion the county court judge has come to a right conclusion. Certainly I do not for myself see how we can properly differ from the county court judge on the conclusion of fact at which he has arrived. The judge came to the conclusion that the workman was not employed upon the alteration of a tramway, that is to say, a "railroad," within the meaning of the Act. In my opinion, it cannot be said that, because a tramway is laid upon a public highway under statutory authority, the whole of the road becomes part of the tramway, so that any alteration of any part of the road is, as a matter of law, an alteration of the tramway within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Nor, even if that part of the road between the up and down lines of the tramway has to be repaired by the tramway company (which was in fact not proved here, but I pass that by), would it, in my opinion, make that part of the road so much part of the tramway that every opening effected in that part of the road, or any dealing with it by a stranger to the tramway company, would of necessity and as a matter of law be work falling within the definition in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act as work of alteration of the tramway. In my view, in considering whether an employment is on or in or about the alteration of a tramway within the Act, the language of the Act must be construed in a common-sense view. Looking at the Act from that point of view, I ask myself whether this workman was employed upon an alteration of a railroad—that is to say, the tramway—in any fair or reasonable sense of the term as used in the Act. I can only say that, in my opinion, the workman certainly was not so employed. No alteration of the tramway was contemplated or intended, and certainly upon the evidence none was effected. The workman was employed to lay a telephone wire for the purpose of the telephonic service. Every care seems to have been taken not to interfere with the tramway or the working of the tramway. What the workman did was this. He made an opening in the road between the side of the road and a distance of about two feet from the outer rail of the tramway, and he also made an opening in the road between the up and down tramway lines, and he was making a hole or tunnel under the down line connecting the two openings above described for the purpose of carrying the wire, when the accident happened. Was that in any fair and good sense of the word an employment upon the alteration of a tramway within the meaning of the Act? My answer is, No. It had nothing to do with the tramway. The man was not employed to construct, to alter, or to repair the tramway. On the contrary, he was employed upon work which did not necessitate any alteration of the tramway, and which did not affect the tramway or its working. In my view, from the mere fact that an opening in the road between the up and down lines was made and a wire was being carried under the tramlines, which did not affect the tramway or its working, the county court judge was not bound, as a matter of law, to find that the man's employment was on or in or about the alteration of the tramway. The word "alteration" must be construed with its context—"any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer." I do not see how, upon any fair construction of the Act, it can be said that this workman was employed on the work of construction or alteration or repair of the tramway. In my opinion the county court judge's decision was right, and in any case I do not see how we can differ from him upon a question of fact where there is ample evidence to support his decision.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree with the Master of the Rolls. I have no doubt myself that this workman was at the time of the accident employed on or about the alteration of the tramway. If he was so employed he is protected by the Act. The work he was engaged upon was this: It was proposed to carry a telephone wire across and under a line of tramways in a street. That was being done by passing the wire under the down line by means of a small tunnel, then by digging a trench between the up and down lines, and then it was intended to make a tunnel under the up line, and then by means of a trench to the other side of the road. The work seems to me to be an alteration of the tramway. The tramway derived its main support from the concrete under the lines and the ballasting on each side, and that was interfered with and altered. In my opinion if the workman had been injured while engaged in filling in the trench and restoring the ground to its former condition, that would have been repair of the tramway. It appears to me that, if we apply the Act fairly, the work here was an alteration of the structure of the tramway, and therefore comes within the Act.

SCARBOROUGH v. COSGROVE. (a.)

Landlord and Tenant—Lodger—Boarding-house keeper—Negligence—Duty to take care of guest's baggage.

The plaintiffs, husband and wife, were received as guests into the defendant's boarding-house. Having valuable jewelry with them, and finding that there was only one key to their bedroom door, they asked for a second key; but they were informed by the manageress that only one key was supplied, and that it must not be taken away, and that they need be under no apprehension for the safety of their valuables, as everyone living in the house was well known. They also complained of the absence of any key to the chest of drawers in their room, but no such key was provided. The jewelry was stolen from the room by another guest, who was a thief known to the police, and who had been received by the defendant as a guest into the boarding-house without any reference.

Held, that the defendant was under some obligation to take reasonable care in the matter of the protection of the plaintiffs' goods which they had with them in the boarding-house; and that the facts raised a question for a jury whether there had not been a failure of reasonable care on the part of the defendant to which the loss of the plaintiffs' jewelry was attributable.

Per Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.—A boarding-house keeper is under an obligation to take ordinary care of his guest's baggage.

Per Romer, L.J.—A boarding-house keeper is bound to carry on his business with reasonable care, having regard to the nature and normal conduct of the business as known to the guest, or as represented to the guest by him; and if by reason of a breach of that duty on his part the guest's baggage is lost, the boarding-house keeper is liable to the guest for the loss.

Application for a new trial of an action tried before Darling, J., and a jury.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought by a husband and wife against the keeper of a boarding-house in Bayswater to recover the value of certain articles of jewelry which belonged to the plaintiffs and were stolen whilst the plaintiffs were staying in the defendant's boarding-house.

In the spring of 1904 the plaintiffs were received by the defendant into her house as boarders upon weekly terms. Shortly after their reception they called attention to the fact that there was only one key to their bedroom door. They were informed by the manageress that only one key was ever used, and they were requested by her not to take away the key after locking the door, but to leave it so that it might be possible for the servants to enter the room. They told the manageress that they had valuable property in their possession which they wished to keep under lock and key, and they asked for a second key, but she answered that they need be under no apprehension as to the safety of their valuables, as every one living in the house was well known and the servants had been there a long time. The plaintiffs remained at the boarding-house for some time and then left, but returned again in the autumn and occupied the same room. There was then a chest of drawers in the room which had not been there before, but there was no key belonging to it. The plaintiffs complained of the absence of a key to the manageress, who said she would speak to the defendant, but no key was supplied. The female plaintiff had with her a jewel case, containing jewelry, which she was in the habit of wearing, of the value of about £200. This jewel case she kept locked in a locked handbag, which she placed in one of the drawers. On the evening of the 26th of November, the female plaintiff, after having been out of doors with her husband all day, found that the handbag had been cut open and the jewel case removed. It subsequently turned out that the jewelry had been stolen by a guest staying in the boarding-house, a man named Hofer, who disappeared on the following day. It was shown that Hofer had been previously convicted on several occasions, and that he was admitted into the defendant's boarding-house without any reference. It appeared that the defendant had said, in answer to a question put to her by a police sergeant, that she never took references and she never supplied keys. The defendant had had a card printed on which she stated that the proprietor would not hold herself responsible for lost property unless it was given into her charge, but the plaintiffs did not see this card until after the robbery.

The plaintiffs alleged that the loss of the jewelry had been occasioned by a breach of duty on the part of the defendant. The breach of duty on the part of the defendant of which the plaintiffs complained was (1) the failure to provide an additional key to the bedroom door; (2) the failure to provide a key to the chest of drawers; and (3) the statement that all the defendant's guests were well known, and, notwithstanding that representation, the admission of Hofer into the boarding-house without any reference.

At the close of the plaintiffs' case on the trial of the action before Darling, J., and a jury, the learned judge held that a boarding-house keeper was under no duty to take care of his lodgers' goods unless they were handed to him for safe custody, and was therefore only liable for misfeasance. He was accordingly of opinion that there was no case to go to the jury, and he directed judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiffs applied for a new trial.

Cababé, for the plaintiffs.—The keeper of a boarding-house, though he has not the liability of an insurer, has a duty to take reasonable care in the matter of the protection of his guest's goods and chattels: Dansey v. Richardson, 3 E. & B. 144. If the subsequent case of Holder v. Soulby, 8 W. R. 438, 8 C. B. N. S. 254, is inconsistent with this, it ought not to be followed. The defendant's refusal to allow the plaintiffs to take away the key of the room, and her failure to supply a key for the chest of drawers, and her system of receiving guests into her house of whom she knew nothing, coupled with the assurance, which the plaintiffs might reasonably accept, that all the people in the house were well known, were matters which ought to have been submitted to the jury as evidence of want of reasonable care.

Duke, K.C., and Herbert Jacobs, for the defendant.—The keeper of a boarding-house has no duty to take care of his guest's goods unless they are specially given into his custody as bailee: Holder v. Soulby. In this case there were no special circumstances giving rise to such duty. Even if such duty existed, there was no evidence of a breach of it; it was not negligence on the part of the defendant either to fail to supply two keys for the room, to fail to supply a key for the chest of drawers, or to fail to make inquiries about the guests. The statement that all the people in the house were well known ought not to be treated as an assurance that there was no risk. Even if there was negligence on the part of the defendant, the proximate cause of the loss was not that negligence, but the act of the thief.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Darling, J., for the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiffs for damages for the loss of jewelry, due, as they alleged, to the negligence of the defendant, in whose boarding-house the plaintiffs were guests. It was admitted that the jewelry was stolen by another guest, who was received into the boarding-house while the plaintiffs were stopping there, and who turned out to be a thief well-known to the police. The plaintiffs had been stopping in the house some months earlier; and there was evidence that the female plaintiff had told the manageress that she had some property with her that she wished to keep under lock and key, and had asked for a second key of the bedroom door; that she had been told in answer that only one door key was supplied, and that it must not be taken away, as it was required for the purpose of giving the servants access to the room, and that the room would be perfectly safe, as the people in the house were all known. Some months later the plaintiffs came a second time to the house, and were put again into the same room, in which a chest of drawers had been in the meantime placed, but there were no keys for any of the drawers, nor was there any receptacle capable of being locked. The plaintiffs complained to the manageress, who said she would speak to the defendant. The female plaintiff had with her a jewel case containing jewelry which she required for personal use. She placed the jewel case locked in a locked satchel, which she deposited in one of the drawers. During the plaintiffs' absence from the house in the course of the day of the 26th of November the satchel was cut open and the jewel case abstracted, and it was for this loss that the action was brought.

The plaintiffs contended that the defendant was bound to take reasonable care of the persons and chattels of her guests, and that the system of one key only for the bedroom, which guests were debarred from taking away, the absence of keys for drawers, &c., alone or coupled with the fact that no steps were taken to ascertain the respectability of guests before admission, disclosed a want of due care on the part of the defendant which had led to the loss of their jewelry. Darling, J., withdrew the case from the jury, holding that to found liability in a boarding-house keeper "there must be something more than negligence, that there must be something which the law calls misfeasance, and that negligence in this case was not enough." He therefore gave judgment for the defendant. In doing so, he acted on the authority of Holder v. Soulby, 8 W. R. 438, 8 C. B. N. S. 254.

The questions, therefore, are, was the defendant exempt from liability for negligence short of misfeasance? If not, was there evidence of such negligence fit for the consideration of the jury? I think the case cited does go the full length of the proposition laid down by the learned judge; but before examining it I desire to refer to the earlier case decided in the Court of Queen's Bench which seems to me to be in conflict with it, and which I think must be admitted to be of at least equal authority—Dansey v. Richardson, 3 E. & B. 144. There the action was brought by a guest at a boarding-house for the loss of a dressing-case stolen while the plaintiff was a guest. There was evidence that the theft was facilitated by the defendant's servant having left the street door ajar. Erle, J., who tried the case, in substance directed that a boarding-house keeper was bound to exercise due and reasonable care as to the guests' property to the same extent that a prudent person would take care of her own; but he told the jury that it would not be enough to fix the defendant, if they thought the servant was negligent, unless they thought the defendant was aware of anything which made it negligent in her to keep that servant. On a rule to show cause, the court, Lord Campbell, C.J., and Coleridge, Wightman, and Erle, JJ., were, according to the headnote, agreed that a boarding-house keeper "undertakes by implication of law, although nothing is expressed, to take due and proper care of a guest's baggage," but they were divided on the question of the extent of the liability of the mistress for the servant's negligence, Wightman and Erle, JJ., holding that she was exempt unless proved to have been guilty of negligence herself, Lord Campbell, C.J., and Coleridge, J., holding that there was no distinction between the negligence of the defendant and of her servant in the course of her employment. As to the duty, therefore, there is the authority of the full court that the boarding-house keeper is bound by implication of law to take ordinary care of her guests' baggage. It is true that in the subsequent case of Holder v. Soulby." Erle, C.J., who had directed the jury as above stated, said that he "did not intend to say that a lodging-house keeper was bound to take such care of a lodger's goods as a prudent owner would take of his own property." But, even with this qualification, the first proposition affirmed in Dansey v. Richardson has the authority of three judges, at all events. Holder v. Soulby was decided on demurrer, and related to a lodging-house only, though I confess this does not seem to me to make any difference in principle. Erle, C.J., begins his judgment with these words: "In the first count the plaintiff claims to be entitled to recover on the mere relation of lodger with the landlord, and assumes that the law creates a duty on the part of the latter to take due and proper care of his lodger's goods. . . . Now it is clear that no case or treatise or judge has ever affirmed that proposition." This is strange, as six years before, Lord Campbell, C.J., in Dansey v. Richardson, 3 E. & B., at p. 164, had said, "I think that the application for a nonsuit was properly refused and that the defendant was not entitled to a verdict on the fourth plea denying that the plaintiff was received into the boarding-house with her goods on the terms mentioned in the declaration"—i.e., to take due and reasonable care of the plaintiff's goods whilst they were in the house and whilst the plaintiff was such guest for hire and reward to the defendant. "The defendant did receive the plaintiff with her goods on the terms . . . of taking due and reasonable care of her goods while they were in the said house and plaintiff remained such guest therein." Coleridge, J., says, at p. 158, "unless it can be established that the defendant was not bound to take any care, it must be admitted she was bound to take due and reasonable care. It seems to me perfectly clear she was bound to take some care, and that my brother Erle was quite right in refusing to nonsuit"; and again, at p. 159, "I agree that it"—i.e., the liability of an innkeeper—"cannot be extended in all respects to the boarding-house keeper. But the liability of this last must be measured by what is reasonable." Wightman, J., said, at p. 155, "I can find no authority for holding that a boarding-house keeper . . . is bound to take more care about the goods of his guest, which are no further given into his care than by being in his house with the guest, than he, as a prudent owner, would take in respect to his own. If he is bound to no more care than that, my brother Erle's direction seems to me to be perfectly right." The direction was as shown above. It is certainly strange that, in view of the passages which I have cited, Erle, C.J., should have made the observation which I have quoted. It seems obvious, too, that the other members of the court were under a misapprehension of the true effect of Dansey v. Richardson. Byles, J., does not allude to it at all, presumably on the ground stated by Keating, J., at p. 270: "After the explanation given by my lord, that case is clearly no authority for the maintenance of this action." But accepting Erle, C.J.'s, qualification of his own judgment, the passages I have cited from the other judgments cannot be explained away, and, unless they can be explained away, they are decisive of the main point in this case, even if it were assumed that the view of Erle and Wightman, JJ., as to the limit of the master's liability for the servant's negligence were to prevail.

The case here was withdrawn from the jury, and if the standard of the defendant's duty was reasonable care, the facts proved might have raised a question for the jury whether they did not establish personal negligence within the limits laid down by Erle and Wightman, JJ., in the manageress of the boarding-house or in defendant herself. I think, however, the court, having been equally divided on this particular aspect of the case, and Holder v. Soulby not touching it at all, we are at liberty to choose for ourselves between the two conflicting opinions. To my mind, the reasoning of Coleridge, J., and Lord Campbell, C.J., seems conclusive on the whole question, both as to the existence of the duty and the incidental responsibility of the master for the negligence of the servant delegated by the master for the performance of some part of that duty. I think there is a fallacy in the suggestion that because a boarding or lodging-house keeper does not come under the full liability of an innkeeper, he is exempt from all obligation to take care. The instance in Calye's case, 8 Co. Rep. 32, of a man "lodged with another who is not an innholder, upon request, if he be robbed in his house by the servants of him who lodged him or any other he shall not answer for it," does not establish it, and is not inconsistent with a duty to take ordinary care. The object of the illustration is merely to show that a guest lodging with another is not entitled to the same degree of protection as he would be entitled to in an inn. But the instance confers no immunity upon lodging-house keepers from such liability as would otherwise arise from their receiving into their charge for reward a guest and his baggage. Nor does there seem any reason in principle why they should be so exempt. The general control of the house must be in the keeper. By the nature of the arrangement itself the custody of the lodger's effects must be in him when the lodger is not in his room, and the consideration paid ought as a matter of business to secure some protection to the lodger where the ordinary conditions to which he is expected to conform put it out of his own power to look after his effects himself. I can see no reason why there should be a presumption of immunity in his case from the common duty of a person accepting a charge to exercise at least ordinary care; a fortiori where he undertakes it for reward. The guest and baggage are both in a house of which he has the control, and his obligations to both of them arise in the same way out of the relation itself. It seems to me that the onus lies on those who affirm there is no duty. I cannot help thinking that the notion that such is the law arises from a misunderstanding of the passage about a lodger in Calye's case, to which I have already referred.

For the reasons I have given I think Holder v. Soulby cannot countervail the authority of Dansey v. Richardson, and that the judgments of Lord Campbell, C.J., and Coleridge, J., ought to prevail where they differ from the other members of the court.

To come to the facts of this case, if the reason upon which the learned judge acted in withdrawing the case from the jury cannot prevail, I think the evidence raised a question for the jury whether there was a failure of reasonable care on the part of the defendant to which the loss of the plaintiff's jewelry was attributable. I think they were the proper tribunal to decide it, and that we should be usurping their functions if we withheld it from their consideration. I abstain from commenting further on the inferences which might be drawn from the evidence, as I am of opinion the case must go down to a new trial.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: After the full way in which the Master of the Rolls has dealt in his judgment with the cases of Dansey v. Richardson and Holder v. Soulby, I do not propose to examine in detail those cases or the judgments delivered in them. But certainly those cases have not left the law concerning the liability of a boarding-house keeper to a paying guest in respect of the latter's luggage in a perfectly settled or satisfactory state, and I think it right, therefore, to state my opinion on the subject.

One thing is clear—namely, that the liability of the landlord of the boarding-house in respect of the luggage is not co-extensive with the liability of an ordinary innkeeper; but what the extent of the liability is remains to be considered. It appears to me that, before that can be ascertained, it is necessary, at any rate to a certain extent, to inquire into the particular circumstances of each case. It may be that some of the luggage has been committed temporarily, or during the stay of the lodger, into the sole custody of the landlord. In that case, clearly, there would be a duty on the part of the landlord to take reasonable care of it. On the other hand, there may be cases where, by arrangement between the parties, the guest has taken upon himself solely the care of his luggage; and in those cases, whatever may be the duties of the landlord towards his guest, they could not be treated as based on the footing that in any sense he had the custody or partial custody of the luggage. The difficulty as to the law arises in cases like the present, which are intermediate between the two I have just mentioned, and where the luggage cannot be said to be in the sole custody of either the landlord or the guest. In the present case the luggage was placed in a room which was appropriated as a bedroom for the sole use of the guest, but the guest had not the sole control of the room. The servants of the landlord had the duty and right of coming to the room for all necessary or proper purposes of cleaning and so forth. The key of the room was committed to the care of the guest during the night, or during her visits to the room in the daytime, but at other times the key had to be in the custody of the landlord's servants. The question then arises as to what, if any, is the duty of a landlord in such a case towards his guest in respect of the care of the luggage left in the room. Now I think that it cannot be said that the landlord is under an absolute duty to take reasonable care of the luggage if by the word "care" it is implied that the landlord is in the same position as if the care and custody of the luggage had been committed solely to him. That, in my opinion cannot be implied, without further knowledge of the facts, merely from the position of a boarding-house keeper towards his paying guest; and I think this was the view taken by Erle, C.J., in the cases of Dansey v. Richardson and Holder v. Soulby, and accounts for many of the observations in his judgments. On the other hand, it appears to me not correct to say that in such a case there is not some duty by the landlord to his guest which may affect the question as to liability for loss of the luggage. Seeing that the landlord carries on his business of a boarding-house keeper for reward, I think he is bound to carry on that business with reasonable care, having regard to the nature and normal conduct of the business as known to the guest, or as represented to the guest by him; and if by reason of a breach of that duty on his part the luggage is lost I can see no reason why he should not be held liable for the loss to the guest. Now in the present action was there or not on the evidence such a sufficient case made by the plaintiffs, the guests, of such breach and consequent loss, as to call upon the defendant, the keeper of the boarding-house, for an answer? On the whole, though at one time I felt considerable doubt on the point, I have come to the conclusion that such a sufficient case was made out, so that, if the defendant did not meet it, the matter was fit for the consideration of the jury, and should have been left to them. Seeing that there is to be a new trial it is not advisable that the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff should be elaborately discussed by us. But I may say that one of the considerations which has pressed on me is that, on the evidence as it stands, unanswered at present by the defendant, the business appears to have been represented by the defendant to the plaintiffs as one where the guests staying in the house were known to the defendant, and where, consequently, there was comparatively little risk in the system adopted by the defendant in the management of the business as to only one key being kept both for the purposes of the guest and the purposes of the defendant's servants. Whereas it now appears from the evidence, as it at present stands, that the defendant admitted the guest who stole the plaintiff's chattels without any knowledge of him, and without any references or introduction, or inquiry as to his respectability. I think, therefore, there should be a new trial.

TENNANT v. STANLEY. (a.)

Will—Investment clause—"Any corporation or company, municipal, commercial, or otherwise" — Company formed or registered in the United Kingdom, but carrying on business abroad—Company formed or registered abroad.

A will authorized trustees to invest in the securities of "any corporation or company, municipal, commercial, or otherwise."

Held, (1) that the clause authorized investments in the securities of (a) any corporation or company formed or registered in the United Kingdom, though carrying on business abroad; and (b) any corporation or company formed or registered outside the United Kingdom; (2) that the expression "company" is not limited to incorporated associations.

Summons.

By his will dated the 29th day of November, 1899, Sir Henry Morton Stanley appointed Charles Coombe Tennant and Robert Bright Marston to be his executors and trustees, and after several specific and pecuniary legacies devised and bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate to his above-named trustees upon trust for conversion but with full power to postpone such conversion for so long as they should think proper without being responsible for loss. And after declaring that income arising from his estate before conversion should be treated as well during the first year after his death as afterwards as if the same were income arising from investments of the proceeds of such conversion, he directed that his trustees should after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies invest the residue of the proceeds of conversion in their names "in or upon any of the parliamentary stocks or public funds or in government securities of Great Britain or India or any British colony or dependency or any foreign country or state or upon freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or chattel real securities in Great Britain, but not in Ireland (such leasehold and chattel real securities to be upon hereditaments held for a term of which no less than fifty years should be unexpired at the date of investment) or on life interests in real or personal property, together with a policy or policies on the life on which the property is held, or in the capital stock of the Bank of England or in the stocks, funds, and securities not payable to bearer of any corporation or company, municipal, commercial, or otherwise, or in any annuity whether permanent or terminable and whether now existing or hereafter to be created the payment of which is charged on the revenues of India, or in any other mode of investment for the time being authorized by English law for the investment of trust funds," with power to vary the same. Sir Henry Stanley further directed his trustees during the joint lives of Lady Stanley and his adopted son Denzil Morton Stanley to retain out of the trust funds an annuity of £150 for the benefit of Denzil Morton Stanley and subject thereto to pay the income to Lady Stanley during her widowhood and after her re-marriage during the remainder of the joint lives of Lady Stanley and D. M. Stanley to retain the further annuity of £350 for the benefit of D. M. Stanley and subject thereto to pay the income to Lady Stanley during the remainder of her life, and after her decease to hold the trust funds as to one moiety thereof for D. M. Stanley if he should attain twenty-one years of age, and as to the other moiety thereof upon certain trusts under which a general power of appointment, determinable in certain events, was given to Lady Stanley with a gift in default of appointment to D. M. Stanley if he should attain twenty-one years of age, and subject to the preceding trusts he directed his trustees to hold the trust funds in trust for such persons as Lady Stanley should by deed or will appoint.

Sir Henry Stanley died on the 10th of May, 1904, and his will was proved by C. C. Tennant and R. B. Marston on the 29th of June, 1904.

Denzil Morton Stanley was an infant of the age of ten years or thereabouts.

This summons was taken out by the trustees for the purpose of determining (inter alia) whether the power given by the testator to his trustees to invest moneys liable to be invested under the will "in the stocks, funds, and securities not payable to bearer of any corporation or company, municipal, commercial, or otherwise," authorized the trustees to invest any such moneys in the stocks, funds, or securities not payable to bearer of (a) any corporation or company formed or registered in the United Kingdom but carrying on business abroad, or (b) any corporation or company formed or registered outside the United Kingdom.

R. J. Parker, for Lady Stanley.—Companies formed or registered in the United Kingdom, though carrying on business abroad, are clearly within the clause. The expression "company" includes any association of persons and is not limited to a corporate body, still less to a company under the Companies Acts, 1862-1900. The clause extends also to companies formed or registered abroad.

W. E. Hollams, for Denzil Morton Stanley.—It is difficult to contend that the clause does not include a company formed or registered in England though carrying on business abroad, but it does not include a company formed or registered abroad. It is impossible to say what is and what is not a company where it is formed or registered abroad. Except where it is expressly stated to the contrary, the clause only contemplates investments in the United Kingdom: In re Castlehow, [1903] 1 Ch. 354, 51 W. R. Dig. 183.

BUCKLEY, J.—No reason has been suggested why a company formed or registered in England is outside the clause because it carries on its business abroad. I think, therefore, that the first part of the question can be answered in the affirmative. The second part of the question is more difficult. Had the expression been "corporation" alone, that, it may be, would have meant a corporation according to English law. Here, however, the expression is "corporation or company." Now, the expression "company" has no strict technical meaning, but includes any unincorporated association of persons so numerous as not to be fittingly described as a firm. There is nothing in the investment clause expressly limiting it to companies formed or registered in England. Suppose I wished to speak of the New York Central Railway Co., how could I describe it but as a company and not as a firm. If I gave the expression any other construction, I would have to say that the debentures of a Canadian or American railway were not the securities of a commercial company. It was suggested that if you read the whole investment clause you will find that the investments are impliedly limited to English investments except where otherwise expressly stated, and that consequently the words before me should be also so limited. I do not think that there is any sufficient context to impose that restriction. Accordingly the trustees may invest in the securities of a company not formed or registered in England.

GIST v. TIMBRILL. (a.)

Administration—Lunatic intestate—Allowances to presumptive next-of-kin.

Sums were advanced to brothers and sisters, presumptive next-of-kin, of a lunatic intestate during his life under orders in lunacy, and were expressed to be advanced as part of the shares of such next-of-kin to which they would become entitled upon surviving the lunatic, and were directed to be taken into account if they so survived.

Held, that the children of one of the next-of-kin dying in the lifetime of the lunatic were not liable to bring into hotchpot the sums so received by their parent.

This was an originating summons taken out by the administrator of a lunatic under the following circumstances:

In 1852 Samuel Gist was found a lunatic and so remained until he died in 1904 intestate and a bachelor. His presumptive next-of-kin at the time of his lunacy were his brother, H. W. Gist, who was the plaintiff in this summons, and his three sisters, M. W. Du Pré, A. Timbrill, and E. Gist. By an order in lunacy of the 21st of March, 1874, £200 was allowed to H. W. Gist out of the income of the lunatic's estate, with no direction as to bringing this sum into hotchpot. By an order of the same date £300 a year was allowed to Mrs. Du Pré until further order to be paid out of income, and the order, after stating the consent of both Mr. and Mrs. Du Pré to the form of order then made, provided "that the sums which shall be so advanced as aforesaid shall be taken and considered as part of any share to which the said M. W. Du Pré may become entitled of and in the estate of the said lunatic at the time of his death in the event of her surviving the lunatic." Similar orders in 1875 and 1877 granted allowances to H. W. Gist and Mrs. Timbrill, and all these allowances were reduced and otherwise dealt with by subsequent orders, some of which did not contain the clauses inserted in the original orders as to bringing advances into account.

Mrs. Du Pré died in 1895, in the lifetime of the lunatic, leaving three children surviving her, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one years and survived the lunatic. Miss E. Gist died in the lifetime of the lunatic and thus, on his death in 1904, his next-of-kin were (1) H. W. Gist, (2) Mrs. Timbrill, (3) the children of Mrs. Du Pré—a brother, a sister, and three nieces of the lunatic. Under the orders in lunacy H. W. Gist had received about £8,300, Mrs. Timbrill £5,400, and Mrs. Du Pré £4,600.

This summons asked for the determination of the question whether, upon the true construction of the orders in lunacy and in the events which had happened, any and what sums advanced or paid under such orders or any of them ought to be taken and considered as advanced or paid on account and as part of, the respective shares of the plaintiff and the defendants respectively or any of them in the personal estate of the lunatic as his next-of-kin.

J. K. Young, for the plaintiff in the summons.

Micklem, K.C., and Johnston Edwards, for Mrs. Timbrill, contended that the children of Mrs. Du Pré ought to bring into hotchpot the sums advanced to their parent under the orders in lunacy as they "legally represented" their parent, and could only under the Statute of Distributions take the share to which that parent was entitled: Proud v. Turner, 2 P. Wms. 560; Lloyd v. Tench, 2 Ves. sen., p. 215.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 8.—SWINFEN EADY, J., delivered judgment as follows: The claim that Mrs. Du Pré's children are to bring into hotchpot, on the division of the estate of the intestate, the sums advanced or paid to their mother, under orders of the Court in Lunacy, is based on the contention that, under the Statute of Distributions, where the intestate has left a brother or sister surviving him, children of a deceased brother or sister stand in the place of their parent, and take only the share which their deceased parent would have taken if living; that they do not take any share in their own right, but as "legally representing" their parent, and can only receive what their parent would have received if living. The order of the Lords Justices of the 21st of March, 1874, under which moneys were paid to Mrs. Du Pré, recites the consent of Mr. and Mrs. Du Pré that the sums which should be advanced to her pursuant to that order should be taken and considered as part of any share to which she might become entitled of and in the estate of the said Samuel Gist, the lunatic, at the time of his decease in the event of her surviving the said lunatic, and the same order directs that the sums which should be so advanced are to be taken and considered as part of any share to which Mrs. Du Pré might become entitled of and in the estate of the lunatic at the time of his death, in the event of her surviving the lunatic. The contention is that if Mrs. Du Pré had survived the lunatic she would have to bring these sums into account, and as her children "legally represent" her within the meaning of the statute, they can only take the share, which she, if living, would have been entitled to. In my opinion the answer to this argument is that the children take the share to which the parent would have been entitled under the statute, and without reference to any bargain made by the parent in his lifetime, or any alienation or disposition of any expectant interest or possibility of succession. The payments to Mrs. Du Pré were payments to a person in narrow circumstances for maintenance, and as between father and child would not have been advancements by portion within the statute. There is not any provision in the statute requiring these sums to be brought into account. The order in lunacy only directs these sums to be brought into account if Mrs. Mrs. Du Pré survive the lunatic, an event which did not happen. Mr. and Mrs. Du Pré could bind the interest of the latter if she survived to take a share in the estate of the lunatic; but she could no more bind her children, on her dying in the lifetime of the lunatic, leaving a surviving brother or sister, than she could bind her children in the event of all the brothers and sisters dying in the lifetime of the lunatic, and all nephews and nieces taking equal shares per capita. With regard to the authorities, in Proud v. Turner, 2 P. Wms. 560, the deceased child would have been bound, if living, to bring into hotchpot under the statute the amount of the advancement; and as the child's issue stood in his place and stead it was decided that they were bound to bring in the like amount, as they could not be in any better position. Much reliance was placed on a passage in Lloyd v. Tench, 2 Ves. sen., p. 215: "But it is now settled that, though the children of one brother stand in place of the parent, in sharing with the other brother, and take per stirpes, yet if no brother is alive, that representation in loco parentis is at an end." This passage, however, has no reference whatever to the amount of a nephew's or niece's share being reduced by anything done in the parents' lifetime. It merely points out when a distribution between nephews and nieces is per stirpes and when per capita. The plaintiff and Mrs. Timbrill must bring into account the amounts received by them respectively, as they have agreed to do so and have survived the lunatic. The reduced amounts mentioned in the subsequent orders stand exactly on the same footing. Although the directions were not repeated in each order, the amounts allowed were in substitution for the previous allowances, and must be taken to have been made on the same footing. The first advance to the plaintiff—namely, the £200 under the order of the 21st of March, 1874—will not be brought into account, as there is no direction to that effect, and no consent or undertaking by the plaintiff in that behalf. The costs of all parties of this application are to be paid out of the estate.

ROBBINS v. WHYTE. (a.)

Mortgage—Lease by mortgagor in possession—Power to accept surrender—Concurrence of mortgagee—Action by mortgagee for recovery of rent—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 18 (1).

A lease for twenty-one years, granted by a mortgagor in possession under the statutory power conferred upon him by section 18 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, cannot be effectively surrendered so as to affect the rights of the mortgagee under the lease without the concurrence of the latter.

Trial of action.

This was an action by the mortgagee of freehold premises to recover arrears of rent due from the lessee under a lease for twenty-one years granted by the mortgagor under section 18 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and the question turned upon whether a surrender of the lease, accepted by the mortgagor without the concurrence of the mortgagee, effectually barred the claim of the latter.

By an indenture dated the 9th of September, 1889, W. M. Samson mortgaged the freehold premises No. 3, Marlborough-place, St. John's Wood, to John Robbins to secure the sum of £1,800 and interest.

By an indenture dated the 18th of February, 1892,

(a.) Reported by E. WAVELL RIDGES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Samson, under the statutory powers conferred upon the mortgagor by section 18 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, demised the mortgaged premises to Lady Ellen Bennett for the term of twenty-one years at a rental of £120 per annum.

A counterpart of this lease was executed by the lessee and delivered to the mortgagee as required by section 18 (2) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Mr. Samson died in November, 1892, having by his last will devised the mortgaged premises to his executors therein named, and this will was duly proved by the executors. Mr. Samson, until his death, and after his death his executors, continued in possession of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises down to the 22nd of February, 1905, when the executors of the mortgagee Robbins required the rent to be paid to them.

Lady Bennett died in September, 1904, having by her will appointed the defendant Whyte her sole executor.

On the 25th of November, 1904, the defendant, acting as executor of Lady Bennett, executed an indenture purporting to surrender the demised premises to the executors and devisees of Mr. Samson.

In April, 1905, the executors of the mortgagee commenced this action against the defendant as executor of Lady Bennett, claiming £60 arrears of rent due under the demise of the 18th of February, 1892. By way of defence to this action the defendant pleaded the surrender of the lease under the indenture of the 25th of November, 1904.

By section 18 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, it is provided that "a mortgagor of land while in possession shall, as against every incumbrancer, have, by virtue of this Act, power to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged land or any part thereof as in this section described and authorized."

Section 18 (3) (i.) of the same Act authorizes "an agricultural or occupation lease for any term not exceeding twenty-one years."

By section 10: "The rent reserved by a lease and the benefit of every covenant . . . shall go with the reversionary estate expectant upon the term granted by the lease."

Richard Neville, for the plaintiff.—Before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a mortgagor could not grant a lease without the concurrence of the mortgagee. All that section 18 (1) does is to give the mortgagor a power of leasing without the concurrence of the mortgagee, it does not give the mortgagor a power to accept a surrender of the lease so granted. The reversion expectant on the lease is vested in the mortgagee, and no surrender is effectual unless it be made to the person in whom that reversion is vested. Matthews v. Usher, 49 W. R. 40, [1900] 2 Q. B. 535; Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Smith, 37 W. R. 42, 22 Q. B. D. 70; Miles v. Murphy, Ir. R. 5 C. L. 382, were referred to in support of this contention.

Dunham, for the defendant.—Under section 18 the reversion is not in the mortgagee, but in the mortgagor. The Act has given the mortgagor power to make a lease, but it has left a good deal to be supplied by the imagination. The power to accept a surrender is a necessary corollary to the power to grant a lease. Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Smith is the only case cited by my learned friend which has any bearing upon this case. The facts there were not similar to the present case, and all that was decided was, that an agreement collateral to the lease made between the mortgagor and the lessee in derogation of the rights of the mortgagee was not good against the mortgagee, but that the lease itself was good and binding. The true ratio decidendi in that case was, that before the rent accrued due the property in it had passed to the mortgagee, and therefore the agreement between the mortgagor and the lessee entered into before the rent accrued due to set off the rent against moneys owing by the lessee to the mortgagor could not be a valid discharge for payment of the rent as against the mortgagee. Moreover, the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R. (22 Q. B. D., at p. 71), is in my favour. He says: "The lease being valid under section 18 against the mortgagee established a relationship between him and the tenant, but until something more is done the tenant may safely deal with the mortgagor." It would entail great hardship upon the defendant if effect were given to the plaintiff's contention.

WARRINGTON, J.—After stating the facts as above and the provisions of sections 18 and 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, proceeded: The question in this case is whether the lease made by the mortgagor still subsists in spite of the surrender of the 25th of November, 1904. Now what is the effect of section 18 of the Conveyancing Act by itself? The mortgagor, as is well known, after the execution of the mortgage has no estate in the land but only an equitable right to have the land reconveyed to himself on payment off of the mortgage debt and interest, the legal estate being vested in the mortgagee. Before the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the mortgagor had no power to grant a lease—that is to say, to carve a particular estate out of the fee simple. If he did grant a lease it operated only against himself by way of estoppel, and had no effect as against the mortgagee. What is the effect of the power of leasing conferred upon the mortgagor by section 18 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881? It gives him a power to carve a term of years out of the mortgagee's larger estate, and to render that estate a reversion expectant upon the term. But there is no authority on the point as to whether the mortgagor has power to accept a surrender of the lease. In Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Smith, 37 W. R. 42, 22 Q. B. D. 70, the facts were quite different, but it was necessary to the decision for the Court of Appeal to express its views as to the legal effect of section 18 of the Conveyancing Act. I will take the judgment of Fry, L.J. (22 Q. B. D., at p. 72), because his language is the most useful for the present purpose: "The question turns on the Conveyancing Act of 1881, and the effect of section 18 is that Davis, while in possession as mortgagor, had power to make this lease and to bind the plaintiffs. The statute in fact gives the mortgagor power to create a term out of the estate of the mortgagee, and so to convert that estate into one expectant on the term granted by the lease. That would seem to show that it was intended that the mortgagee should have the rights of a lessor under the lease. If this were not so it would follow that the mortgagee's estate would be diminished, and he be turned into a reversioner, but without any compensating rights. I find, however, in the same section evidence confirmatory of the conclusion I have arrived at, for by sub-section 11 it appears that the mortgagor is to deliver to the mortgagee a counterpart of the lease, which would be useless unless the latter has some rights under it." If that view is correct, as I think it is, the relation of lessee and reversioner was created between the lessee and the mortgagee immediately upon the execution of the lease by the mortgagor. Now, the effect of a surrender is to merge the particular estate into the larger estate out of which it was carved, and there can no be no merger unless the surrender is made to the person in whom the larger estate is vested. In this case it is vested in the mortgagee, and therefore there can be no merger unless the surrender is made to him. The result is that the surrender of the 25th of November, 1904, was inoperative in law, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the arrears of rent claimed. Judgment acccordingly.

REX AND DAVID DAVIES. (a.)

Contempt of court—Newspaper—Publication tending to prejudicial trial—Publication prior to committal to quarter sessions or assize court—Publication after committal to quarter sessions—Jurisdiction of High Court to attach.

The King's Bench Division of the High Court has a summary jurisdiction to attach for a contempt of court in respect of the publication of matter calculated to prejudice the fair trial in an inferior court, not only when, prior to committal, it is uncertain whether in the event of a committal the case will be sent to quarter sessions or the assize court, but also when the publication complained of is after committal to the quarter sessions.

Rex v. Parke, 52 W. R. 215, [1903] 2 K. B. 432, followed and extended.

Rule nisi to show cause why a writ of attachment should not issue against David Davies, the editor, printer, and publisher of a certain newspaper entitled the South Wales Daily Post, for his contempt in printing and publishing, or causing to be printed and published in the said newspaper of the 5th, 8th, 9th, and 12th days of September last respectively certain comments calculated to prejudice one Henrietta Hunter upon her trial at the next assizes for the county of Glamorgan upon a charge of the attempted murder of a certain child, and also upon a further charge of abandoning the same child.

Henrietta Hunter was first charged before the magistrate with abandoning her child on the 1st of September, and the case was remanded from time to time. On the 27th of September the Treasury intervened and she was then further charged with the attempted murder of the child.

Bankes, K.C. (Ellis Hill with him), showed cause. —The first charge made against the woman was one of abandoning the child, which, if she were committed, would almost inevitably go the quarter sessions and not to the assizes for trial, in which case the High Court would have no jurisdiction in respect to a contempt of court; it would not be a contempt of the High Court at all. The last article complained of was published on the 12th of September, and it was not until the 27th of September that she was charged with a crime which would be tried at assizes. It is useless to argue that the articles complained of would not amount to a contempt of court, and if they had been published after the 27th of September then there would have been no answer since Rex v. Parke, 52 W. R. 215, [1903] 2 K. B. 432, where in a considered judgment this court decided that where a person having been charged before the petty sessions with an indictable offence triable only at the assizes, matter published to prejudice the fair trial would give the High Court jurisdiction to attach for contempt of court notwithstanding that the person charged had at the time of the publication not been committed for trial. In that case the judgment dealt with the two rules which were discharged in respect to trials pending at the Central Criminal Court. In both cases the rules were discharged because the court at the hearing did not have it brought to its notice that the judges sit at the Central Criminal Court under similar commissions as at the assizes. The remedies of criminal information or indictment are the only remedies in this case. The court would not readily assume a jurisdiction which it cannot justify. It would no doubt be desirable that the High Court should be able to protect inferior courts from abuse of this nature, but that must be a matter for legislation.

E. Vaughan Williams, in support of the rule.—The charge might have been sent to the assizes for trial, and that possibility is sufficient to give jurisdiction to the court. In any case there is no actual authority on the point, and the court will therefore have regard to the principle which applies—namely, that no person may take steps to prejudice in any way the course of justice.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 28.—WILLS, J., read the judgment of the court, which was to the following effect: This is an application to commit the defendant for contempt of court. The circumstances which have given rise to it are as follows: A woman was arrested on the 2nd of September, 1905, on a charge of abandoning a child at Morriston, in the county of Glamorgan. She was brought before the magistrates at Swansea on the 5th of September. The defendant is the editor, printer, and publisher of the South Wales Daily Post, a newspaper published at Swansea. In the issue of his paper published on the evening of the 5th of September there appeared a report of the proceedings before the justices, followed by a statement headed "Antecedents of the Accused," and in the issue of the 8th of September another article entitled "Traffic in Babies," and in the issues of the 9th and 12th of September further articles relating to the accused person. They contained a great number of statements calculated to give an exceedingly unfavourable impression of the prisoner, and notably the article of the 8th of September stated that she had been guilty of wholesale child farming and alleged her identity with one Dora Johnson, who, it was alleged, had more than once been convicted of fraud; but it is not necessary to give any more specific account of their contents, inasmuch as Mr. Bankes, who appeared for the defendant, admitted that nothing could be said in defence or even in palliation of the act of publishing such articles concerning a person under remand upon a charge which might lead to her committal. He confined his argument to denying the jurisdiction of this court to deal with the present application on the ground that as the offence charged could be tried at quarter sessions, the offence was one against the quarter sessions and could not be dealt with summarily by this court. It would perhaps be enough to say that, inasmuch as the question whether the committal should take place to the assizes or quarter sessions depended in all probability upon the mere accident of which tribunal might hold its sittings before the other, it was just as much a contempt of the assize court as of quarter sessions, and if so our judgment in Rex v. Parke, 52 W. R. 215, [1903] 2 K. B. 432, applies. We adhere to the view we expressed in that case, that the publication of such articles is a contempt of the court which ultimately tries the case after committal, though at the time when they are published it cannot be known whether there will be a committal or not. Their tendency is to poison the stream of justice in that court, although at the time of their publication the stream had not reached it, and as such articles are calculated to interfere with the power of the court (whatever it be) that tries the case to do effective justice, it is a contempt of any court which very well may try the case, but in fact does not do so, as well as of the court which actually tries it. What actually happened was that ultimately, some time after the publication of the articles now complained of, the prisoner was committed on a charge of attempting to murder the child who was the subject of the original charge, and, of course, upon such a charge she was committed to the assizes. We think that, although the charge has been altered, it is still intimately connected with the original charge and relates to the same subject-matter, that the articles in question are equally calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the accused whatever form the charge might ultimately take, and that their publication does constitute a contempt of the assize court to which the woman has been committed. It matters not whether the uncertainty at the time the articles were published extended only to the forum to which the case should be sent or to the question whether a committal would take place at all, or to both. In each of such cases the mischief is the same, and the court which might have to try the case would find its authority equally undermined beforehand. We think it right to repeat in this connection a passage in the judgment in Rex v. Parke (at p. 436), which expresses the deliberate opinion of the court as constituted when this case was argued, as well as of the court as constituted when Rex v. Parke was decided: "It has been argued that publication of articles of the kind in question cannot be treated as a contempt of the assize court unless the committal has actually taken place and a bill been found, when only, it is urged, is there a case pending in the assize court, and when, it is also urged, the jurisdiction ought to be exercised by that court itself. A moment's consideration, it seems to us, is sufficient to dispose of such a proposition. The reason why the publication of articles like those with which we have to deal is treated as a contempt of court is because their tendency, and sometimes their object, is to deprive the court of the power of doing that which is the end for which it exists—namely, to administer justice duly, impartially, and with reference solely to the facts judicially brought before it. Their tendency is to reduce the court which has to try the case to impotence, so far as the effectual elimination of prejudice and prepossession is concerned. It is difficult to conceive an apter description of such conduct than is conveyed by the expression 'contempt of court.' If it be once grasped that such is the nature of the offence, what possible difference can it make whether the particular court which is thus sought to be deprived of its independence and its power of effecting the great end for which it is created be at that moment in session or even actually constituted or not? It is perfectly certain that by law it will and must be constituted, and that when constituted it and it alone can take cognizance of the particular offence which is the subject of the preliminary inquiry. The wrong can hardly be the less because the purpose or the tendency of the act complained of is that the assize court never shall have undisturbed power to fulfil its functions satisfactorily. The High Court exists always. To provide beforehand that one of its branches, which, although it does not at the moment exist yet must, both according to immemorial custom and now also by statutes and by rules having the same effect, come into existence, shall be hampered and hindered in the effectual discharge of its duties as soon as it is constituted, if called upon to try a particular case which it is at all events proposed to bring into that court, is surely an offence against the High Court itself." It is true that, in the case of Rex v. Parke, the only uncertainty was whether the accused person would be committed to any court, the offence charged being one which in case of committal must go to the assizes. We cannot see that the additional element of uncertainty, in that the case could be tried at quarter sessions, makes any difference in principle; or prevents the interference with the due course of justice, in a case which may come to the assizes, from being a contempt of that court; and we are of opinion that upon these grounds alone the present application ought to be granted.

But inasmuch as a further question of great and growing importance—viz., the jurisdiction of this court to treat attacks of this kind upon the independence and usefulness of inferior tribunals as offences to be dealt with by this court in its summary jurisdiction—has been raised and argued, we think it desirable to deliver a judgment upon this point also, and to treat the case as if a committal had actually taken place to quarter sessions. The present King's Bench Division of the High Court stands in the place of the three ancient superior courts of common law, and besides representing the powers and exercising the authority of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, inherits all the jurisdiction and powers of the Court of King's Bench. From the most ancient times, that court exercised functions which belonged to no other court in the kingdom. The high nature of those functions is described in emphatic language by Lord Coke in 4th Inst. c. 7, on The Court of King's Bench, and in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown under the same title, book 2, c. 3, to which we refer only to show the supreme place in the judicature assigned to that court. There is no doubt that the great functions of this court as of all others must be exercised, as pointed out by Lord Coke, "according to due course of law." His general attribution to it of the power to "correct errors and misdemeanours extra-judicial tending to the breach of the peace or oppression of the subjects or any other manner of misgovernment," as well as Hawkins's wider and more elaborate description of the like powers, refers to every kind of misdemeanour, including those which are properly the subject of indictment or criminal information, as well as those which are punishable summarily by attachment, and therefore throws no light upon the question whether a particular offence falls under the one head or the other or both. They do serve to show the very great trust reposed in the Court of King's Bench in respect of its control and superintendence of all inferior courts, and that it is in a special manner the guardian and protector of public justice throughout the kingdom. Offences of the exact kind in question in this case are necessarily of modern origin. They could not exist to any appreciable extent, if at all, before printing was greatly resorted to, and, as long as it was unlawful even to publish reports of proceedings before magistrates on account of their supposed tendency to interfere with a fair trial, persons who knew that this was unlawful were not very likely to go to the further length of announcing and commenting upon supposed facts, to the prejudice of a prisoner, which had not even come before the magistrate. Down to 1792 the judge at the trial determined as a matter of law whether a particular writing was a libel or not, and, looking to the legal definition of a libel, it is obvious that writers of all kinds stood in far greater danger than they have done since the Act of 32 Geo. 3, c. 60; and for a long time after that there is no

ubt that persons who published libels of any kind in more peril than at present. We have pointed the judgment in Rex v. Parke, at p. 438, that 11 to 1888 but one case has been recorded in publication of reports of proceedings before ing to committal, or of extraneous ed with such reports, has come under e. That case occurred in 1886, and for vill give later on we are of opinion n be placed upon it. We mention impossible it is that precedents y years ago for cases like the d or expected, and, if there is direct athority in favour of the an offence is summarily punishable by it is at all events conceded by Mr. Bankes has been able to find none to the ntrary. We are therefore driven to consider the question in the first instance from the point of view of principle, and in the second in the light of the reported cases during the last twenty years with such small help as can be gathered from older authorities. There is no doubt that almost all the cases of contempt of court to be found in the books are cases in which the act so called and so dealt with has been some act in defiance of one of the superior courts, in which case, of course, no one of these courts interfered with the other. Each of the three courts of common law and also the Court of Chancery possessed ample powers to protect itself and to punish conduct which it deemed to be so derogatory of its own authority as to constitute contempt of court. It is very natural, therefore, that the language generally used in such cases should refer to the power of the Supreme Court to ensure respect for itself or its orders, and should not go beyond that. The almost total absence of any recorded case in which a contempt of an inferior court has come into question is an abundant proof that serious offences of this kind were very rare. They were also always punishable by indictment, and in old days, when means of communication were slow, uncertain, and expensive there was an inducement to refrain from appealing to the Court of King's Bench, which no longer exists. In these circumstances the absence or scantiness of precedent is not to be wondered at, and in this connection we may cite a passage from Hawkins's P.C., book 2, c. 3, in which, speaking of the Court of King's Bench, after a general description of the jurisdiction of the court to prevent abuses and oppression, he says: "Neither is it necessary in a prosecution of any such offence in this court to show a precedent of the like crime formerly punished here agreeing with the present in all its circumstances, for this court, being the custos morum of all the subjects of the realm, wherever it meets with an offence contrary to the first principles of common justice and of dangerous consequences to the public if not restrained, will adapt such a punishment to it as is suitable to the heinousness of it," observations which are as applicable to the exercise of summary jurisdiction as to the proceeding by indictment. What, then, is the principle which is the root of and underlies the cases in which persons have been punished for attacks upon courts and interference with due execution of their orders? It will be found to be, not for the purpose of protecting either the court as a whole or the individual judges of the court from a repetition of the offence to them, but protecting the public, and especially those who either voluntarily or by compulsion are subject to its jurisdiction, from the mischief they will incur if the authority of the tribunal be undermined or impaired: see the judgment prepared by Wilmot, C.J., in Rex v. Almond in 1768, but not delivered because the case was allowed to drop—Wilmot's Opinions, p. 256. The word "authority" is used by him to express the deference and respect which is paid to the judges of a court and their acts, from an opinion of their justice and integrity. These words are apt with respect to the particular case with which he was dealing. But what possible difference in principle can there be in respect of direct attacks upon courts or judges and of writings the tendency of which is to deprive the inferior courts beforehand of the possibility of doing even-handed and impartial justice according to the due course of law? To hold that there was a distinction would give colour to the notion, which cannot be too strongly repudiated, that the offended dignity of a particular court or of the persons who compose it is the subject of punishment in such a case. "The object of the discipline enforced by the court in case of contempt of court," says Bowen, L.J., "is not to vindicate the dignity of the court or the person of the judge, but to prevent undue interference with the administration of justice" (Helmore v. Smith, 35 W. R. 157, 35 Ch. D. 449, 455); and a considerable part of the undelivered judgment of Wilmot, C.J., to which we have referred, is devoted to showing that the real offence is the wrong done to the public by weakening the authority and influence of a tribunal which exists for their good alone. He adds that such conduct is preeminently the proper subject of summary jurisdiction. "Attacks upon the judges," he says, "excite in the minds of the people a general dissatisfaction with judicial determinations . . . and whenever men's allegiance to the laws is so fundamentally shaken it is the most fatal and most dangerous obstruction of justice, and in my opinion calls out for a more rapid and immediate redress than any other obstruction—not for the sake of judges as private individuals, but because they are the channels by which the king's justice is conveyed to the people. To be impartial and to be universally thought to be so are both absolutely necessary for the giving justice that free, open, and unimpaired current which it has for many years found all over this kingdom." With a few verbal alterations these eloquent words will apply with at least equal force to writings whose direct tendency is to prevent a fair and impartial trial, or at least one that can be so considered, from being had in courts of inferior jurisdiction which have not the power of protecting themselves from such encroachments upon their independence. The public mischief is identical, and in each instance the undoubted possible recourse to indictment or criminal information is too dilatory and too inconvenient to afford any satisfactory remedy. It is true that the summary remedy with its consequent withdrawal of the offence from the cognizance of a jury is not to be resorted to if the ordinary methods of prosecution can satisfactorily accomplish the desired result—viz., to put an efficient and timely check upon such malpractices. But they do not. "I am," said Wilmot, C.J., "as great a friend to trials of facts by juries as any judge who ever did or now does sit in Westminster Hall, but if to deter men from offering any indignity to courts of justice" (and we may well add from interfering with the due course of justice) "it is a part of the legal system of justice in this kingdom that the court should call upon the delinquents to answer for such indignities" (to which we add "misconduct") "in a summary method, we are as much bound to execute this part of the system as any other." "The several parts of the system," he adds, "act in combination to attain the only end and object of all laws, the safety and security of the people," words which it appears to us are as appropriate to the question we have in hand as they were, in the case with which he was dealing, to the application under different circumstances of the same great principle that courts for the administration of justice exist for the benefit of the people, that for the benefit of the people their independence must be protected from unauthorized interference, and that the law provides effective means by which this end can be secured. If it is to be secured at all in the case of the inferior courts, it can only be secured by the action of this court, for they have not the power to protect themselves, and, if it be true that the King's Bench is any sense the custos morum of the kingdom, it must be its function to apply, with the necessary adaptations to the altered circumstances of the present day, the same great principles which it has always upheld. The constant use of the term "contempt of court" has tended to obscure both the foundation and object of the jurisdiction and to throw into the shade the essential difference between the jurisdiction exercised by the Court of King's Bench and that of the other courts. It is no departure from principle, but only its legitimate application to a new state of things if others whose conduct tends to prevent the due performance of their duties by those courts have to be corrected as well as the courts themselves. Of old cases of this character we have found but two: Burgh v. Blunt, 10 Mod. 349, and Rex v. Burchett, 1 Str. 567. If the former is to be taken as suggesting that the Court of King's Bench will never interfere in such a case, it is contrary to a great body of ancient law (see Hawkins, book 2, c. 22, s. 25), and it is so far removed from the case before us in its circumstances and in the principles involved that it cannot be regarded as any authority against the applicant. Rex v. Burchett cannot be considered a decision of great weight, and the circumstances of that case cannot be compared with those with which we have to deal, nor was there then any appreciable risk of the class of inroads upon the independence of the inferior tribunals which the altered conditions of to-day have brought into prominence and which have made it necessary for us to consider very seriously and anxiously the nature of the jurisdiction we are asked to exercise and the principles upon which it is based. The modern cases are those three enumerated in Rex v. Parke. Until the argument of Rex v. Parke, the Central Criminal Court had been looked upon as a court of separate jurisdiction, and in that light alone can the decisions be duly estimated. The authorities, such as they are, leave the question entirely open for our decision. The necessity of caution in dealing with a matter where the liberty of the subject is concerned has been fully present to our minds. It is because we think that we are creating no new jurisdiction, but acting strictly in conformity with the cardinal principles upon which the jurisdiction to commit for conduct tending improperly to interfere with the administration of justice rests, that we have come to the conclusion at which we have arrived. To hold that, because in time long gone by the chief, if not the only, danger to be guarded against was the illegal exercise of arbitrary power by inferior courts, therefore the King's Bench cannot afford them protection, as well as administer correction, would we think, be to mistake the application of a principle for the principle itself. The danger is perhaps greater to inferior courts than it is to the superior courts of having their efficiency impaired by publications such as those which have given rise to present proceedings. As the application asks for nothing more than the legitimate application to new circumstances of the old principles of the common law, we have come to the conclusion we ought to grant the remedy invoked. The articles contain statements respecting the person charged, of a character likely seriously to prejudice her case, to create a feeling against her, and to affect the minds of persons who might take part in her trial; and we order David Davies to pay a fine of £100 and costs.

Local government—Creation of county borough—Adjustment of financial relations—Compensation to county—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 32, 62.

By a provisional order and confirmation Act a borough which then formed part of a county was separated from the county and constituted a county borough. The provisional order provided for an adjustment respecting financial relations between the county and the borough, and for that purpose applied section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1888, with the substitution of the Local Government Board or an arbitrator appointed by them for the commissioners referred to in the section.

Held, that the liability of the borough to contribute to the maintenance of the county bridges, main roads, and other county expenses which had thus ceased was a matter with respect to which the arbitrator appointed to adjust the financial relations between the county and the borough under section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1888, had power to award compensation to the county.

Caterham Urban District Council v. Godstone Rural District Council, 52 W. R. 625, [1904] A. C. 171, distinguished.

Award of Sir Hugh Owen, G.C.B., stated with regard to certain claims in the form of a special case.

The award, so far as material to the questions raised for the decision of the court, was as follows:

"By the Borough of West Hartlepool Order, 1902, which was confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 12) Act, 1902, it was provided:

"Article II.—'The borough' (of West Hartlepool in that order referred to as the borough) 'shall be constituted a county borough, and all the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888' (in that order referred to as the Act) 'respecting county boroughs shall apply to the borough as if the borough had been named in the third schedule to the Act and as if Durham had been specified in that schedule as the county in which the borough should be deemed for the purposes of the Act to be situate . . .'

"Article III.—'(1) An equitable adjustment shall be made respecting the distribution of the proceeds of the local taxation licences of the estate duty and of the local taxation (customs and excise) duties and respecting all other financial relations or questions between the administrative county' (of Durham, in that order referred to as the administrative county) 'and the borough . . .

"(2) 'Any such adjustment between the administrative county and the borough shall be made by agreement between the council of the administrative county and the' (mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the county borough of West Hartlepool, acting by the council, in that order referred to as the) 'council of the borough within six months from the commencement of this order . . . In default of agreement between the parties concerned in the case of any such adjustment as aforesaid the adjustment may be made by the Local Government Board or if that board think fit by an arbitrator appointed by them.

"(3) 'For the purpose of any such adjustment as aforesaid the provisions of the Act relating to adjustments between administrative counties and county boroughs shall apply with the necessary modifications, and the Local Government Board or an arbitrator appointed by them as the case may be shall be substituted in such provisions for the commissioners appointed under the Act, and notwithstanding anything in the provisions of this order or of the Act any such adjustment and the determination of any matter incidental or in relation thereto or consequent thereon shall when made by the Local Government Board be deemed to be made by them otherwise than as arbitrators and any arbitrator appointed by them shall be deemed to be an arbitrator within the meaning of section 62 of the Act and the provisions of the Act shall apply accordingly:

"Provided—(a) That in lieu of sub-section 6 of section 61 of the Act sub-sections 1 and 5 of section 87 of the Act shall apply to any inquiries which may be directed by the Local Government Board under this article and to the costs of such inquiries; and (b) that sub-section 6 of section 32 of the Act shall apply to any agreement or any award made under this article."

[The award then recited sections 32 and 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which contain the provisions relating to adjustments between administrative counties and county boroughs.*]

No equitable adjustment having been made by agreement between the County Council of Durham and the council of the county borough of West Hartlepool within the six months specified in the order, the Local Government Board appointed Sir Hugh Owen as arbitrator to make the equitable adjustment. The arbitrator duly made his award, and with regard to a large portion of the sums directed by the award to be paid by the county council and the council of the county borough respectively no question arises, but with regard to certain other payments claimed by the parties respectively the arbitrator was requested to state his award in the form of a special case.

The particulars of the claims in question and the facts which the arbitrator found with regard to them were as follows:

The county council claim that they shall be paid by the council of the county borough, in addition to the sums which under the foregoing clauses of this award are to be paid by that council, the following sums, that is to say:

(1) £5,928 in respect of the repair, maintenance, and improvement of county bridges;

* By section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1888:

Sub-section 1: "An equitable adjustment respecting the distribution of the proceeds of the local taxation licences, and probate duty grant, and respecting all other financial relations, if any, between each county, and each county borough specified in the said schedule as being deemed for the purposes of this Act to be situate in that county, shall be made by agreement, within twelve months after the appointed day, between the councils of each county and each borough, and in default of any such agreement, by the commissioners appointed under this Act; and such adjustment shall provide, in the case of any expenses which may in future be incurred by the county wholly or partly on behalf of the borough for the liability of such borough to contribute, and, save as provided by this Act, any existing liability to contribute or to incur expense shall, after the appointed day, cease, and an equitable provision for such cessation shall be made in the adjustment."

Sub-section 3: "In such adjustment regard shall be had to the existing property, debts, and liabilities (if any) connected with the financial relations of the county and borough, and to the consideration that the county is not to be placed in any worse financial position by reason of the boroughs therein being constituted county boroughs, and that a county borough is not to be placed in a worse financial position than it would have been if it had remained part of the county and had shared in the division of the sums received by a county in respect of the licence duties and the probate duty grant, as provided by this Act, and to the amount of benefit and value of the services which the borough receives in return for existing contributions, if any, and to all the circumstances of each case which it appears equitable to consider."

Section 62, sub-section 1: "Any councils and other authorities affected by this Act or by any scheme, order, or other thing made or done in pursuance of this Act, may from time to time make agreements for the purpose of adjusting any property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses, so far as affected by this Act or such scheme, order, or thing, of the parties to the agreement, and the agreement and any other agreement authorized by this Act to be made for the purpose of the adjustment of any property, debts, liabilities, or financial relations, may provide for the transfer or retention of any property, debts, and liabilities, with or without any conditions, and for the joint use of any property, and for the transfer of any duties, and for payment by either party to the agreement in respect of property, debts, duties, and liabilities so transferred or retained, or of such joint user, and in respect of the salary, remuneration, or compensation payable to any officer or person, and that either by way of a capital sum, or of a terminable annuity for a period not exceeding that allowed by the commissioners under this Act or the Local Government Board."

Sub-section 2: "In default of an agreement as to any matter requiring adjustment for the purpose of this Act, or any matter which, in case of difference, is to be referred to arbitration, then, if no other mode of making such adjustment or determining such difference is provided by this Act, such adjustment or difference may be made or determined by an arbitrator appointed by the parties, or in case of difference as to the appointment, appointed by the Local Government Board."

Sub-section 3: "An arbitrator appointed under this Act shall be deemed to be an arbitrator within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same, and the provisions of those Acts with respect to an arbitration shall apply accordingly; and, further, the arbitrator may state a special case, and notwithstanding anything in the said Acts, shall determine the amount of the costs, and shall have power to disallow as costs in the arbitration the costs of any witness whom he considers to have been called unnecessarily, and any other costs which he considers to have been incurred unnecessarily."

Sub-section 4: "Any award or order made by the commissioners or any arbitrator under this Act may provide for any matter for which an agreement might have provided."

(2) £32,610 in respect of the repair, maintenance and improvement of main roads; and

(3) £8,174 in respect of discontinuing contributions to miscellaneous expenses, such expenses (which are hereinafter referred to as "miscellaneous expenses") being the expenditure of the county council on salaries, registration of voters other than parliamentary ownership voters, law charges, printing and stationery, weights and measures department, health department, election expenses, county rate basis expenses, petty sessional courts in the county, and office expenses.

The county council claim the sums specified above and numbered 1, 2, and 3, on the ground that, owing to and since the constitution of the county borough, they have been deprived of, and will for the future be deprived of, all contributions for the area within the county borough towards the expenses incurred by them in respect of the several purposes to which the claim relates, and the liability for such expenses is now and will continue to be imposed solely on the area of the county as diminished by the area which has been formed into the county borough.

It is admitted by the council of the county borough that there are no county bridges or main roads within the area of the county borough, and that the contributions from the area within the county borough towards miscellaneous expenses have in past years prior to the constitution of the county borough exceeded the amount of such expenses incurred by the county council for that area.

The council of the county borough claim that they shall be paid by the county council, in addition to the sums which under the foregoing clauses of this award are to be paid by that council, the following sums, that is to say:

(4) £3,225 in respect of children in industrial schools and in reformatories;

(5) £3,214 in respect of subsidized roads; and

(6) £305 in respect of fines.

With regard to the item numbered (4), the council of the county borough claim the said sum of £3,225 on the ground that, owing to and since the constitution of the county borough, an increased burden has been thrown on the area within the county borough in respect of the expenses of the maintenance of children in industrial schools and reformatories, and the burden on the area now comprised in the county has been thereby diminished.

It is admitted by the county council that the contributions from the area within the county borough towards such expenses have in past years, prior to the constitution of the county borough, been much less than the actual expenditure of the county council in respect of the maintenance of the children sent to industrial schools and reformatories from that area.

With regard to the item numbered (5), the council of the county borough claim the said sum of £3,214 on the ground of the loss which the area within the county borough has sustained by reason of the discontinuance of the contributions which, prior to the constitution of the county borough, were made by the county council under section 11 (10) of the Local Government Act, 1888, towards the cost of the maintenance, repair, enlargement and improvement of highways (not being main roads) in the area within the borough.

It is admitted by the county council that, during the three completed years next before the 1st day of October, 1902, they made under the powers conferred on them by the said Act voluntary contributions towards the cost of highways (not being main roads) in the area within the county borough, and that since the constitution of the county borough such contributions by the county council have necessarily ceased.

With regard to the item numbered (6), the council of the county borough claim the said sum of £305, on the ground that, prior to the constitution of the county borough, the share of the area within that borough in the proceeds of the fines levied at petty sessions throughout the county was on the basis of its rateable value in excess of the fines so levied in that area; that since the county borough was constituted the area within that borough has lost the allocation of that excess, and that in consequence an additional sum is available for allocation to the county.

It is admitted by the county council, that prior to the constitution of the county borough the share in the proceeds of the said fines which, on the basis of its rateable value, was allocated to the area within the county borough, was in excess of the fines actually levied in that area.

It is agreed by the county council and the council of the county borough that if under an adjustment under the said Borough of West Hartlepool Order, 1902, and the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888, therein referred to, either of those councils has a valid claim against the other in respect of any of the items of claim above-mentioned in consequence of the loss sustained by reason of the constitution of the county borough, the sum stated above in connection with such item shall be deemed to be the sum which represents the amount of the loss.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

(1) Whether the loss sustained by the county council is, under article 3 of the said Borough of West Hartlepool Order, 1902, and the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888, therein referred to, the subject of a valid claim against the council of the county borough in the case of any of the items of claims numbered 1, 2, and 3, and, if so, which?

(2) Whether the loss sustained by the council of the county borough is, under the said order and provisions, the subject of a valid claim against the county council in the case of any of the items of claim numbered 4, 5, and 6, and, if so, which?

Shearman, K.C., and R. I. Simey, for the Durham County Council.—The question is whether, upon a borough being taken out of the county and constituted a county borough the loss to the county of that productive rate-paying area is a matter for compensation under section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1888. Until recently it was considered that there could be an adjustment under section 62 of that Act or section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, which is substantially to the same effect. The leading decision on the question was In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union 47 W. R. 322, [1899] 1 Q. B. 540. However, in Caterham Urban District Council v. Godstone Rural District Council, 52 W. R. 625, [1904] A. C. 171, it was held by the House of Lords that where a parish was taken out of a rural district and constituted an urban district by an order made under section 57 of the Act the loss of the contributions from that parish to the highway rates of the rural district was not a matter of adjustment under section 62. Their lordships' decision was, therefore, that section 62 of the Act of 1888 did not authorize a claim to compensation in the case of a loss of a profitable area. Therefore the question in the present case is whether the principle of the Caterham case applies to section 32 of the Act as well as to section 62. It is submitted that it does not, since the language of section 32 is much wider than that of section 62. Sub-section 3 of section 32 shows that the Legislature intended that matters of this kind should be the subjects of adjustment.

Cripps, K.C., Macmorran, K.C., and Fleetwood Pritchard, for the county borough.—No distinction in substance can be drawn between section 62 and section 32, and therefore the decision of the Caterham case applies. The county council are really claiming compensation for the loss of a rate-paying area, but section 32 only provides for "adjustment," which is not an apt word to express the idea of "compensation." Section 32, like section 62, deals only with the adjustment of existing property and liabilities, and the same principles apply whether the area divided is a county or a rural district. Lord Halsbury, L.C., in the Caterham case points out that the word "adjustment" as distinguished from "compensation" means a division of existing assets while "compensation" would quite rightly be interpreted to mean the loss of some right to obtain income by rating, or of some area which would furnish the right to get income. The words "financial relations" in section 32 do not assist the other side, for those words are also to be found in section 62. Whichever section is considered, the problem to be dealt with is the same. The substantial reason why a borough seeks to be taken out of the county and constituted a county borough is because it has been unfairly treated by the county in the amount that had to be contributed towards the county expenditure. If, then, compensation is to be allowed for loss of the excess of rating over expenditure the greater that excess has been in the past the greater will be the compensation.

Shearman, K.C., in reply.—Section 62 does not authorize the adjustment of "financial relations." The section where it uses the words is speaking of an adjustment under section 32. Those words as used in section 62 merely refer back to section 32. That, however, is a small matter. The real contention of the county council is that section 32, though not very skilfully drafted, was intended to be as wide as possible and intended to provide for the adjustment being so made as to protect the ratepayers either in the borough or the county from having their burdens increased.

CHANNELL, J.—In my view there is a substantial difference between section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the section (section 62) which was before the House of Lords in Caterham Urban District Council v. Godstone Rural District Council, and in particular the difference is in the last part of sub-section 1 of section 32. The sub-section begins by providing for an adjustment "respecting" certain specified matters and "all other financial relations." Those words are so vague and unsatisfactory in every way—they do not speak of adjusting financial relations, but of an adjustment "respecting" financial relations—that I myself should be wholly unable to put any definite meaning on them if they stood alone. But I think it was intended that there should be an adjustment of financial relations generally, and that Mr. Shearman correctly explained the reason why the words financial relations are inserted in section 62—namely, that agreements there mentioned as made for the purposes of adjusting financial relations are agreements authorized elsewhere than in section 62; in other words that they refer back to section 32. Those words are, as I think, extremely difficult to construe. But the words which I do not think difficult to construe are those of the latter part of sub-section 1 of section 32. That part of the sub-section provides, first, that "such adjustment shall provide, in the case of any expenses which may in future be incurred by the county wholly or partly on behalf of the borough for the liability of such borough to contribute." Before 1888 a very large number of things had been done for the boroughs by the county, and, if it was a quarter sessions borough, those things were paid for not by way of direct rating, but by way of money contributions raised by the borough upon precepts. The sub-section says that, notwithstanding the passing of the Act, some things will still continue to be done by the county for the borough, and that as to those matters the adjustment is to provide. The sub-section then continues: "And save as provided by this Act, any existing liability to contribute or to incur expense shall, after the appointed day, cease, and an equitable provision for such cessation shall be made in the adjustment." That seems to say that provision must be made that certain things are to cease; for instance, the liability to maintain the main roads. I think there can be no doubt that the Act provides that in the future the liability to maintain the main roads within the borough is to be borne by the borough, and that the liability of the county to incur expense in connection with main roads within the borough is to cease, and equally the liability of the borough to contribute to the expenses of the county in respect of the roads outside the borough is to cease. The adjustment may not alter that. What it is to do is to make an equitable provision for such cessation. That must mean that it is to be taken into consideration somehow or other from a money point of view.

Personally, I very much doubt whether in making that provision it is right to capitalize the existing difference between the expenditure in the recent years and the contributions of the recent years, but it is for the arbitrator to consider what is equitable. That is perhaps a matter of personal opinion, but he has to make some provision upon the subject, and that that is to be an equitable one seems to me to be provided by the Act. Then I think that the words in sub-section 3 are important: "In such adjustment regard shall be had to the existing property, debts, and liabilities (if any) connected with the financial relations of the county and borough and to the consideration that the county is not to be placed in any worse financial position by reason of the boroughs therein being constituted county boroughs, and that a county borough is not to be placed in a worse financial portion than it would have been in if it had remained part of county and had shared at the division of the sums received by a county in respect of the licence duties and the probate duty grant as provided by this Act, and to the amount of benefit and value of the services which the borough receives in return for existing contributions, if any, and to all the circumstances of each case which it appears equitable to consider." I cannot think that the words referring to the preservation of the financial position can be meant to be limited to financial position in respect of licence duties and probate duty grant. That matter is mentioned somewhat inartistically as an illustration of one of the things contemplated, but the sub-section is not confined to these duties. I think the scheme was not to alter the financial position as between counties and the boroughs that were made county boroughs further than could possibly be helped. It was intended, as it seems to me, to start the county boroughs and the counties so that the ratepayers would be practically as nearly as could be at starting in the same position as they had been in before, but it was not intended that that should be so for all time. It was not intended, for example, that account should be taken of the fact that in all probability West Hartlepool would be a very growing place, and that some of the smaller villages in Durham might not be, and things of that sort, but it was intended to alter the machinery, and, as between large boroughs to which this section relates and the counties, to start them as far as possible in the same position as they were in before. I think, therefore, that it was within the power of the arbitrator to make an equitable provision of some kind for the cessation of the liability to repair the main county bridges and main roads. And the same thing applies to the miscellaneous expenses and to the cross-claim against the county council.

Questions of arbitrator answered in the affirmative.

CLOUGH v. SAMUEL AND OTHERS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Notice to creditors that debtor could not meet his engagements—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (h).

A declaration by a debtor that he is unable to pay in full, made to his Stock Exchange creditors, and permission given to them to close their accounts,

Held, not sufficient notice within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that the debtor had suspended or was about to suspend payment of his debts.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Reis, Ex parte Clough, 53 W. R. 122, [1904] 2 K. B. 769, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) which discharged a decision of Wright, J. (52 W. R. 302, [1904] 1 K. B. 456).

The appellant was the trustee in bankruptcy of one Arthur Reis, and the question considered in the judgments of their lordships was whether Reis had committed an act of bankruptcy within the terms of section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

In 1879 Reis, the bankrupt, had executed a settlement in consideration of marriage, whereby he covenanted to convey to the trustees all future acquired property, except business assets, to be held upon the trusts of the settlement.

In 1880 Reis became bankrupt, but obtained his discharge in 1882.

By the year 1901 Reis had made large profits, and he invested some £17,000 in purchasing and furnishing a freehold house in which he resided.

On the 23rd of May, 1903, the trustees of his marriage settlement gave him a written notice requiring him to convey the house and furniture to be held on the trusts of the settlement.

On the 10th of June, 1903, he, by an instrument in writing, conveyed the house and furniture as required.

In the interval—i.e., on the 26th of May, 1903—Reis summoned his two largest creditors to meet him in presence of his solicitor, who told the principal creditors, who were members of the Stock Exchange, that Reis was in difficulties and would have difficulty in meeting his engagements, and that they might close their accounts at once so as to diminish the loss as much as possible.

The Lord Chancellor and Lord Macnaghten deal with what happened at this meeting in their judgments.

Reis was subsequently made bankrupt on non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice founded on a judgment of the 22nd of June.

The question resolved itself into, Was the statement of the debtor an act of bankruptcy so that the instrument of the 10th of June, 1903, might be set aside? The Court of Appeal held that it was insufficient to constitute an act of bankruptcy.

The trustee in bankruptcy appealed.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and A. J. David (Berthold Adler with them), for the appellant.

Horridge, K.C., and E. W. Hansell, for the respondents.

Herbert Reed, K.C., replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—There is only one point in this case upon which your lordships called upon the respondents to support the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and that was how far the facts in this case show an act of bankruptcy committed by Mr. Reis before the execution of the instrument sought to be impeached by the trustee in bankruptcy. That, in fact, depends upon the facts as relevant to the new act of bankruptcy created by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That Act for the first time made it an act of bankruptcy if the debtor gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended, or that he is about to suspend, payment of his debts. In order to be an act of bankruptcy it must be a notice, and although the statute does not require any particular form of notice, still it must be a notice. I do not know that the word "notice" can be made clearer than it is by any verbal explanation, but it must be a notice. The statute might have said that an admission of insolvency should be enough, or that a present state of insolvency should be enough; but it is sufficiently clear that neither one nor the other will be sufficient as an act of bankruptcy. In earlier times bankruptcy was a crime; and in dealing with our law, to commit the crime it was necessary to commit an act of bankruptcy. Two most distinguished judges, Lord Selborne and Lord Watson, have pointed out in this House that a declaration of inability by a debtor does not of itself and without reference to context or circumstances satisfy the statute; and if I look to the circumstances or the words used, I concur with the Court of Appeal here that the debtor neither did nor intended to do any such thing as to give notice to his creditors or to any of them that he intended to suspend the payment of his debts.

What happened is, to my mind, very clear. Some speculative purchases on the Stock Exchange had been depressed in value, and the pay day was very near; and Mr. Reis, foreseeing difficulties in the future, went and consulted his solicitor. This solicitor was also solicitor to two of Mr. Reis's largest creditors, who were brokers, and a conversation ensued between the solicitor, who, having Mr. Reis with him at the time, procured these two creditors to come to him at once as he was in telephonic communication with them both. "It was," says Mr. Spyer, the solicitor, "rather in the nature of a friendly meeting, so far as Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Hart were concerned" (the two creditor in question), and Mr. Spyer being asked the question in plain terms whether he said anything about Mr. Reis's other creditors, or not being able to meet his other creditors, Mr. Spyer, referring to his professional experience in bankruptcy, says, "I was rather careful to say nothing of the sort." The two friends were intended to get authority from Reis to close their accounts so as to diminish the loss as much as possible when pay day came. It was then suggested that two other brokers were in the same condition, with accounts open, and it would be only fair to let them have the same liberty, and Mr. Spyer undertook to communicate to them his client's consent; but, to my mind, the last thing Mr. Reis had in his mind was a notice that he intended to suspend payment of his debts; his whole object was time, and what he thought he explained himself was, that two days might make all the difference, and that "a rise was due because the depression was the result of a slump." I have no doubt he was hopelessly insolvent. I have no doubt his expectations of a rise were vain, but I suspect people who gamble on the Stock Exchange very often have vain expectations. But I think he had no intention of giving notice that he intended to suspend payment, either in express words or in anything he said, from which an ordinary business man would infer that what Spyer said on his behalf, or what he said himself, was a notice of intention to suspend payment of his debts. I daresay a business man would infer that he was likely to do it, or perhaps that he was likely even to become bankrupt, but he would infer that from the circumstances, and not from anything said by either Spyer or Reis. I move, therefore, that the appeal be dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The real point of the case has, I fear, been rather obscured by the length of the argument. The question lies in the narrowest compass.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by section 4, sub-section 1, creates a new act of bankruptcy. It declares that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if he "gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended or that he is about to suspend payment of his debts."

Why was this provision introduced? Certainly not in order to afford the debtor an opportunity of communicating to his creditors the fact of his insolvency, so that they might, if they should think proper, take proceedings to make him bankrupt. A declaration by a debtor of inability to pay his debts filed in the prescribed manner was an act of bankruptcy already. The object of the new departure is stated, and stated, I think, correctly, in the case of In re Wolstenholme, 2 Morrel 216, by one of the counsel in the course of his argument. "Before the year 1883," Mr. Yate Lee is reported to have said, "it was common practice for a trader to send out notices saying he was about to suspend payment. Afterwards, however, dealings often took place between the debtor and his creditors. That was felt to be unfair, and the object of the new Act was to meet the evil by making the notice of suspension a new act of bankruptcy in order to prevent these unfair dealings." I do not, of course, cite this passage as an authoritative exposition of the meaning of the Legislature, although it seems to have been accepted by the court, and the learned counsel, as some of your lordships may remember, was a gentleman of great experience in bankruptcy and the author of a well-known treatise on the subject. But I cannot conceive that this enactment could have had any other origin or any other purpose. Now, when this provision first came under the consideration of the courts a very narrow construction was put upon it. It was said that the notice must be in writing and must declare an intention on the part of the debtor to suspend payment. It was said that the notice must be a notice intended to be communicated to all the creditors or to the body of creditors, and that the state of circumstances as disclosed must be such as to render it not merely improper, but actually fraudulent for the debtor afterwards to pay anybody. All these glosses, for which there seems to be no foundation in the Act, were, I had thought, swept away by the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Lamb, 55 L. T. 817, 35 W. R. Dig. 13, and by the decision of the majority of the same court in In re Cook, 24 Q. B. D. 320, affirmed in this House sub. nom.: Crook v. Morley, [1891] A. C. 316, 40 W. R. Dig. 15. The notice need not be in writing. It is enough if notice is given to any one of the creditors. No particular form is required. There is nothing said in the Act about the debtor's intention. The question is, what effect would the communication have on the minds of the persons to whom it is addressed. That is the test as laid down in this House. It is only a matter of common sense, as A. L. Smith, L.J., observed. All that is required is that a communication proceeding from the debtor, made seriously, should give the creditors or any of the creditors to understand from the state of circumstances as disclosed at the time that the debtor has suspended, or that he is about to suspend, payment. If it comes to this—I borrow the illustration from the judgment of Fry, L.J., in In re Lamb, which was referred to by Lord Selborne in Crook v. Morley—that the debtor has said in effect, "I am in a position at the present moment in which it is impossible for me to go on paying my creditors who may apply to me in the ordinary course of trade, and if I pay the first who apply there will be nothing left for the rest," that is an intimation that he will either immediately suspend payment, or that he is "about to suspend payment" as soon as he reaches the end of his resources.

And now, what was the case here? An outside stockbroker has some uncollected debts calculated on a sanguine estimate to produce a few hundred pounds, and which ultimately brought in £60. He has £7 at his bankers and not another penny in the world. The trustees of his marriage settlement have laid their hands on everything. Within a few hours he must find a sum already ascertained and known to exceed £10,000, or be proclaimed a defaulter. He communicates with his creditors on the Stock Exchange. He makes his solicitor, a Mr. Spyer, his mouthpiece. Mr. Spyer explains to his creditors on the Stock Exchange the state of affairs and his client's hopeless insolvency, with the view, apparently, of inducing them to accept a composition of something under 2s. in the pound, to be paid, not by the debtor himself, but out of a sum of £1,000 which he hoped to obtain from the trustees of his marriage settlement. There can be no dispute about the facts. I am not setting the recollection of one witness against the recollection of another. I accept the statement of Mr. Spyer. Mr. Spyer made at the time in his bill of costs a record of what occurred. That record states that he was requested by Mr. Reis to interview the brokers with whom he did business for the purpose of explaining the position; that he did attend Messrs. Lumsden and Hart, both of them together, and afterwards Mr. Harris and Mr. Elliott separately; and that he did explain the position to each of them. The position I have already described. I have no doubt Mr. Spyer put it before the creditors honestly and truthfully. When the offer or suggestion of the £1,000 was rejected and the brokers closed their accounts, refusing to allow Mr. Reis to gamble any longer with their money, it seems to me that it must have been clear to these four stockbrokers, if they were persons of ordinary intelligence and knew anything about business, that Mr. Reis was about to suspend payment. The end was in sight. It might come to-day or it might come to-morrow or the day after. But come it must. The age of miracles was past. There was nothing for it but suspension. I would hold that Mr. Spyer's communication was notice that Mr. Reis was about to suspend payment of his debts. However, your lordships think differently, and the result will be that the order under appeal will be affirmed, and the authority of Crook v. Morley, I am afraid, to some extent impaired.

Lord ROBERTSON.—This is a delicate case; but, after hearing the argument, I have come to a definite opinion in favour of the respondents.

It seems to me that in the conception of section 4, sub-section 1 (h), with which we have to deal, the suspension of payment of his debts is a specific and deliberate (in the sense of intentional) act of the debtor, and the suspension, actual or intimated, must apply to all the creditors. It is something different from and over and above inability to pay. It is one of the several courses which a debtor may elect among, when he finds himself insolvent. A man faced by a balance-sheet which means certain and speedy ruin may try to arrange with his more pressing creditors; or he may put off the evil day and stagger on, leaving the stoppage of his career to be brought about by the action of others. Either of these courses is different from suspending payment of his debts. It is, of course, entirely consistent with this view that the question whether notice of suspension has been given must depend on the import of what was said or written and is relied on as notice.

Now the question is, did Mr. Reis give notice that he had suspended payment of his debts or was about to suspend it? It seems to me that he did nothing in that direction except to show (to two of his creditors) his circumstances to be such that suspension of payment was one of the courses open to him. The occasion and object of the interview founded on, was to arrange with two brokers about closing the account. It is true that at that interview disclosure was made of a state of affairs which would have justified suspension of payment. But to me it is equally clear that what is relied on as having been said did not, in its reasonable sense, import notice of an intention to take that step, and it is at least doubtful whether the tenor of the communication did not rather point in the opposite direction. Nor did the other persons present act as if a suspension was announced.

I agree in the judgments of the learned Lords Justices.

In re WEST COAST GOLD FIELDS (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Right to participate in surplus assets of liquidating company as representing bankrupt—Shares partly paid up—Proof in bankruptcy not payment—Company—Liquidation—Distribution of surplus assets.

A shareholder liable as a contributory to a company must discharge his obligation before he can participate in a distribution of surplus assets of the company. Thus, where the holder of partly paid-up shares in a company becomes bankrupt, and the company proves in the bankruptcy for the amount of unpaid calls on the bankrupt's shares, the trustee cannot, although the company has received a dividend on their proof, participate in a distribution of surplus assets of the company until the holders of the fully paid-up shares therein have received the amount paid by them in excess of that paid by the holder of the partly paid-up shares.

In this case the trustee in bankruptcy of a person who held partly paid-up shares in the West Coast Gold Fields (Limited) claimed that he should in respect of such shares, as representing the bankrupt, be entitled to participate in a distribution of surplus assets of the company among its contributories.

It was held by Buckley, J., that, there being a liability on such shares for which the company had proved in bankruptcy, the liability must be discharged before the trustee could participate as claimed, and that proof in bankruptcy, even if followed by a dividend, was not payment in cash.

The trustee appealed.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Felix Cassel, for the appellant.—Proof for the total liability and payment of a dividend constitute payment of the shares in full.

They cited In re McMahon, [1900] 1 Ch. 173; Stammers v. Elliott, 16 W. R. 489, (1868) L. R. 3 Ch. 195; Ex parte Solomon, (1821) 1 G. & J. 25; Ex parte Hornby, (1819) Buck. 351; Ex parte West Riding Union Banking Co., (1881) 19 Ch. D. 105.

Astbury, K.C., and P. M. Walters, for the respondent.—The company's remedy against the debtor or his estate is extinguished by the proof in bankruptcy; the payment of a dividend in the proof only operated as payment pro tanto on the shares, but the shares are not fully paid. The decision in Grissell's case, 14 W. R, 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528, should be followed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9.—STIRLING, L.J., read the judgment of the court: The facts which give rise to the question now to be decided may be stated very briefly. The capital of the company was divided into shares of £1 each. At the end of 1902 Rowe held 1,800 of these shares, on each of which 10s. only had been paid up. On the 8th of January, 1903, the company made a call of 1s. per share on each of the 1,800 shares. On the 19th of January, 1903, a receiving order was made against Rowe, and on the 22nd of January he was adjudicated bankrupt. Subsequently the company carried in a proof against Rowe's estate in respect as well of the unpaid call of 1s. per share as of the future uncalled liability of 9s. per share. This proof was ultimately admitted at £819, on which sum the company received from the trustee a dividend of 1s. 6d. in the pound. No further dividend has up to the present time been paid; but it is expected that the estate will yield a further 1s. 6d. in the pound. In April, 1904, the company went into voluntary liquidation. After payment of all debts and liabilities a surplus remains. On the majority of the shares in the company the full nominal value of £1 per share has been paid, and the liquidator proposes to apply the surplus in repayment to the holders of those shares of 3s. per share, which will exhaust the fund. The trustee in Rowe's bankruptcy contends that, although cash to the amount of 11s. 6d. per share only has come to the hands of the company, nevertheless the 1,800 shares ought for the purpose of any distribution of surplus assets among the contributories of the company to be treated as fully paid up; and has taken out a summons in the winding up seeking a declaration that this is his right. Buckley, J., has decided that the contention of the trustee is not well founded, and has dismissed the summons. From this decision the trustee has appealed.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, it is provided that subject to satisfaction of the liabilities of the company the property of the company (where, as is the case here, there is no provision to the contrary by the regulations of the company) is to be "distributed amongst the members according to their rights and interests in the company." In Ex parte Maude, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 51, it was decided that where some shares have been fully paid up and others have not, the holders of the fully paid-up shares are entitled in a distribution of surplus assets in a winding up to receive the amount paid by them in excess of that paid on the other shares, before the holders of the latter receive anything. If, then, the 1,800 shares are to be regarded as being paid up only to the extent of 11s. 6d. per share, the decision under appeal is fully justified. The appellant contends that the proof in the bankruptcy alters the case and entitles him to say that the shares are fully paid up. In support of this contention cases are referred to such as Ex parte Hornby, Buck. 351, in which it is laid down that "proof is payment." No doubt it is true that proof deprives the creditor of any other remedy against the debtor or his estate, and in that sense proof is payment; but is proof payment in the sense that a company incorporated under the Companies Acts is to be treated as having received, in cash, a portion of its capital which it does not receive? If so, then immediately upon the admission of the proof the shares became fully paid up, and, as was argued at the bar, the trustee might have transferred them as such, to a purchaser even though no dividend was ever paid in the bankruptcy. But section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, provides that every share of a company shall be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless otherwise provided by contract in writing. Proof is not payment in cash unless followed by dividend, and then only to the extent of the dividend paid. And though the enactment just mentioned has been repealed, shares must still be paid up in money in the absence of a valid agreement for payment in money's worth. This view is, we think, in accordance with that taken by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords of the general scope of the provisions of the Companies Acts with respect to the capital of companies, in the recent case of Randt Gold Mining Co. v. New Balkis Eersteling (Limited), 51 W. R. 391, [1903] 1 K. B. 461, [1904] A. C. 165; see in particular the observations in the judgment of Lord Halsbury, L.C., at pp. 466-7 of the report in [1903] 1 K. B.

What has been said suffices to dispose of this appeal, but it may be well to add a few remarks on some points which were pressed upon us in argument. Our attention was directed to the fact that the distribution of the bankrupt's estate is not yet closed, and that there is a possibility of future dividends. It was asked, while this state of things continues, how is the liability on the shares to be defined in the event of a sale by the trustee of these shares? It was said, and with truth, that the company cannot have both the benefit of the proof and the liability of the purchaser for what remains unpaid on the shares. The question so asked does not arise in the present case, but it seems to us that one answer may be this. The trustee's duty is to transfer to the purchaser all the interest of the bankrupt in the shares: see Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 50, sub-section 3. That interest comprises both that which has arisen from the payment actually made in respect of each share and the benefit which will accrue by the increase of value in the shares by the payment of further dividends under the proof in the bankruptcy. The liability, therefore, would be the amount which remains unpaid on the shares, but with the benefit of any further dividends under the proof; and the right to such benefit would properly be recognized by the company in the certificate given to the purchaser. Certainly there appears to be no insuperable difficulty in defining, in this or some other way, the liability in question. Again it was said that several courses were open to the company when the proof was carried in; that the course actually selected threw the greatest burden on the bankrupt's estate; and that in these circumstances injustice would be done to the other creditors of the bankrupt if the company were not held to be precluded from saying that the shares were not fully paid up. No doubt under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act the company might have taken any one of several courses; but we fail to see that the adoption by one creditor of that which he considers the most advantageous to himself gives the other creditors any right as against him, even although that course may be the most disadvantageous to them. Further, each dividend paid to the company, though it takes away something from the other creditors, at the same time would, as a general rule, add something to the value of the shares of which the other creditors would on a sale get the benefit; and, in our opinion, less than justice would be done to the company if that benefit were carried to the extent of treating the shares as fully paid up. In any case, we are unable to see that the company is estopped from saying that the shares have not been fully paid in cash. The company has never represented that the shares have been fully paid up in cash; neither the trustee in bankruptcy nor any of the creditors has acted on such a representation in ignorance of the truth, and there is no room for the application of the doctrine which formed the basis of the decision in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 26 W. R. 819, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1004. Lastly, the case of Stammers v. Elliott, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 195, which was much relied upon, does not govern the present, for the simple reason that the question there arose with reference to the rights inter se of the residuary legatees of a testator's estate, and did not in any way involve the consideration of the peculiar rights and liabilities created by the Companies Acts on which the decision in this case turns. In our opinion the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

widow within the meaning of the clause, the amount required to maintain him in his lifetime must be deducted from his earnings, and the maximum sum payable as compensation must be proportionately reduced. The county court judge awarded £150.

Held, that the principle for the assessment of compensation was the same as in the case of total dependency, except that in the case of partial dependency the applicant's other source of income should be taken into account; that the amount required to maintain the deceased man in his lifetime did not enter into the calculation, and that the county court judge had not misdirected himself in assessing the compensation at £150.

Appeal from an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, made by Judge Bompas, K.C., sitting at the Bradford County Court.

The applicant was the widow of a deceased workman who met with a fatal accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. It was admitted that the employmnt was one to which the Act applied. The applicant claimed compensation as having been in part dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death. The deceased man's wages were 19s. 10½d. a week, and the applicant used to earn 1s. 10½d. a week. The county court judge awarded her £150.

The employers appealed.

J. A. Compston, for the employers.—The county judge calculated the compensation upon a wrong principle. Clause 1 (a) (i.) of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, deals with the case of a workman leaving dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death, and in that case the compensation is to be a fixed sum equal to the deceased workman's earnings during the three years next preceding the injury, such sum not to be less than £150 and not to exceed £300. That clause provides for compensation apart from any consideration of the loss or injury to the dependants. Clause 1 (a) (ii.) deals with the case of partial dependency, which is the present case. There a different principle is applied, and the injury to the dependants comes into the calculation, because the compensation is to be such sum, not exceeding in any case the amount payable under the preceding clause, as may be determined to be "reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the said dependants." In order to ascertain the injury to the applicant caused by her husband's death, the amount required for his maintenance in his lifetime must be deducted from his wages, and the maximum sum payable as compensation in the case of total dependency must be proportionately reduced. The reason why the clause contemplates that the maximum sum may be payable in the case of partial dependency is that the workman may have had an annuity terminating on his death, which would have been sufficient to maintain him apart from his wages, and in such a case the amount required for his maintenance cannot be deducted from his earnings. The county court judge has not deducted anything from the deceased man's earnings for his maintenance, as he has awarded £150, which is about £5 less than the maximum sum payable. It is absurd to suppose that this sum of £5 could have been deducted from the maximum sum—namely, three years' wages, as the amount required to maintain the deceased workman during the three years. The judge therefore acted upon a wrong principle in awarding £150.

He referred to Main Colliery Co. v. Davies, [1900] A. C. 358, 48 W. R. Dig. 114.

J. J. Wright, for the applicant, was not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal fails. The applicant is the widow of a workman who was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and she was at the time of her husband's death in part dependent upon his earnings. The only question before the court is as to the amount of the compensation to which the applicant is entitled. That is regulated by clause 1 (a) (ii.) of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Clause 1 (a) (i.) deals with the compensation payable where the deceased workman leaves dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings, and it provides that "the amount of compensation shall be a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, or the sum of £150, whichever of those sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case £300, provided that the amount of any weekly payments made under this Act shall be deducted from such sum, and if the period of the workman's employment by the said employer has been less than the said three years then the amount of his earnings during the said three years shall be deemed to be 156 times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment under the said employer." The scheme of compensation established by the Act is to be found in that clause of the schedule as well as in the next clause, which deals with the case of partial dependency. The scheme, as appearing in clause 1 (a) (i.), is not an attempt to appraise the precise amount of the loss and to award an equivalent amount of compensation. It is a rough-and-ready scheme for fixing compensation, with a maximum beyond which the compensation must not go, and that is probably the mode adopted for fixing the amount of the compensation, because perhaps it may be payable by persons who are not morally responsible for the accident. The scheme does not purport to be a scheme for complete and exact compensation, but it proceeds upon somewhat arbitrary lines. That is the case where the claim for compensation is made by a person who was at the time of the death wholly dependent upon the deceased man's earning. It ignores all considerations as to what part of the deceased man's wages were spent upon the man himself either for his maintenance or for other purposes. Then comes clause 1 (a) (ii.), which provides: "If the workman does not leave any such dependants, but leaves any dependants in part dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death, such sum not exceeding in any case the amount payable under the foregoing provisions as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement may be determined on arbitration under this Act to be reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the said dependants." The applicant here comes within that clause, as she was only partly dependent upon the deceased man's earnings. That clause, however, does not introduce a new principle or mode of calculating the compensation. It only differs in one respect from the preceding clause—namely, that it deals with a case where there was another source of income to the applicant besides the deceased man's earnings. That is the only element of difference introduced into the calculation of the compensation. That other source of income in the present case was almost inappreciable, and the county court judge has given consideration to it. There is no evidence that the judge misdirected himself upon this point. With reference to the case of Main Colliery Co. v. Davies, that case is not in point. The question in that case was whether the father could be described as dependent upon his son. The question of dependency is admitted here, and we begin the discussion with that admission. The dependency here was in fact almost total dependency, except for a small sum, and the county court judge has awarded compensation upon that footing. In my opinion the award of the county court judge cannot be interfered with, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Romer, L.J.—I agree. The present case seems to me to be an attempt to appeal upon a question of fact. There was no misdirection on the part of the county court judge, the compensation was not awarded upon any wrong principle, and the sum awarded did not exceed the maximum allowed by the Act. No ground has been shown for interfering with the decision of the judge.

Mathew, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The amount payable in the case of total dependency would have been £156. The present is not a case of total dependency, and the county court judge took that into account. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that clause 1 (a) (i.) and clause 1 (a) (ii.) must be construed together.

Appeal dismissed.

In re Hunt's Settled Estates and Settled Land Act. (a.)

Settled land—Capital moneys in the hands of trustees—Direction as to investment by tenant for life—Control of court—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 22, sub-section 2; s. 53.

A tenant for life directed the trustees to invest £2,650, part of moneys derived from the sale of settled property, in the purchase of eight leasehold houses. These houses were held for terms, of which more than sixty years were unexpired, but they were proved to be not worth more than £1,400. The trustees took out a summons for the direction of the court under section 44 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, asking whether they were bound to carry out the purchase as directed by the tenant for life.

Held, that the trustees were not bound to make such purchase.

Originating summons.

In this case the plaintiffs were the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the settlement created by the will of the testatrix dated the 28th of September, 1868.

A freehold estate in Devon was settled by the said will.

The defendants were the tenant for life under the said settlement and the assignee of his interest as tenant for life.

The testatrix died on the 28th of June, 1869.

The tenant for life was adjudicated bankrupt on the 2nd of March, 1880, and by an indenture of the 30th of April, 1898, the official receiver in bankruptcy assigned the property of the tenant for life to John William Leppard.

By an order of the 2nd of July, 1898, the life estate of the tenant for life was vested in the said assignee.

By an indenture of the 18th of January, 1904, the tenant for life in exercise of his power under the Settled Land Act, 1882, sold the said estate for £5,000, and later, in 1904, he agreed to buy eight leasehold houses for £2,650, part of the said £5,000.

In May, 1904, the tenant for life gave a formal direction to the trustees to apply the said sum of £2,650 in the purchase of the said eight leasehold houses. This the trustees refused to do, and they took out this summons for the direction of the court pursuant to section 44 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, asking whether they were bound to apply the said moneys as directed by the tenant for life. It was proved that the said leasehold houses were not worth more than £1,400, and were in every respect a most undesirable trustee investment.

Upjohn, K.C., and Jolly, for the remaindermen.

J. Rolt, for the trustees.

Butcher, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the tenant for life.

Peterson, for John William Leppard.

Farwell, J., in giving judgment, said that by section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, a tenant for life was in the same position as a trustee. In re Lord Coleridge's Settlement, 44 W. R. 59, [1895] 2 Ch. 704, only decided that the discretion given by the Act was to be exercised by the tenant for life and not by the trustee. The court could, therefore, restrain him from making an improper investment. In this case the tenant for life and his assignee have shown no consideration for the remaindermen, and have made no honest attempt to protect their interests. The trustees need not comply with the direction of the tenant for life.

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary franchise in county—£10 occupation qualification—Claim of two joint occupiers—Value of premises only £20—Third person already on overseers' list, unobjected to, for same premises—Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 27—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), s. 5.

The Representation of the People Act, 1867, s. 27, enacts: "In a county where premises are in the joint occupation of several persons as owners or tenants, and the clear yearly value of such premises is such as would, if divided amongst the several occupiers, so far as the value is concerned, confer on each of them a vote, then each of such joint occupiers shall, if otherwise qualified . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter. . . ."

in respect of such occupation, subject to the like conditions as a man is at the passing of this Act, entitled to be registered as a voter . . . in respect of the county occupation franchise."

K. and W. claimed to have their names inserted in Division I. of the occupiers' list in a parliamentary county, in respect of a £10 occupation qualification, the nature of their qualification as described in their claims being "offices (joint)." The qualifying premises consisted of a house, of the clear yearly value of only £20, of which the claimants were lessees, and they used, for the purpose of their business, three rooms and a cellar in said house, and also one bedroom, occasionally. The remainder of said house, consisting of three rooms, was, as the barrister found, "occupied" by G. and his wife, G.'s wife being employed and paid by the claimants as their caretaker. G.'s name had been entered by the overseers in Division II. of the occupiers' list in respect of the said house, and no objection had been taken to that entry. There was no evidence, or finding of fact, that G. occupied by virtue of service merely.

The claims of K. and W. were objected to on the grounds that, as the clear yearly value of the whole house was only £20, and inasmuch as G.'s name was already entered, without objection, in Division II. of the list of occupation electors, in respect of the same premises, the provisions of section 27 of the Act of 1867 and section 5 of the Act of 1884 rendered the claims inadmissible. The revising barrister having allowed the objection to the claims,

The Court, upon the facts of the case as above stated—and refraining to express any opinion as to what its decision would have been if G.'s occupation of the premises had been found to be an occupation by virtue of service merely—affirmed the decision of the revising barrister.

Appeal from the decision of the revising barrister of the Petersfield division of the county of Hampshire.

The material facts found by the revising barrister in the case stated were as follows:

"Henry Kirby and James Warner duly claimed to be inserted in the occupiers' list (Division I.) of the parliamentary and local government electors for the parish of Bishop's Waltham, in the Petersfield division of the county of Southampton, in respect of the occupation of offices (joint) situate in St. George's-square, Bishop's Waltham. The claimants carry on in partnership the business of solicitors under the style of Charles Warner & Kirby, at Winchester and Bishop's Waltham. The premises in respect of the occupation of which they claim to be inserted in the list of voters consists of a house situate in St. George's-square, Bishop's Waltham, which they hold under a lease (which was produced before me) at a rental of £20 per annum. For the purposes of their business they use three rooms in the house and a cellar; they also use one bedroom from time to time; the remainder of the house, consisting of three rooms, is occupied by one William Gamblin and his wife. Mrs. Gamblin, the wife of William Gamblin, is employed and paid by Messrs. Warner & Kirby as their caretaker. The name of the said William Gamblin stands on the occupiers' list, Division II., of the parliamentary electors for the parish of Bishop's Waltham in respect of the occupation of the said premises. No objection had been taken to the name of the said William Gamblin remaining on the list. The claims were opposed on the ground that the claimants could not be placed upon the list in respect of the occupation of the tenement in question so long as William Gamblin remained upon the list as qualified to vote in respect of the occupation of the same premises; as the effect of placing the names of Messrs. Kirby & Warner on the list would be to put three voters on the register in respect of the occupation of premises of the clear value of £20 and no more, contrary to the provisions of section 27 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), as read with section 5 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 3). I agreed with this contention and decided that inasmuch as William Gamblin was already on the list of voters in Division II. in respect of the occupation of the same premises, and no objection had been made to his being so qualified, I had no power to place the names of Henry Kirby and James Warner upon the list in respect of the occupation of the same premises."

Due notice of appeal was given by the claimants to the revising barrister, and he accordingly stated the above case.

Lister Drummond, for the claimants.—The claimants have a lease of premises of the clear "yearly value of £20," and are in actual occupation of the premises; primâ facie, therefore, they are both entitled to be registered as joint occupiers in respect of a £10 occupation qualification in Division I. The franchise they claim is a totally different franchise from that in respect of which, rightly or wrongly, William Gamblin's name now stands in Division II. in respect of the same premises; Gamblin's qualification (or supposed qualification) was that of inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house under the service franchise. The service franchise only arises in respect of a "household qualification," and value is no material element for that qualification. The contention, therefore, that placing the claimants' names on the list would be to put three voters on the register in respect of the occupation of premises only worth £20 a year, and therefore contrary to section 21 of the Act of 1867 as read with section 5 of the Act of 1884 is one that is untenable. The revising barrister went wrong in thinking that section 27 of the Act of 1867 in some way dealt with Gamblin's qualification, whereas it applies only £10 occupation voters. In considering the right of the claimants to be inserted in Division I., the fact that Gamblin—who is in the position of an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house by virtue of the service franchise, as to which the question of value does not enter—happens to be on the list in Division II. in respect of the same premises really does not affect the claimants' right at all. In Warren v. Maule, (1894) Fox & Smith's Reg. Cas. 400, it was held that it was no ground for objecting to a voter who was on the overseers' list in respect of a good qualification that some other person whose name was also on the list for the same property, unobjected to, was retained on the list. Lord Russell, L.C.J., in effect there said that a man already on the list could not be taken off on objection merely because someone else was on too, and the same principle mutatis mutandis applies here. Druitt v. Gossling, (1888) Fox & Smith 123, 58 L. J. Q. B. 109, 37 W. R. Dig. 76, was referred to during the argument.

Daldy, for the respondent.—The claimants' case is that they jointly occupy a house which is found to be of the value of £20, and no more; and they say they are both entitled to be placed on the register. The only way in which the revising barrister can take any account, if I may say so, of the position of Gamblin in the matter, is that he might draw some inference from it as to whether Gamblin in fact occupied his part of the premises as a tenant or not. The moment it is found that Gamblin "occupies" any part of these premises, however small the value of that occupation may be to him, the claimants' case is gone, for they ipso facto cease to have the necessary qualification, because it makes the value of their qualifying property something less than £20. Some value must be apportioned to Gamblin's occupation, and the finding that the premises in question are worth "£20 and no more" ends the matter, on a mere question of arithmetic.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I express no opinion as to what should be our view in the event of a claim being made by two persons to get on as joint occupiers in respect of a house the value of which is only £20, and the claim being objected to on the ground that there is some other person who gets a parliamentary vote for the same premises by virtue of the service franchise. I can foresee that difficulties may arise if, as Mr. Drummond contends, the element of value does not enter into that consideration at any rate for all purposes. But it seems to me that that is really not the point that has been raised in this case; and upon the case as stated I think the decision of the revising barrister is quite right. It must be taken upon this case that he has found the house to be worth not more than £20. He states the contention that the house was of clear yearly value of £20 and no more, and he says in his reasons: "I agreed with this contention (the objector's contention), and decided that inasmuch as William Gamblin was already on the list of voters in Division II. in respect of the occupation of the said premises and no objection had been made to his being so qualified, I had no power to place the names of Henry Kirby and James Warner upon the list in respect of the occupation of the same premises." I think that must mean, as he has made a reference to section 27 of the Act of 1867, that the value of the premises (£20) would not be sufficient to allow the two claimants being put on the list as long as there was an occupation by Gamblin of a part of the house. Now, as Mr. Daldy has pointed out, the case states that "the remainder of the house, consisting of three rooms, is occupied by one William Gamblin and his wife," and it goes on to say, "Mrs. Gamblin is the caretaker and is paid by Messrs. Kirby & Warner as caretaker." It seems to me, therefore, as the case is stated, the value of the house, £20, would not admit of three persons being put on the list as occupiers of it. We must take it on this case as stated that Gamblin was an occupier. The claimants' claim was a joint one and there was no claim made by one as distinct from the other of the two. Therefore, in my opinion, the revising barrister was right in saying he could not put Kirby and Warner on the list as long as Gamblin was on the list as an occupier of part of this house. Therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is one of the many cases in which the moment you have got an accurate view of the facts the law settles itself.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should only like to add that I hope this case will never be cited as an authority against the contention put forward very ingeniously, as it seemed to me, by Mr. Drummond. This decision goes on the facts of this particular case, and concludes nothing against the contention of Mr. Drummond in his argument.

CONSTANTINIDI v. CONSTANTINIDI AND LANCE. (a.)

Divorce—Variation of settlement—Wife's adultery—Husband's adultery—Discretion of court—Conduct of parties—Interests of public morality—Retrospective order—Wife's protected life interest—Jurisdiction—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 45—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 3.

In exercising the discretionary jurisdiction of varying settlements, after a dissolution of marriage, conferred upon the court by the Matrimonial Causes Acts, regard is to be had both to the conduct of the parties and to the interests of society and public morality. Consequently, where the successful petitioner for dissolution of marriage has been guilty of flagrant misconduct, the court will take such misconduct into consideration on a subsequent application to vary the marriage settlements, and may decline to exercise its discretion by reason thereof. The Matrimonial Causes Acts do not give the court power to award anything in the nature of damages as between husband and wife, or to inflict any fine or penalty upon the party guilty of a matrimonial offence. The principle upon which the discretion of the court will be exercised is that the loss which a husband—if himself innocent—has sustained by reason of the misconduct of the guilty wife, may be repaired by giving him means to the scale of which he may have learnt to accomodate his mode of life. Though the desire to prevent a co-respondent profiting by his own iniquity may justify turning the scale against a guilty wife, this consideration is not to be carried to the extent of depriving her of everything beyond the bare necessities of life in the condition in which she has been brought up.

The powers given to the court by section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, cannot be exercised retrospectively.

A wife's protected life interest—i.e., a life interest which is to cease upon the happening of certain events, cannot be dealt with by the court under the Matrimonial Causes Acts.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the late Sir Francis Jeune, P., varying the registrar's report on a petition for variation of settlements after a decree absolute for dissolution of marriage.

The circumstances in which the decree nisi was pronounced are reported 52 W. R. 190, [1903] P. 246.

The facts, so far as material, may be shortly stated as follows:

The parties were married on the 26th of October, 1889, and made the acquaintance of the co-respondent in 1896. Before that time the husband and wife had lived on terms of great affection, but in the autumn of that year the respondent and co-respondent met in the country at the house of her father, whose medical adviser the co-respondent was, and when the husband returned from a visit to Switzerland in October, 1896, a marked coldness was exhibited by the wife towards the husband and matrimonial intercourse was refused by her.

The wife left her husband and went to Ireland in 1897, clearly with the intention of never returning to him.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In December, 1899, the husband obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of desertion, the wife offering no real defence.

In February, 1901, she went to Sioux Falls, Dakota, U.S.A., and so commenced what was no doubt a residence intended to qualify for a divorce under the law of Dakota. She obtained such a divorce in February, 1902, and almost immediately after married the co-respondent, who had joined her in Dakota, and thenceforward cohabited with him.

The petition for dissolution of marriage and damages was presented by the husband on the 3rd of July, 1902.

In December, 1902, the respondent filed her answer charging the petitioner with having committed adultery with a woman of notoriously loose character on five specific dates in August, 1901, and also with further acts of adultery with the same woman committed in September, 1902, after the presentation of the petition.

The petitioner contented himself simply with a reply denying the charges of adultery; but at the trial he did not venture to tender himself for cross-examination, and it was proved that he had committed adultery with the woman named in the respondent's answer, and in fact his counsel admitted the accuracy of the various allegations of adultery.

The damages were assessed at £25,000. Upon these findings a decree nisi was pronounced dissolving the marriage.

The respondent and co-respondent each gave notice of appeal, but their appeals were abandoned.

There had been no issue of the marriage.

On the 11th of March, 1904, the husband presented a petition for the variation of the settlements made on his marriage with the respondent. One of these settlements was an ante-nuptial settlement made by the respondent and dated the 23rd of October, 1889; the other a post-nuptial settlement made by the petitioner and dated the 1st of February, 1890.

By the respondent's settlement securities to the value of £51,000, yielding an income of £2,200 per annum, were settled upon trust, after the then intended marriage, to pay the income to the respondent during her life, but during her intended coverture without power of anticipation; and after her death upon certain trusts, both as to capital and income, for her children; and in default of children of the respondent to pay the income to any husband surviving her during his life; and subject thereto upon trust as to capital and income for the respondent's father. And the settlement contained an agreement for the settlement upon the same trusts of any after-acquired property of the respondent.

By the petitioner's settlement securities of the value of £10,000, yielding an income of nearly £400 per annum, were settled upon trust to pay the income to the respondent during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death to the petitioner for his life, and after the death of the survivor, as to both capital and income, upon trusts for the children of the marriage, with an ultimate trust in default of children for the petitioner's next-of-kin.

The respondent's father died in April, 1902, and the respondent thereupon became entitled, under his will, during her life for her separate use, but subject to the life interest of her mother, to the income arising from one-seventh, about £150,000, of his residuary estate, but her interest was made determinable if (among other things) she "shall do or suffer any act or thing or any event shall happen whereby, if the said income were made payable to her for life, she would be deprived of the right personally to receive and enjoy the same or any part thereof, or some other person might become entitled to receive the said income or part thereof."

The petition for the variation of the settlement stated the above facts and alleged that the petitioner's total net income from all sources was about £250; that since the 31st of January, 1897, when the respondent deserted him, she had been in receipt of the income of the whole of the property comprised in the two settlements with the exception of four payments made in 1901 and 1902 amounting altogether to £1,234, while the petitioner continued liable for the annual sum of £430 for rent and taxes in respect of the house in London which had been taken on the footing of the joint income, besides heavy expenses for the upkeep of the house; that the co-respondent had paid no part of the £25,000 damages assessed by the jury at the trial of the petition for dissolution of marriage, and had no property out of which the same could be satisfied; and also that neither the respondent nor the co-respondent had paid any part of the costs to which the petitioner was entitled under the proceedings. The petition then asked that the respondent's settlement might be varied by extinguishing all her interests and powers during the petitioner's lifetime, and that the trustees of the settlement might be ordered to pay to the petitioner during his life the annual income of the settled property; and that the trustees of the petitioner's settlement might be ordered forthwith to reconvey to him the property thereby settled freed from the trusts of the settlement and for his own use and benefit. In her affidavit filed against the petition the respondent again charged the petitioner with having committed repeated acts of adultery, and these were not denied by him.

On the 20th of June, 1904, the decree nisi was made absolute, and shortly afterwards the respondent married the co-respondent according to English law.

On the 9th of November, 1904, the registrar to whom the petition for variation had been referred for report made his report, which commenced by stating that the decree nisi obtained by the petitioner dissolving his marriage with the respondent, "notwithstanding the verdict that the petitioner, was also guilty of adultery," had been made absolute. The report went on to state that there was no issue of the marriage, that by her settlement the respondent had brought into settlement property of the present value of £51,000, and had covenanted to settle after-acquired property, and that subject to the life interest of her mother (then living) the respondent was entitled to a one-seventh share of her father's residuary estate, stated to be upwards of £1,068,000 in value; also that under the petitioner's settlement £10,000 brought into settlement by him was held in trust for the respondent for life, on her death for the petitioner for life, and on the death of the survivor, in default of issue, for the persons entitled to the estate of the petitioner as if he had died intestate a widower; that the income from the £10,000 was now £400 per annum, and that the petitioner admitted an income of about £250. The registrar then submitted that the court should, with consent, order that from and after the date of such order all the interests and powers of the respondent under the petitioner's settlement should be extinguished as if the respondent had died in the lifetime of the petitioner, and that the trustees of that settlement should reconvey the property comprised therein to the petitioner. The report then proceeded: "It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that he should be put in an equal position with the respondent as to means, and that the respondent's settlement should also be varied so that the petitioner should receive the whole, or at least a portion of the income arising from the respondent's trust funds; and attention was called to the fact that the respondent has now married the co-respondent, and that the damages of £25,000 and the costs against the respondent have not been paid. But, having regard to the verdict of the jury of adultery against the petitioner, to there being no issue of the marriage, and to no necessity being shown for providing for the petitioner out of the wife's trust funds, it is submitted that no order should be made as to variation of the respondent's settlement of the 23rd of October, 1889."

The petitioner moved to vary the report except so far as it, by consent, extinguished the interests and powers of the respondent under the petitioner's settlement.

Sir F. Jeune, P., made an order varying the report of the registrar by directing that the trustees of the respondent's settlement should (after retaining their costs), "as from the date of that order, during the joint lives of the petitioner, the respondent, and her mother, pay to the petitioner out of the income of the funds for the time being subject to the said settlement, the annual sum of £1,000, and from and after the death of the mother do thenceforth, during the remainder of the life of the petitioner, pay to him out of the said income, in lieu of the said annual sum of £1,000, the annual sum of £2,000, and do further pay to the petitioner out of the said income the capital sum of £2,000, the said sum to be paid by equal annual instalments of £500, if and so long as the said income, after payment of the said costs and any other annual sum for the time being payable under this order, will extend to the payment of annual instalments of that amount; and, if and so long as the said income will not so far extend, then by such smaller annual instalments as may be necessary." And it was further ordered that the trustees of the petitioner's marriage settlement should forthwith reconvey to him the property thereby settled, freed from the trusts of that settlement, for his own use and benefit absolutely; and the respondent (in respect of her separate estate) and the co-respondent were condemned in the costs incurred and to be incurred by or on behalf of the petitioner of and incidental to that application and the carrying into effect of that order.

This order was made in virtue of the jurisdiction conferred on the court by the following Acts: The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 45: "In any case in which the court shall pronounce a sentence of divorce or judicial separation for adultery of the wife, if it shall be made appear to the court that the wife is entitled to any property either in possession or reversion, it shall be lawful for the court, if it shall think proper, to order such settlement as it shall think reasonable to be made of such property or any part thereof for the benefit of the innocent party and the children of the marriage, or either or any of them."

The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 5: "The court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court shall seem fit."

The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, s. 3: "The court may exercise the powers vested in it by the provisions of section 5 of the Act of 1859, notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage."

The respondent, Mrs. Lance, appealed from so much of the order as dealt with the income of the trust funds comprised in her settlement.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the late Sir Francis Jeune as President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, given on a petition for the variation of marriage settlements presented by the petitioner in the divorce action, Mr. Constantinidi, who obtained a decree for divorce against his wife on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, Dr. Lance. The judgment was given by Sir Francis Jeune, who tried the divorce action, in the exercise of his discretion as the judge who tried that action. It is not disputed in the arguments before us that the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to review the discretion so exercised under the provisions of section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, as amended by section 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, and I think counsel were right in not raising that point, because in my opinion we have jurisdiction. But it is plain that the Court of Appeal ought not to review the discretion of the judge who heard the case and saw the witnesses, and who must necessarily have a knowledge of the facts and of the inferences to be properly drawn greater than the Court of Appeal could have, unless the Court of Appeal can see plainly that the discretion which has been exercised by the judge who tried the case had been exercised on principles not consistent with the spirit of the enactment conferring the discretion, or the principles recognized in the courts as governing the exercise of discretion in the matter of variation of marriage settlements after a decree absolute for divorce.

Now I shall take the facts of this case for the purpose of my judgment from the statement of facts at the commencement of the judgment of Sir Francis Jeune on the hearing of the divorce petition, subject, however to the addition of certain facts which I will mention. These are the words of the President: "In this case adultery was proved to have been committed both by the petitioner and the respondent, and the question is whether, in the exercise of the discretion vested in me by the thirty-first section of the Act of 1857, I ought to pronounce a decree against the wife. The facts as far as they are material are as follows: The parties were married on the 26th of October, 1889. They made the acquaintance of the co-respondent in 1896. Before that time the husband and wife had lived on terms of great affection, but in the autumn of that year the respondent and the co-respondent met in the country house of her father, whose medical adviser the co-respondent was, and when the husband returned from a visit to Switzerland in October, 1896, a marked coldness was exhibited by the wife towards the husband, and matrimonial intercourse was refused by her. The wife left her husband and went to Ireland in 1897, declaring her intention of never returning to him. In December, 1899, the husband obtained a decree for judicial separation on the ground of desertion, the wife offering no real defence. In February, 1901, she went to Sioux Falls, in the State of Dakota, and so commenced what was no doubt a residence intended to qualify for divorce under the law of that State. She obtained such a divorce in January, 1902, and almost immediately after married the co-respondent, who had joined her in Dakota, and thenceforward cohabited with him. It was proved that in July and August, 1901, and also in 1902, the husband committed adultery with a woman of loose character." It is convenient that I should add at this point that the adulteries charged and admitted were not only adulteries at a date prior to the commencement of the suit, but also that they actually continued after the commencement of the suit. The learned President goes on: "From the facts proved in the case I draw the following conclusions—(1) that when the wife left her husband in 1897 she did so because she had transferred her affections to the co-respondent, and the petitioner believed this at the time; (2) that the husband's conduct did not cause or conduce to that of the wife, inasmuch as, without inferring any act of adultery on her part before the bigamous marriage with the co-respondent, no such adultery was either proved or charged, there can, I think, be no doubt that, at least when she went to Dakota in February, 1901, and probably some time before, she was contemplating an American divorce from her husband, and consequently a marriage to and adultery with the co-respondent; (3) that the wife's conduct in leaving her husband in order after an interval to commit adultery with the co-respondent may in the sequence of events have caused or conduced to the adultery of the husband. How far it did so I shall presently consider."

Besides these facts I shall take into consideration, the following: First, the fact that the divorce decree has not been appealed against, whence we may draw, I think, the inference that while the learned judge was of opinion that the wife's conduct in leaving her husband in order after an interval to commit adultery with the co-respondent might in the sequence of events have caused or conduced to the adultery of the husband, the respondent has accepted that conclusion in fact of the learned judge by not appealing against the divorce decree. Secondly, I shall take into consideration that although the learned judge cannot have supposed that any conduct of the petitioner was proved at the trial inconsistent with the palliation of adultery by the desertion of his wife, yet that there is no evidence that the petitioner had at the time of his adulteries after the judicial separation in 1889 any knowledge of any facts likely to have led him to yield to temptation and commit adultery with a common woman, adultery continuing after the commencement of the action, while he gave no explanation leading to the conclusion that even now he has abandoned this connection. This seems to me to have been an outrage on common decency. There is, in other words, nothing which one can take into consideration in palliation of the petitioner's adultery other than the mere fact that his wife had left England and gone abroad to a remote town in a remote state of the United States. There is no evidence whatever of any personal association of the respondent and co-respondent after the judicial separation in 1899, and before the judicial separation in 1899, and before the husband's adulteries. There is also the fact that the petitioner avoided cross-examination as to the general charges of adultery, and avoided giving the sort of explanation which he would have had to give if the Queen's Proctor had intervened during the progress of the trial or after the granting of the decree nisi by giving no evidence in disproof of his adultery, thus bringing himself within section 3 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, and relieving himself thereby from liability to answer questions tending to show that he had been guilty of adultery.

Having thus stated the facts, I will now deal with the principles which ought to govern this statutory power of varying marriage settlements. First of all it is to be remembered that in the exercise of the powers conferred by the Divorce Act the court must have regard not only to the rights and liabilities of the matrimonial person wronged and the wrongdoer respectively inter se, but also to the interests of society and public morality, which generally require that the relief and benefits which the court has the power of giving under those Acts shall hardly ever be given to those who themselves have been guilty of matrimonial infidelity. There may be such palliation of matrimonial infidelity by a petitioner that public morality will not be outraged by the exercise of judicial discretion in favour of such a petitioner. This is, I think, established by the case of Symons v. Symons, which is quoted by the learned President in his divorce judgment, but the fact that the petitioner has been so guilty must always be taken into consideration in the interests of public morality.

Dealing with these principles first, I find in Chetwynd v. Chetwynd the following passage: "In exercising the discretion accorded to the court under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, (1859) s. 5, I have felt bound to bear in mind the conduct of the two parties as well as their pecuniary position. In section 32 of the original Divorce Act, by which power was given to make provision for the wife in case of divorce, the court was expressly told to consider the wife's fortune, the ability of the husband, and the conduct of the parties. And although these words are not repeated in the subsequent Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 5, they serve to exhibit the spirit of the Legislature in these provisions, and form a fitting guide for the court. In the endeavour to adjust the means to be accorded to the petitioner and the burden to be borne by the respondent several conditions must be borne in mind. It was well not to forget that, though the breaking up of the married life was caused immediately by the conduct of the respondent, its stability had been undermined by the withdrawal of the petitioner's affections. It was a subject of fair comment that but for the extravagance of the petitioner and the conduct which made her the object of her husband's not unreasonable suspicions the common fund would have been more ample. Nor ought the fact to have been lost sight of, sworn to by the respondent, that the sum of £1,000 had been received since the marriage by the petitioner the benefit of which is now hers if she has not already spent it. The future of the respondent had also to be considered and the available means which would be left him to sustain his position in his home. If the reasonable needs of the wife did not demand it the court could hardly feel justified in so reducing his income as to render his future residence on his property impossible." Then in the case of March v. March, Lord Penzance as the Judge Ordinary says, speaking of the same section: "The court will look at the probable pecuniary position which the parties and their children would have occupied if the marriage which the settlement contemplated had been a binding union and the parties had lived in harmony together upon their joint income. If this union has been broken and the common home has been abandoned by the criminality of one without fault in the other it seems just that the innocent party should not in addition to the grievous wrong done by the breach of the marriage vow be wholly deprived of means, to the scale of which he may have learnt to accommodate his mode of living; nor viewing the matter on the other side does it seem either just or equitable that funds which were intended at the time of the marriage for the use of both should be borne off by the guilty party, and perhaps transferred to the hands of the adulterer as the dowry of a second marriage. The interests of society point in the same direction. It would be an evil example if this court were to decide that the entire fortune of a wealthy married woman were to be reckoned as part of the prospects of an adulterer or the resources of a second home for a guilty woman." Then later on in the same judgment Lord Penzance goes on: "This"—that is, the figure that he has just given—"will not effect an exact division of their joint incomes, nor is it so designed. The relative sums contributed by each party, the conduct of each, the total amounts of their joint income, the relation it bears to the requirements of the parties and their respective prospects of increased income are all elements to be considered. These elements are not capable of exact expression in figures and the result must be a general one varying according to the details of each case." This cause went to appeal, and Mellor, J., who was a member of that court, quotes from the judgment of Lord Penzance this passage: "If this union has been broken and the common home abandoned by the criminality of one without fault in the other it seems just that the innocent party should not in addition to the grievous wrong done by the breach of the marriage vow be wholly deprived of means to the scale of which he may have learnt to accommodate his mode of life." Then Mellor, J., says: "That I consider to be a sound exposition, and it is my view of the intention of the statute." I think the passages cited in this judgment justify the proposition that the principle is that the sum awarded to the injured husband by variation of the settlements must be measured by what is necessary to give the husband means to the scale of which he may have learnt to accommodate his own mode of life. I cannot myself find anything in the judgment that this measure may be disregarded for the purpose of preventing the co-respondent from making any pecuniary profit out of his own iniquity, and certainly not in a case where the petitioner himself has been guilty of shameless adultery. I do not say that the fact that the guilty wife and the co-respondent have married and will jointly enjoy such income as the wife retains under the marriage settlement after variation is not to be taken into consideration. But it is obvious that this consideration is not to be carried to the extent of depriving the guilty wife of everything beyond the bare necessities of life in the condition in which she had been brought up. The desire to prevent the co-respondent profiting by his iniquity may justify the turning of the scale in favour of a liberal allowance to the husband to enable him to live with the surroundings that he would have had in the joint home, or may justify the turning of the scale against the wife, but I cannot think it should do more. In the present case, in my judgment, so far as the rights of the parties inter se are concerned, £1,000 a year is the outside which should have been allowed as income to the husband, and I do not think that the interests of public morality would justify the giving of a larger sum to a husband himself guilty of adultery on the score that the more he gets the less benefit will the co-respondent derive from his iniquity.

Now, I have gone through so much of the judgment of the learned President as refers to what I may call the first £1,000, because I thought that whatever might be the ultimate conclusion of this court with regard to this appeal it was right and proper that I should express my opinion as to this part of the judgment; but in fact it is not necessary in the view that I take that I should consider in any way the quantum of allowance to the husband, or how it has been arrived at, because in my opinion the case must be governed by that principle to which I referred to at the commencement of my observations to-day, that the Legislature deliberately, and acting in accordance with the feelings, I would say, of the English people, has shown from first to last an intention that the court should not deal with either the question of divorce itself or any of those subsidiary questions which might arise as between the husband and wife upon the basis of the rights and wrongs of the husband and wife to the exclusion of the interests of public morality. I have already acquiesced in the correctness of the view of Sir Francis Jeune that there may be circumstances in which the relief and benefit which the court has power under these Acts of Parliament to confer may be conferred upon even a guilty party without outraging in any way public decency or public morality, and I refer to the case of Symons v. Symons, which I have already mentioned; but those cases must be very rare. I cannot myself see in the present case that the benefits intended to be conferred by the Legislature on the wife or, as in the present case, the husband who has been wronged, can, having regard to his conduct, be conferred upon him without seriously trenching upon the spirit of public morality which seems to me to run through these Acts of Parliament. It is remarkable that when Sir Francis Jeune is giving his judgment in the divorce case, although he speaks of the adulteries, the dates of which appear in the particulars, he nowhere alludes to that which I consider from the point of view of public decency and morality is of the highest importance. I mean that actually at the moment and after the moment when the husband had come into court to ask for relief on the ground of the misconduct of his wife he himself was continuing and did continue to indulge a connection which was an outrage, as I have said, on public decency, and the view that I take is that the conclusion arrived at by the learned registrar in the last paragraph of his report was right, and ought to have been acted upon and affirmed. That conclusion is: "Having regard to the verdict of the jury of adultery against the petitioner, to there being no issue of the marriage, and to no necessity being shown for providing for the petitioner out of the wife's trust funds, it is submitted that no order should be made as to variation of the respondent's settlement of the 23rd of October, 1899." I think that conclusion is right.

It will be observed that in the earlier part of the report the registrar has said: "Having heard counsel on behalf of the petitioner and respondent, it is submitted that the court should with consent order that from and after the date of such order all the interests and powers of the respondent in and upon the said indenture of settlement bearing date the 1st of February, 1890, be extinguished as if the respondent had died in the lifetime of the petitioner and that the trustees of the said settlement do reconvey the property comprised therein to the petitioner"—that is, the property which the petitioner had brought into settlement. That has been ordered by consent to be restored to the petitioner. That of course stands, but I think that the learned registrar was quite right in not only mentioning the misconduct of the husband but also in mentioning the fact that that which it was proposed by his report to refuse to give to the petitioner was not anything which was essential to his support in the condition of life in which he is, but was something that was asked for for the purpose of restoring to this petitioner the luxuries of life which he had enjoyed during the continuance of the marriage of the respondent to the petitioner. Now, having said this, I really do not know that it is necessary for me to say much more, because if my conclusion is right up to this point no question can possibly arise as to the second £1,000, which was directed to be paid by the trustees to the petitioner after certain moneys came to the respondent by reason of the death of her mother, because it is plain, if my conclusion has been right as to the first £1,000, it must also be right as to the second. But I do wish to say that even if my conclusion as to the first £1,000 had been merely that the £1,000 was a sum which could be given to the petitioner, and I had supported the order in so far as it applied to that £1,000, I should have come to the conclusion that the second £1,000 ought not to have been allowed to the petitioner. I should have come to that conclusion by reason of the principle laid down in Chetwynd v. Chetwynd and in March v. March, because, as I have already said in my judgment, there is nothing in either of those judgments which does away with the view that the means essential to the continuation of the scale of living enjoyed by the petitioner during the continuance of the joint home are primâ facie a measure of the allowance of income which ought to be made—(I am leaving out, of course, the case of children)—in the interests of the husband. I do not think any useful purpose would be answered by my going through the steps by which the learned President first arrived at this figure, really treating the property the subject of the will as if it could be a subject-matter of settlement which could be dealt with under section 5 of the Act of 1859.

With regard to the last part of the order—that is, the order by which the £500 a year was to be paid for four years so that the husband might be recouped the amounts that had accumulated and had not been expended by the wife out of the husband's settlement on the wife—I expressed in the course of the argument the opinion that that order cannot be justified because in substance it would be to treat the powers under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, as justifying a retrospective order. There again I think it is not necessary for me to go into the matter, taking the view that I do. The only observation which I will make on this last point by way of precaution is that where a guilty wife has put her husband to considerable expenditure by reason of her personal conduct, in considering the amount to be allowed to the husband by variation of settlements we must take into consideration the existence of liabilities and a larger expenditure of money that may be made which will postpone the time when the injured party will get the benefit of the variation unless something is added to the income either temporarily or permanently as to enable him to meet those liabilities.

I think that this appeal should be allowed, and that an order should be made in the sense of the report of the learned registrar.

STIRLING, L.J.—In this case the court is asked to exercise a delicate jurisdiction in a novel and difficult case, and to review the decision of a learned judge who had large knowledge and experience, in the exercise of that jurisdiction. I approach the case without any such knowledge or experience, but I have endeavoured to do my best to consider what conclusion the court ought to arrive at in the present case, and I think it is right, as we are differing from the late President of the court, to state as shortly as may be the ground for the conclusions at which I arrive.

I begin by observing that under the Divorce Acts there exists no power in the court to award anything in the shape of damages as between husband and wife, although there are powers in the court to award damages against a co-respondent. Further, there is no power to inflict anything in the nature of a fine or penalty for a matrimonial offence upon a guilty person. No such jurisdiction is conferred, nor does the application which has given rise to the present judgment under appeal seek so to do. The powers which the court has are conferred by two enactments; one section 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which provides that "In any case in which the court shall pronounce a sentence of divorce or judicial separation for adultery of the wife, if it shall be made to appear to the court that the wife is entitled to any property, either in possession or reversion, it shall be lawful for the court if it shall think proper to order such settlement as it shall think reasonable to be made of such property or any part therof for the benefit of the innocent party and the children of the marriage or either or any of them." The second is section 5 of the Act of 1859, which provides that "The court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such order with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court shall seem fit." In the present case the petition on which the order under appeal was founded was in terms an application to the court to exercise the power conferred by the latter of these enactments, but it seems to me that in the exercise of that jurisdiction the court might also have seen fit, and at most it would only have required an amendment of the petition, if that had been the view of the court, to bring into operation the jurisdiction contained in section 45 of the Act of 1857. I say this in view of some few remarks which I shall have to make hereafter with regard to the property which belongs to the wife beyond that which is contained in the ante-nuptial and post-nuptial settlements which it is sought to vary. The jurisdiction was conferred in the year 1859, and the mode in which the very wide discretion was conferred on the court by section 5 of the Act of 1859 has been repeatedly considered. I think the best exposition is to be found in the case which has already been referred to by my lord of March v. March, which was not only a carefully considered decision of Lord Penzance, the then President of the court, but was affirmed by the Court of Appeal then in existence. I do not desire to read again the portions of the judgment then delivered which have been already referred to, but I desire to state that I wish most fully to give effect to everything which was there laid down. It appears to me that at this distance of time it would not be right to reconsider that case. Without saying that it is exhaustive, it seems to me to be a sufficient exposition of the principles in the present case from which I do not desire to depart. The late President refers in his judgment to that case and to Noel v. Noel as the authorities on which he bases his statement of the law, and I do not think that he meant in any way to depart from what is there laid down; but with the utmost respect to him, I think that, at all events in one respect, the language which he has used on this subject has gone beyond that which is warranted by the cases to which he refers, and which I think may have given rise to misconception. I refer to that portion of the judgment in which he lays down as a broad principle that the co-respondent is not to be allowed to make any pecuniary profit out of his own iniquity. Though I entirely recognize the regard which is to be given, as is pointed out in the judgment, to public morality, I think that is an expression which might be misinterpreted as conferring a much wider jurisdiction than I conceive to be conferred by the Legislature on that footing, and I should prefer for myself to state the law in this way—that in the exercise of every discretion which is vested in the court, the court must so use that discretion as to promote the interests of virtue and morality, and to discourage vice and immorality.

Now, having made these preliminary observations, I pass on to consider more particularly the matters to which the court is to have regard according to the decisions in exercising this principle. They are shortly stated by Lord Penzance in a passage which has not been read, and which I will now read. He says: "The relative sums contributed by each party, the conduct of each, and the total amount of their joint income, the relation it bears to the requirements of the parties and their respective prospects of increased income are all elements to be considered. These elements are not capable of exact expression in figures and the result must be a general one varying according to the details of each case." That being so, let me consider shortly each of these elements which have to be considered.

Now, as regards the first, "the relative sums contributed by each party," they stand thus: By the wife there has been brought into settlement a sum of £51,000, yielding £2,200 per annum, by the husband a sum of £10,000, yielding somewhere between £300 and £400 per annum, and I may state here conveniently that the husband was entitled to the income of another sum of £10,000, which made the income arising from the funds which were either brought into the settlement by him or on his behalf of which he was possessed, £710 a year. The total amount, therefore, of the joint income approximates closely to £3,000; it falls somewhat short of it. Passing by, for the moment, the conduct of the parties, there has to be considered the relation which it bears to the requirements of the parties.

Now, in this case the one point that most requires consideration is this, that there are no children of the marriage, and, therefore, that element, which is an important one, has not to be considered. The husband, it appears, gave up business before he married, and it has been stated that he has not resumed business.

Then we come to consider the conduct of the parties. Now that is a matter which has given me the greatest anxiety. I begin with the wife, which is the simpler case of the two. The short facts are these: That the wife ever since the year 1896, the marriage having taken place, I think, in 1889, withdrew her affections from her husband and bestowed them on the co-respondent. From January, 1897, she has ceased to live with her husband, who in 1899 obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of desertion. From 1901 she was actually engaged in the endeavour to obtain a divorce in a distant country with the view of marrying the co-respondent, and in this she ultimately succeeded, although neither the divorce nor the marriage can be recognized by law of this country. For all this course of conduct I see no palliation or excuse whatsoever, as it seems to me it is impossible for the court to arrive at a conclusion other than this, that she has been guilty of a great matrimonial offence. As regards the husband, he, having availed himself of his legal right to a judicial separation, proceeded in 1902 to bring an action for dissolution of his marriage founded on the remarriage and cohabitation of his wife with the co-respondent. But previously to this, in August and September, 1901, and subsequently, and in September and November, 1902, during the pendency of the petition, he was guilty of what the learned President stigmatized in his judgment as shameless adultery. No explanation has been given of the circumstances in which this offence was committed. The petitioner did not go into the box to explain his conduct, or to express regret at his having been guilty of this flagrant violation of morality, and the only excuse for it which the circumstances disclose is his wife's desertion. Notwithstanding this, the learned President exercised his discretion in favour of the husband and dissolved the marriage at his instance, and from that there was an appeal, as I understand, in the first instance, but it was afterwards abandoned. I cannot think, however, that this exonerates the court on this application from taking into consideration the conduct of the husband.

Lastly, there is to be considered the respective prospects of increased income. Now, so far as appears the husband has apparently none. The wife will, if she survives her mother, under the will of her father, succeed to what is commonly termed a protected life interest in a capital sum of £150,000 or thereabouts. By a protected life interest I mean that it is made to cease in certain events, and, amongst others, if the "wife shall do or suffer any act or thing or any event shall happen whereby if the said income were made payable to her for life she would be deprived of the right personally to receive and enjoy the same or any part thereof or some other person might become entitled to receive the said income or part thereof." That fund is not the subject of an ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlement within the meaning of section 5 of the Act. If the wife's life interest had been absolute it might have fallen under section 41 of the Act of 1857, but it is obvious from the terms of the gift that any order which the court might make directly affecting that life interest would be futile, inasmuch as it would produce a cessation of the life interest according to the terms of the will.

Now, by the order appealed from this has been done. The learned President has thought fit to order that "the said trustees do as from the date of this order during the joint lives of the petitioner, the respondent, and her mother pay the petitioner out of the income of the funds for the time being subject to the said settlement the annual sum of £1,000, and from and after the death of the mother do thenceforth, during the remainder of the life of the petitioner, pay to him out of the said income in lieu of the said annual sum of £1,000 the annual sum of £2,000, and do further pay to the petitioner out of the said income the capital sum of £2,000, the said sum to be paid by equal annual instalments of £500, if and so long as the said income after payment of the said costs and any other annual sum for the time being payable under this order." So that for the first four years he directs the payment of £1,500, and during the rest of the time till the death of the mother an annual payment of £1,000, and afterwards the sum of £2,000.

Now, the existence of the life interest, as I have said, is not one which is under the control of the court. It certainly is not one which can be dealt with under the operation of section 5 of the Act of 1859. It is only a matter which the court can take into consideration in making the order. The learned President and the learned counsel for the petitioner, the husband, in this case have, in supporting the order so far as it relates to the additional sum of £1,000, which is to be paid after the death of the mother, relied on the case of Noel v. Noel, but in that case the marriage had been dissolved at the suit of the husband, and by the marriage settlement the wife had a certain interest in the husband's property and had settled her own property, including certain reversionary property which was stated to be of great value. In that case the question arose as to what was to be done with the income of the reversionary property which, be it observed, was the subject-matter of the settlement when it fell into possession, and the then President, Sir James Hannen, says this: "With regard to the wife's reversionary interest, I am of opinion that half of that income when it falls in must be paid to the husband on this principle: When a woman by her own fault has broken up a family of which she was a part, the court must endeavour to put the husband and the children, as far as money goes, in the same position as they would have been if she had not broken it up." With that principle and with the application of it made in that case I entirely agree, but, be it observed, it is very different from the present case. In the first place, the fund was one which was the subject of the settlement, and therefore the learned President had full power to deal with it directly. In the second place, there were children in existence there, and where there are children of a marriage who succeed to property comprised in the settlement it is of high importance that they should be brought up in accordance with the fortunes to which they succeed, and the court would exercise the right and would exercise the discretion vested in it by the statute in such a way as to secure this. Lastly, in that case the husband was entirely innocent and had been guilty of no matrimonial offence.

Now, as regards this part of the case, it is clear when one reads the judgment of the learned President that, in the first instance, he was under a misapprehension. He thought that he had power, or at all events he forgot for the moment that he had no power, to deal with this fund directly. He certainly had not power to deal with it under section 5 of the Act of 1859. Although I think he might have had power to deal with it under the Act of 1857, I am not sure that he intended to exercise the jurisdiction. When the terms of the father's will were called to his attention he saw that the order which he clearly expresses himself as about to make would be futile, and consequently he altered the order in the way in which it now stands.

I am unable to agree with the view that was taken by the learned President. I am not satisfied, the first place, that he really exercised his discretion in view of a full and careful investigation of the facts. In the second place, I think that he went beyond the law as laid down in the case to which I have referred of March v. March, and I think that he omitted to take into consideration to a sufficient extent the conduct of the petitioner; and, in the third place, I think he more than simply repaired the loss which had been occasioned to the petitioner, even if an innocent person, according to the standard which is laid down in March v. March—namely, that he is not to be wholly deprived of means to the scale of which he may have learnt to accommodate his mode of life. As regards the four sums of £500, which are payable during the first four years, these were sums directed to be paid inasmuch as the wife appeared during four years' desertion to have received an income coming from the husband's funds. The wife was quite willing as a term of settlement that the future income should be paid to the husband, but in exercising the statutory jurisdiction the learned President had no power to give it a retrospective action, and it seems to me that by the order which he made he was in effect giving it retrospective operation.

On these two points I am unable to agree with the learned President.

I have had more difficulty as regards the sum of £1,000, which the learned President directed to be paid in the first instance. I feel very strongly that the conduct of the petitioner does not entitle him to great consideration from the court, but the learned President, notwithstanding the nature of that conduct, saw fit to dissolve the marriage and to exercise the discretion which the Act gave him. I have hesitated as to whether the sum which the learned President first awarded ought to be departed from, but as my learned brothers both take a strong view, with which I sympathize, against the petitioner, and think it was not right that he should be allowed anything out of that fund, I am not prepared to differ from them, and I therefore agree with their order.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—It would not be right for me to occupy the court more than a few minutes inasmuch as I entirely assent to the elaborate judgments which have been delivered by my lord and Stirling, L.J., but I desire very briefly to state the reasons which have influenced me.

It is settled by authority which binds us, and I think I should have come to the same conclusion apart from authority, that in exercising the jurisdiction conferred upon the court of varying settlements the conduct, not of one party, but of both parties, must be had regard to, and that we must also not forget considerations of public morality and public decency.

Now, it was strenuously argued before us by Mr. Lawson Walton and Mr. Priestley that the judgment of the late President in the divorce case has concluded that matter; that the husband must be regarded as completely whitewashed, as in fact innocent, and that it is not open now for us in exercising the discretion conferred on us by the section to treat the husband as a man who has been guilty of any matrimonial offence or as a man whose conduct is deserving in any way of reprobation. I am entirely unable to assent to that view. I think it is within the power of the court, and if it is within the power of the court, it is part of the duty of the court to consider all the circumstances of this case affecting both the husband and the wife. Without pretending to weigh in the balance minutely the faults of the husband and the wife, I do not feel myself able to say that the conduct of the husband was not more outrageous and not more subversive of public decency than that of the wife.

I wish to refer for a moment to the report of the judgment in the divorce suit, which is to be found in [1903] P., p. 246, because there is a most unfortunate error which I think was somewhat overlooked by the learned judge himself. The statement at p. 247 of the acts of adultery by the petitioner represents them as being all before the presentation of the petition; but what are the dates? The petition is dated the 3rd of July, 1902. The acts of adultery prior to that date I say nothing about, but the acts of adultery alleged by the respondent in her answer filed on the 18th of December, 1902, alleged and admitted, were the 18th, 21st, 24th, and 29th of September, 1902, and 3rd, 14th, 15th, and 20th of November, 1902. I think it is not exaggerating to say that the acts of adultery were alleged and admitted up to or on the very eve of the answer of the respondent to the petition. It is not left there, because not only did the husband come shamelessly into court asking to be relieved in respect of his wife's adultery when he was himself continuing, after the presentation of the petition and almost up to the trial, committing his own adultery, but he has studiously and persistently, on the hearing of the divorce proceedings and again on the hearing of this petition, evaded any liability to cross-examination as to his past relations, and it may be as to his present relations, with the person who Sir Francis Jeune has described as a "professional seductress."

All I can say is, I decline to exercise my judicial discretion in favour of a petitioner whose conduct has been such as I have described. It seems to me that the registrar's report was perfectly right, and that we should not in the exercise of our discretion be justified in giving a petitioner guilty of conduct such as I have described any part of the property brought by the wife into the settlement. In my view the order ought to be as reported by the registrar, and the order of the learned President ought to be set aside.

I only wish just to point out that there may possibly be a question hereafter under the wife's settlement, because there is a trust that "If the said Julia Ralli shall have left a husband her surviving upon trust to pay him a life interest." If the parties are content to leave that for further discussion hereafter, so be it. It may be well possibly even to get rid of that now by varying to that extent the trust of that settlement. However, that does not arise possibly upon this appeal.

From C. A. (England). July 24, 1905.

MAYOR, &c., OF WESTMINSTER v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Metropolis—Local government—Public health—Public convenience—Approaches—Subway—Trespass—Subsoil of roadway and footway—Injunction—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 44.

By the Public Health (Metropolis) Act, 1891, s. 44, power was given to the sanitary authority to construct and maintain public sanitary conveniences, and for this purpose the subsoil of the roadway, exclusive of the footway adjoining a building, was vested in the sanitary authority.

Where the sanitary authorities had made such conveniences in the roadway beneath the soil connected by a subway from pavement to pavement, with an exit in the footway adjoining respondents' premises, and who were owners of the soil ad medium filum, an injunction was granted directing the sanitary authorities to remove that portion of the structure only which encroached upon the footway. In other respects the matter was in the discretion of the authorities.

Decision of Joyce, J., to this effect (50 W. R. 268, [1902] 1 Ch. 269) restored, and that of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 596, [1904] 1 Ch. 759) reversed (Lord James of Hereford dissenting).

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 596, [1904] 1 Ch. 759) (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), which reversed a decision of Joyce, J. (50 W. R. 268, [1902] 1 Ch. 269).

The facts are given in Lord Macnaghten's judgment. It will suffice to state that certain freehold premises at the corner of Parliament-street and Bridge-street, Westminster, were conveyed to the respondents in July, 1886. At this date the pavement of Parliament-street was 12 feet wide opposite these premises, and there were certain vaults belonging to the premises under the footway and projecting into the road.

In 1899 Parliament-street was widened and the footway increased to the width of 20 feet.

In 1900 the appellants constructed certain underground conveniences in the centre of Parliament-street, and provided with approaches by means of a subway with staircases at either end at or near the edge of the pavement. One of these staircases was opposite the respondents' premises and was placed to the extent of 2ft. 9in. within the kerbstones of the pavement as altered in 1899.

Joyce, J., directed the removal of that portion of the staircase which projected over the respondent's land to the extent of 2ft. 9in. on the footway aforesaid, but the Court of Appeal made a different and more extensive order.

The Corporation of Westminster appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Hughes, K.C., and Dighton Pollock, for the appellants.

Younger, K.C., Montague Shearman, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It seems to me that the power of the local authority to erect certain public conveniences cannot be disputed. The shape, site, and extent of them are left to the discretion of the authority in question, and so far as the things themselves, which, under this discretion, have been erected, I do not understand that any objection can be made. The objections, so far as they assume the force of legal objections, refer to the access to them, and to the supposed motives of the local authority in the selection of the site. Assuming the thing done to be within the discretion of the local authority, no court has power to interfere with the mode in which it has exercised it. Where the Legislature has confided the power to a particular body, with a discretion how it is to be used, it is beyond the power of any court to contest that discretion. Of course, this assumes that the thing done is the thing which the Legislature has authorized: see Truman v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 34 W. R. 657, 11 App. Cas. 45, 34 W. R. Dig. 131. It appears to me impossible to contend that these conveniences are not the things authorized by the Legislature. It seems to me that the provision of the statute itself contemplates that such conveniences should be made beneath public roads, and if beneath public roads, some access underneath the road level must be provided; and if some access must be provided, it must be a measure simply of greater and less convenience, when the street is a wide one, whether an access should be provided at only one or at both sides of the street. That if the access is provided at both sides of the street it is possible that people who have no desire or necessity to use the convenience will nevertheless pass through it to avoid the dangers of crossing the carriage-way, seems to me to form no objection to the provision itself; and I decline altogether to sit in judgment upon the discretion of the local authorities upon such materials as are before us. I quite agree that, if the power to make one kind of building was fraudulently used for the purpose of making another kind of building, the power given by the Legislature for one purpose could not be used for another; but I have endeavoured to show that the Legislature did contemplate making subterranean works under the roadway and also access to them. Under these circumstances, I think it is a question of degree, and if there be the express provision, as I think there is, to make a tunnel under the street for the purpose of these conveniencies, then I think the question of its extent or cost is a matter with which neither a court of law or equity has any concern, since the thing contemplated by the statute has been done, and done in the way which the statute contemplated it might be done. That the public may use it for a purpose beyond what the statute contemplated is nothing to the purpose. I think the judgment of Joyce, J., should be restored. With respect to the costs of this litigation. I cannot look over the fact that the local authority made a blunder, and interfered with the footway. That has now been put right, but in the first instance led to the litigation. Then, I think, the negotiation and correspondence was not as candid as it should have been, and I think, therefore, that neither side in this controversy should have any costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—At the southern or lower end of Parliament-street, just before you come to Bridge-street, where in consequence of recent improvements there is a distance of about 100ft. between the opposite buildings, the appellants, as the sanitary authority of the City of Westminster, have constructed public lavatories and other conveniences for the use of persons of both sexes. These conveniences are placed under the ground in the middle of the street, as far removed as possible from the buildings on either side. The plan of the construction is this: On each side of the roadway there is an entrance, 5ft. 9in. wide, protected by railings and leading by a staircase of the same width to a passage or subway, 10ft. wide and 8ft. high, which runs the whole way across on a level with the underground conveniences. Out of this subway there are openings—two for men and one for women—into spacious chambers, where the usual accommodation (politely described as lavatories and cloakrooms) is provided on a large and liberal scale. All the arrangements seem to have been designed and carried out with due regard to decency, and with every possible consideration for the comfort of wayfarers in need of such accommodation. The London and North-Western Railway Co. are the owners of a large and valuable block of buildings on the east side of Parliament-street, having a frontage to Parliament-street and a frontage to Bridge-street, with vaults under the pavement in Parliament-street, and a claim, for what it is worth, to the soil beneath the roadway up to the mid line of the street. They took objection to the sanitary works constructed by the corporation, and sought to have them removed. They put their case alternatively as a case of trespass or of obstruction to the highway causing special damage. The corporation relied on their statutory powers under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, which authorizes them to construct such public sanitary conveniences, and vests in them for the purpose the subsoil of the road, exclusive of the footway. When the parties came to trial it was found that owing to some mistake or inadvertence the works of the corporation had encroached on the footway. Joyce, J., before whom the case was tried, ordered the corporation to remove the encroachment, but made no order as to costs. On appeal by the plaintiffs, the court ordered the corporation to "pull down and remove the whole of the staircase, railings, and other works placed by the defendants upon the lands of the plaintiffs other than the conveniences in the pleadings mentioned, and such further portion of the construction, as the court" might, "upon application, sanction as a proper approach to the said conveniences." The order was to be suspended pending an appeal to this House, and the corporation were to pay the costs of the action and of the appeal. The corporation have acquiesced in the order of Joyce, J. Their only contention now is that the order of the Court of Appeal is wrong.

There can be no question as to the law applicable to the case. It is well settled that a public body invested with statutory powers such as those conferred upon the corporation must take care not to exceed or abuse its powers. It must keep within the limits of the authority committed to it. It must act in good faith. And it must act reasonably. The last proposition is involved in the second, if not in the first. But in the present case I think it will be convenient to take it separately. Now, looking merely at what has been done—at the work as designed and actually constructed—it seems to me that, apart from the encroachment on the footway, it is impossible to contend that the work is in excess of what was authorized by the Act of 1891. The conveniences themselves, extensive as the accommodation is, have not been condemned by the Court of Appeal or even attacked in the evidence. Then the entrance from the roadway is only 5ft. 9in. wide; so is the staircase. It is in evidence that a width of 4ft. 6in. is "necessary" in order to enable two persons to pass on the staircase. The witness who gave that evidence was pressed to say that "under ordinary circumstances 4ft. 6in. to 5ft. would be a wide entrance for a thing of this sort." "No" he replied, "not ample. You want to give a minimum of 5ft., if you can, and more than that. You would give 6ft. if you had got plenty of space." So the entrance actually provided which has be encondemned by the Court of Appeal, and as I think without evidence, is just nine inches wider than the minimum width which the only witness examined on the point says ought to be provided, and three inches narrower than what he thinks should be allowed if space permits. It seems rather a strong measure to invoke the powers of the court in so trifling a matter, especially considering that the excess, if excess there be, cannot make the slightest practical difference to the respondents. Then I come to the subway, which has not been opened to the public as yet. Now, there is not a scrap of evidence tending to show that there is anything improper or suspicious about the subway. One witness was asked if he had "ever known an approach to a convenience which was ten feet wide except this." He said he had not, and there the matter dropped. But then no instance could be given—at any rate, no instance was given—of a convenience so large placed in the centre of a street so wide and approached from either side. If it is permissible to construct a convenience approachable from either side of a wide street, you cannot prevent the public from using the subway as a thoroughfare. I should think it most unlikely that it would be largely used, if used at all, by persons not desirous of availing themselves of the convenience. But it is possible; Vaughan Williams, L.J., thinks it more than possible. He has "no doubt, apart from the conveniences, the subway at the present moment is a considerable convenience to pedestrians." There seems to be no experience to guide one on the point. And so the corporation were, I think, not to be blamed for making provision in order to obviate crushing and jostling in a place where crowding is (to say the least) not convenient. I have not forgotten that there are two passages in the evidence which one of the learned Lords Justices quotes at length, and on which all the members of the court appear to rely. It seems that the chairman of the works committee admitted that this tunnel (as it has been called), 10ft. wide and 8ft. high, was "both an approach and a subway." That seems to have been thought a very damaging admission. Of course it was a subway. It was a subway capable of being used as a thoroughfare. It would have been a subway if there had been no thoroughfare. For my part I do not quite understand all this play upon words. Then there was another passage in the evidence supposed to be more damaging still, in which a witness said that he did "not see any necessity for 10ft." It would, he admitted, be "a waste of space and a waste of money." But if you look at the context, it is perfectly clear that the learned Lord Justice was under a misapprehension. The witness was not referring to the subway, which was 10ft. wide. He was not thinking of the subway. The questions put to him both by the learned counsel and by the judge were addressed to the entrance and staircase, to which very different considerations apply. It was not suggested that there was any notice, or any intention of putting up a notice directing the public to this subway as a means of crossing. The entrance, which was of the usual limited dimensions, did not of itself offer any invitation to the public to enter for the purpose of crossing the roadway.

Then I come to the question of good faith. That is a very serious charge. It is not enough to show that the corporation contemplated that the public might use the subway as a means of crossing the street. That was an obvious possibility. It cannot be otherwise if you have an entrance on each side and the communication is not interrupted by a wall or barrier of some sort. In order to make out a case of bad faith it must be shown that the corporation constructed this subway as a means of crossing the street under colour and pretence of providing public conveniences which were not really wanted at that particular place. That was the view of their conduct taken by the Court of Appeal. "In my judgment," says Vaughan Williams, L.J., "it is not true to say that the corporation have taken this land which they have taken, with the object of using it for the purposes authorized by the Legislature." "You are acting mala fide," he added, "if you are seeking to acquire and acquiring lands for a purpose not authorized by the Act of Parliament." So you are; there can be no doubt of that The other learned Lords Justices seem to take the same view of the conduct of the corporation. Now this, as I said, is a very serious charge. A gross breach of public duty, and all for a mere fad! The learned judge who tried the case had before him the chairman of the works committee. That gentleman declared that his committee considered with very great care for a couple of years or more the question of these conveniences in Parliament-street. He asserted on oath that "the primary object of the committee was to provide these conveniences." Why is this gentleman not to be believed? The learned judge who saw and heard him believed his statement. The learned judges of the Court of Appeal discredited his testimony, mainly, if not entirely, on the ground of two letters about which he was not asked a single question—one written by the surveyor of the parishes of St. Margaret's and St. John's under the city engineer of Westminster, the other by a person acting for the acting town clerk. The letter of the surveyor was a foolish letter, which the writer seems to have thought clever. The letter of the temporary representative of the acting town clerk, if you compare the two letters, seems to have derived its inspiration from the same source. I cannot conceive why the solemn statement of the chairman of the committee should be discredited on such a ground. I do not think there is anything in the minutes tending to disprove his testimony. I agree with Joyce, J., that the primary object of the council was the construction of the conveniences with the requisite and proper means of approach thereto and exit therefrom.

I have felt more difficulty with regard to the question whether the corporation have acted altogether reasonably, "with judgment and discretion," as Turner, L.J., puts it in a well-known case. It seems to me that, when a public body is exercising statutory powers conferred upon it for the benefit of the public, it is bound to have some regard to the interest of those who may suffer for the good of the community. I do not think it is right—I am sure it is not wise—for such a body to keep its plans secret and carry them into execution without fair and frank communication with those whose interests may possibly be prejudiced or affected. I cannot help thinking that, if the engineer of the corporation and the engineer of the railway company had been put into communication, some modification of plan might have been suggested which would have obviated all this litigation and expense, and all the litigation and expense yet to come if the Court of Appeal is to take upon itself, as it proposes to do, the functions of a sanitary authority and determine the precise dimensions of approaches to such a place as this. The surveyor thought it politic and not unworthy of his position as an officer of a great public body to try and throw dust in the eyes of his correspondent. I do not suppose that the officials of the railway company were put off their guard by the answer which he sent. I have no doubt they knew perfectly well what the corporation proposed to do. But still, the mode in which they were met prevented anything like a free interchange of ideas between these two bodies for their mutual advantage. The result of these considerations to my mind is that if at the trial the respondents had suggested any practical mode of altering or amending the plans that would have obviated the inconvenience which the works as executed must cause to them, I should, speaking for myself, have been disposed to think that an injunction ought to have been granted to secure that object. Unfortunately the respondents chose to stand aloof, and have given no assistance to the court. Under these circumstances I think there is no alternative but to allow the appeal, and to restore the judgment of Joyce, J. But I think there ought to be no costs either here or in the Court of Appeal.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD, after stating the facts and giving a summary of the evidence, said: Now upon these facts it seems to me to be clear that the intention of the local authority was to construct two distinct objects, a convenience with an approach and a subway. It is true that a portion of the subway would be used as the approach to the convenience, but the subway would also be used by those who did not intend to visit the convenience, but only desired to cross free of danger from one side of Parliament-street to the other. It is also clear that in consequence of this double user the subway was made of four feet greater breadth than would have been necessary if only an approach to the convenience had been constructed. Such being a summary of the facts before your lordships, it is necessary to consider with what legal powers the appellants and their predecessors were invested so as to authorize the construction of the works in question. Inasmuch as the soil of the respondents has been taken without their sanction for the purposes of the works, the appellants must show legal authority for such an act. By section 44 of the Public Health Act (London), 1891, power was conferred upon sanitary authorities to provide and maintain public conveniences, and in order to carry out the exercise of the power the subsoil of any road (required for the purpose) was vested in the sanitary authority. This is the only legislative authority under which a justification for the act done is alleged. It will be noted that there is no legislative power given to local authorities to construct subways. Now, I agree in the view that has been taken that the powers to construct a convenience under the Act of 1891 of necessity include a power to construct an approach thereto. And so the question to be solved seems to be thus formulated: Was the so-called tunnel an approach to the convenience only, or was it something more? (1) Was it a subway distinct from the approach, or (2) was it a subway in combination with the approach used for two distinct purposes? In my judgment the construction in question comes within one or other of the two latter alternatives. Possibly within the first, certainly within the second. If this finding on the facts be correct, the works, so far as they constitute the subway, are constructed without legal authority. The Legislature has not thought it right to confer on local bodies the power to compulsorily take land or impose rates for the purpose of constructing subways. In this case some land has been taken which would not have been required if the approach had not been enlarged into a subway, and an unauthorized burden has been imposed upon the ratepayers in consequence of this enlargement. Thus it is, in my opinion, that the appellants have acted beyond their powers and without justification. I have only to add that the reasons for their judgment given by the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal appear to me to be unanswerable, and I therefore think that those judgments ought to be confirmed and this appeal dismissed.

Lord LINDLEY, whose judgment was read by Lord Macnaghten, concurred in the motion made by the Lord Chancellor.

This was an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J., and raised an important question as to what is included under the term "common lodging-house" in the Common Lodging-houses Acts, 1851 and 1853.

The case came before the learned judge upon a motion by a subscriber to the Providence (Row) Night Refuge and Home, on behalf of himself and all other subscribers to the charity, other than the defendants, to restrain the defendants from using the premises known as the Providence (Row) Night Refuge and Home, Crispin-street and Raven-row, Bishopsgate-street Without, as a common lodging-house without registering the same pursuant to the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, and without having obtained a licence under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902, and from otherwise using the premises for any unlawful purpose, and from employing the funds of the subscribers for any such purpose.

The home was founded in 1860 under a charitable trust created by the will of the Rev. Dr. Gilbert, D.D., to provide food and shelter for the deserving destitute poor without distinction of class, nationality, or creed. The annual report stated that in the working of the home there was no distinction or creed; no charge was made; and every case was inquired into. There were separate sections for men and women. Lodgings, suppers, and breakfast, and use of lavatories were provided free. Every inmate had to make a statement as to his position; if on inquiry his statement proved satisfactory he was allowed to remain several days looking for work. There was evidence that the persons admitted to the home were destitutes of the poorest class, but they did not differ from the class who habitually frequented cheap lodging-houses. They slept in bunks placed in open dormitories, each dormitory containing about seventy persons, and their meals were taken together in common rooms. It was also proved that the house was clean, well kept, and well conducted.

In 1900 a scheme was sanctioned for the management of the charity and its endowments.

The greater part of the funds expended in support of the home was derived from voluntary subscriptions from the general public.

The house was not registered as a common lodging-house under the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, nor was any licence applied for under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902.

In November, 1904, an officer of the county council endeavoured to inspect the home but was refused admittance. Two informations were accordingly preferred against the secretary of the institution—(a) under the Act of 1851 for refusing to admit the officer, and (b) under Part IX. of the Act of 1902 for keeping a common lodging-house without a licence.

The magistrate convicted the secretary, and fined him 1s. upon each information.

Upon an appeal to the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Ridley, JJ.) this conviction was affirmed. That case is reported sub. nom. Gilbert v. Jones, ante, p. 94, [1905] 2 K. B. 691.

As no further appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court was possible, the present proceedings—which were of a friendly character—were commenced for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Court of Appeal, and, if necessary, of the House of Lords, upon the question whether these premises were to be regarded as a common lodging-house within the Act of 1851.

On behalf of the plaintiff, it was suggested to the learned judge that the injunction should be limited to restraining the defendants from employing the funds voluntarily subscribed to the charity for the purposes mentioned in the notice of motion. This would get rid of the necessity of making the Charity Commissioners parties to the proceedings (see Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, s. 62); and, as the greater part of the funds of the charity were derived from voluntary subscriptions and not from endowments, the injunction in that limited form would be sufficient for the purpose of raising the question which the subscribers wished to have determined.

For the defendants, it was admitted that the injunction could not be resisted in that court in the face of the decision of the Divisional Court, whereupon Kekewich, J., granted an injunction in the limited form proposed on behalf of the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Acland, K.C., and Ricketts, for the appellants.—Both the learned magistrate and the Divisional Court held in Gilbert v. Jones that the Institution now in question was covered by the decisions in Logsdon v. Booth, 48 W. R. 266, [1900] 1 Q. B. 401, and Logsdon v. Trotter, 48 W. R. 365, [1900] 1 Q. B. 617. But in both those cases the question the court had to consider was whether the Salvation Army shelters, which were admittedly lodging-houses, were "common lodging-houses" within the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851. Here the institution makes no charge at all, unlike the Salvation Army shelters, and it is submitted that an institution which provides lodgings gratis is not a "lodging-house" at all. There is no definition of "lodging-house" in the Acts, and a charitable institution not kept for purposes of gain is not a lodging-house in the ordinary acceptation of the word: Booth v. Ferret, 38 W. R. 718, 25 Q. B. D. 87.

Avory, K.C., and Nepean, for the plaintiff.—This appeal cannot be allowed without overruling Logsdon v. Booth and Logsdon v. Trotter. The object of this house is to provide lodgings, and therefore it is a lodging-house. It is plainly a "common lodging-house" within Logsdon v. Booth and Logsdon v. Trotter. In both these cases the payment made was small and the institutions were not carried on for gain but for charitable purposes. The fact that no payment is made here instead of a nominal payment can make no difference.

Acland, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 30.—The case was set down in this day's paper for hearing, but on its being called on,

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said that their lordships had found one statute, the Common Lodging-houses Act, Ireland, 1860, to which their attention had not been called in argument, and they thought judgment ought to be postponed a short time to give counsel an opportunity of considering it.

Judgment was postponed accordingly.

The statute in question is intituled: "An Act to remove doubts as to the application of 'The Common Lodging-houses Acts' to Ireland, and to amend the provisions of the same as far as they relate to Ireland." It recites that: "Whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1851, and the Common Lodging-houses Act, 1853, extend to Ireland, and difficulties have occurred in the execution of the said Acts therein; and it is expedient that such doubts and difficulties should be removed, and for that purpose that the said Acts should be explained and amended with reference to the execution thereof in Ireland. Be it therefore enacted," &c. Section 2 provides for the extension of those Acts to Ireland. Section 3 provides as follows: "For the purpose of the execution of the said recited Acts and of this Act in Ireland, certain words and expressions in the said Acts are hereby declared and explained to have been intended to bear the following meanings." Then there is this definition: "The term 'common lodging-house' shall mean a house in which persons are harboured or lodged for hire for a single night, or for less than a week at a time, or any part of which is let for any term less than a week."

Avory, K.C., and Nepean, for the plaintiff.—We submit that this Act carries the matter no further. It is limited to the execution of the Acts of 1851 and 1853 in Ireland. The Legislature must therefore be taken to have had no intention of extending the definition to England.

Acland, K.C., and Ricketts, for the defendants.—The object of the Act of 1860 is to extend the Acts of 1851 and 1853. The intention of the Legislature is plain that the term "lodging-house" shall have the same meaning in both England and Ireland. To bring a "common lodging-house" within the Acts of 1851 and 1853 there must be a monetary payment by the persons resorting to it.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Until our attention was called to the Common Lodging-houses Act, Ireland, 1860, I was disposed, and I think the other members of the court were disposed, to put the construction upon the Act of 1851 which was put upon it by Lord Alverstone and his brother judges in the King's Bench Division. In truth and in fact (I do not mean to say without hesitation, because it was with hesitation) I had written a judgment, which I hold in my hand, to that effect. I had come to the conclusion that the reasoning of the King's Bench Division ought to be accepted; but, as I have already said, not quite without hesitation, for I had expressed in my judgment the grave doubts that had arisen in my mind by reason of the exclusion, in the opinion of the law officers, given in 1854, of public-houses from the definition of "common lodging-houses." I doubted whether it was not a fair inference that the law officers of the Crown recognized the description in in the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, as applying, not only to the Public Health Act of 1848, but to other sanitary legislation. I had that doubt, and I was met by the authority of the King's Bench Division itself, and also by observations of Lord Russell in Logsdon v. Booth and Channell, J., in Logsdon v. Trotter, that it might be that that conclusion of the law officers of the Crown was arrived at because they thought that the sections of the Acts of Parliament of 1851 and 1853 only applied where the main object of keeping the lodging-house was the supply of lodgings to the poorer classes, and especially to those poorer classes who want lodgings for a very short time. I thought that the law officers of the Crown might have said to themselves, that is not the main object in the case of a public-house; the main object in the case of a public-house is probably the sale of beer, or other things, as the case may be. That was the conclusion which I, with some hesitation, had arrived at, and it was a conclusion which it was satisfactory to me to think would exclude from the operation of the Act institutions like hospitals, convalescent homes, and homes for women servants—young women seeking places in London. But now that my attention has been addressed to this Act of 1860, I think it is impossible to doubt but that the words of section 3 of that Act are intended to refer to the two Acts of Parliament—the Common Lodging-houses Act of 1851 and the Common Lodging-houses Act of 1853—and to apply to those Acts exclusively. The suggestion of Mr. Avory really was that they were intended to effectuate the passing of an independent Act which was not either one of these Acts, but was an Act passed for application to Ireland alone. I really do not think that it is necessary to repeat the observations which were made in the course of argument. I have no doubt myself at all but that we must treat the words in the definition clause of this Act of 1860, s. 3, as applying to the two English Acts.

The result is this. It says: "The term 'common lodging-house' shall mean (it is not 'shall include,' but 'shall mean') a house in which persons are harboured or lodged for hire for a single night, or for less than a week at a time, or any part of which is let for any term less than a week." That definition applies to the two English Acts which I have mentioned; and inasmuch as this Providence (Row) Night Refuge and Home is an institution in which poor people are not "harboured or lodged for hire," it follows that this institution is outside "common lodging-houses" as defined in those Acts, and those Acts do not apply.

Of course it follows, without going in detail through it, that Part IX. of the private Act of the London County Council, called the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902, which only applies to the same subject-matter as that to which the Common Lodging-houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, apply, has no application at all to this institution.

I wish to say with regard to the decision of the judges of the King's Bench Division, which does not require any indorsement from me as to the logic and sufficiency of the conclusion which they arrived at, that they arrived at the conclusion which I was prepared to affirm, without having this Act of 1860 called to their attention at all; and although it is part of the duty of a judge to know the common law, there is the old authority of Lord Coke for saying that it is not part of his duty to know the statute law. Lord Coke said that statutes were very frequent in his time. What he would have said if he had seen the multiplication of statutes in modern times I really do not know.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that section 3 of the Act of 1860 shows what meaning the Legislature intended the term "common lodging-house" to bear in the Common Lodging-houses Acts of 1851 and 1853.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and, like my lord, I had written a judgment at the end of the arguments in this case agreeing with the view taken by the Divisional Court last August, but our attention having now been called to this Act of 1860, I am driven to the conclusion that we have here that which we could not find before—namely, a definition, in the strictest possible sense of that word, of the words "common lodging-house" applying to the Common Lodging-houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, not merely in Ireland, but in England also. It is a necessary element of a lodging-house within this definition that persons should be lodged for hire. As in this house everything is gratuitous, I am driven to the conclusion that the view taken by the police magistrate and by the Divisional Court last August, their attention not having been called to this Act, was wrong, and that this appeal must succeed.

I should be sorry that it should be thought for a moment that, in allowing this appeal, we are throwing any doubt whatever upon the view taken by the Divisional Court in 1900 that a lodging-house does not cease to be a lodging-house within the meaning of the Acts if it is carried on for charity, and not for purposes of gain. Not one word that has fallen from us—I think I may say for my colleagues, and certainly for myself—is intended to throw the smallest doubt upon that proposition; but I should just like, not at all by way of definition, but by way of illustration, to give some instances in which I think charitable institutions making a charge may or may not fall within the Act.

In the first place, I think the persons receiving the benefit of the charity must be of the very poor and humble class, whose sanitary conditions call for special attention. That was the view taken by the law officers, to which my lord has referred, and that has been throughout the view of those in charge.

In the next place, I think the sleeping of members not of the same family in cubicles or beds in a common room and having meals in a common room does not constitute a common lodging-house unless such reception and accommodation can be deemed the substantial and main purpose of the charity. For example, a hospital or convalescent home is really established for other purposes, and although the patients sleep in wards, that is a mere incident, and does not suffice to constitute a common lodging-house.

Lastly, a charitable institution will not cease to be a common lodging-house by reason only that the charity has other purposes, either benevolent or religious, which, taken by themselves, are outside the operation of the Acts of 1851 and 1853. This was the case with the Salvation Army shelters dealt with in Logsdon v. Booth.

Nov. 1.—Avory, K.C., and E. A. Nepean called the attention of the court to the circumstance that the Common Lodging-houses Act Ireland, 1860, had been repealed by section 294 of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, and suggested a doubt whether it was permissible to look at an Act which had been repealed for the purpose of construing an earlier Act.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think it makes any difference. The Act of 1860 says that certain expressions used in the Acts of 1851 and 1853 "are hereby declared and explained to have been intended to bear the following meanings." Therefore it must have been an intention at the time of the passing of the Acts of 1851 and 1853. Although they were not intended to apply to Ireland when they were passed, it would not otherwise be true to say that it was "intended to mean." It is quite true that the Act of 1860 was passed for application to Ireland, but the point is that it says what the expression "common lodging-house" in the Acts of 1851 and 1853 was "intended to mean." If it is an Act which determines the construction of another Act of Parliament for the time being, the repeal cannot make it wrong for us to look at it. The construction of an Act of Parliament must be once and for all. It cannot be altered by the repeal of a statute which has defined the construction of the Act.

STIRLING and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Will — Construction — "Moneys owing" — Money on deposit at bank — Payable after notice — Bearing interest.

A gift in a will of moneys owing to the testator includes money standing in the testator's name on deposit account at a bank and bearing interest, whether such money is capable of being withdrawn on demand or only after seven days' notice.

Originating summons.

By his will, made in 1883, W. S. Derbyshire gave and devised all his estate and effects, whether real or personal, "upon trust for the following purposes—namely, to collect and get in all moneys owing to me at the time of my decease," and after payment of his debts and funeral expenses to pay the proceeds to his wife, his two sons, and a daughter (naming them) in equal shares, and to pay the income, profits, interest, or rents that might accrue for the time being in similar fourth parts, and after the decease of his wife her share was to be divided among his said children, or, if any of them did not survive his wife, his or her share was to go to his or her issue. Executors were appointed, but no trustees were named.

The testator died in April, 1903, possessed of real and leasehold estates; of £3,975 standing on deposit account at the Charing Cross Bank, which could be withdrawn after seven days' notice; of £567 standing on deposit account at the Birkbeck Bank, which could be withdrawn at any time on demand, and of other moneys.

This summons was taken out by the husband of the daughter, who had died in the testator's lifetime intestate, and of whose estate the husband was administrator, against the executors and other beneficiaries of the testator, asking several questions as to the construction of the will, and among them (question 2) what was included in the gift of "all moneys owing to me at my decease"?

BUCKLEY, J., having decided that as regards the "moneys owing" to the testator (which was called estate "A") they were given to the beneficiaries absolutely; that there was no intestacy; that the gift over upon the death of the wife applied only to the rest of the estate of the testator (estate "B") and not to estate "A," and that under section 33 of the Wills Act the children of the testator were to be deemed to have become absolutely entitled to their original shares in both estate "A" and estate "B," proceeded to consider question 2.

P. M. Walters, for a child of a deceased son and a child of a deceased daughter of the testator.—Moneys on deposit at a bank bearing interest are not "moneys owing" within the meaning of the gift (Parker v. Marchant, In re Price, 53 W. R. 600, [1905] 2 Ch. 55; Stein v. Ritterdon, 16 W. R. 477, 37 L. J. Ch. 369); nor are moneys only payable after notice: Mayne v. Mayne, In re Wheeler, 52 W. R. 586, [1904] 2 Ch. 66.

W. Higgins and Seddon appeared for other beneficiaries.

BUCKLEY, J.—It has been argued that from the information before me I ought to draw the inference that the expression "moneys owing to me" is to be construed so as not to include moneys at a bank bearing interest, but I find nothing to show that any other construction than the simple meaning of the words themselves ought to be adopted. I find it laid down in Foley v. Hill that money handed to a banker becomes the banker's money, and that the relation between the banker and his customer is that of debtor and creditor. That state of things exists before the customer, by presenting a cheque or in any other way demanding payment, creates a debt on which he can sue. Lord Lyndhurst in Parker v. Marchant, 1 Phil., p. 361, says: "Sir W. Grant after some hesitation was of opinion that the balance at the bankers would pass under the description of a debt owing to the testator. He said, and I think he justly said, it is a debt, and may be recovered as a debt." Among other cases Mayne v. Mayne, In re Wheeler, and In re Price go to show that under the words "ready money," money in a bank on deposit withdrawable on demand will pass, but money in a bank on deposit requiring notice of withdrawal does not. It has been said that I ought to apply that distinction in this sense, that inasmuch as the money in the Birkbeck Bank being payable on demand is ready money, therefore it is not "owing at the testator's decease," for the two terms are under the circumstances mutually exclusive. I do not find myself under that necessity. I hold that the moneys in the Birkbeck Bank, although they are payable on demand, are yet moneys owing at the testator's decease, on the principle laid down in Foley v. Hill. With regard to the money on deposit in the Charing Cross Bank the revelant considerations seem to me to be these: If in the case of moneys handed to a banker the relation of debtor and creditor exists, though no demand for payment has yet been made, I do not see why moneys payable after notice should not be moneys owing equally with moneys for the payment of which no notice is required. Both are due but not yet payable, the only difference is that in the one case they become payable only after the expiration of the notice. The principle upon which Parker v. Marchant was decided is applicable to both cases. I have not to inquire whether they are ready money or not in order to ascertain whether or not they are moneys owing. I think that moneys owing, for the withdrawal of which notice is necessary, are equally owing with those for which no notice is required. Both are moneys owing at the testator's decease. In Petty v. Wilson, where it was held that moneys receivable under a policy of assurance passed as money of which the testator died possessed, Sir C. J. Selwyn said: "The case in this respect differs but little from that of money owing to the testator on a promissory note and payable on a day which did not arrive till after his decease." And Sir G. M. Giffard said: "It would be much too refined to say that this money was not due and owing to him because it was not payable to him but to his executors."

Will—Legacy—Advance to legatee to be brought into hotchpot—Erroneous statement of fact—Account.

A testator, by his will, left his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for his wife during her life or widowhood, and at her death or remarriage to divide the same amongst his children living at her death or remarriage, and the issue of deceased children in equal shares per stirpes. The will contained a recital that the testator had advanced to three of his sons respectively certain specified amounts and a direction that parts of the amounts so specified should be brought into hotchpot, or so much thereof as remained unpaid at the death or remarriage of testator's wife. In the case of one of the sons the amount of the advance was incorrectly stated and in excess of the fact.

Held, that the son was only bound to account for such amount as had actually been advanced to him by the testator.

Further consideration.

The testator by his will, dated the 28th of January, 1885, gave, devised, and bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees in trust to pay the income thereof to his wife during her life or widowhood, and at her death or remarriage to divide the said residuary estate equally between his children then living and the issue of deceased children, such issue taking between them equally the share which their parent would have taken if living. And the testator further directed that, "inasmuch as my son Thomas Owen Kelsey is indebted to me in the sum of £1,200, and my son Oswald Arnold [otherwise Arnold Robert] Kelsey is indebted to me in the sum of £4,000, and my son Stanley Woolley Kelsey is indebted to me in the sum of £5,000, and I am desirous of reducing the amount in which they are respectively so indebted to me as follows—that is to say, as to the said Thomas Owen Kelsey to the sum of £600, as to the said Oswald Arnold Kelsey to the sum of £2,000, and as to the said Stanley Woolley Kelsey to the sum of £3,000. Now, therefore, I hereby forgive to my said three sons the balance of the respective sums in which they are respectively indebted to me over and above the said respective sums of £600, £2,000, and £3,000, and I declare that the said respective sums of £600, £2,000, and £3,000, or as much thereof respectively as shall remain unpaid at the time of the decease or remarriage of my said wife shall be deducted and taken into account as part of their respective shares in my trust estate. And I also declare that in case any other sums shall be entered in my private ledger as owing to me by any of my children, the sum so entered in my private ledger shall be final and conclusive evidence as to the amounts owing to me or to my estate by any of my said children, but the said sums of £600, £2,000, and £3,000 to be considered as due to me at my decease unless previously paid, although not entered into such private ledger."

The testator died on the 15th of February, 1885.

On the master's certificate it was found that the recital in the will as to the amount advanced to the said Stanley Kelsey was in fact erroneous, the only advance being an apprenticeship premium of £80. None of this had been repaid.

The question now before the court was whether the said Stanley Kelsey was bound to account for the amount named in the will or only for the amount actually advanced.

SWINFEN EADY, J., following In re Taylor's Estate, said that the testator, by forgiving part of the alleged debt and only directing that the alleged balance, or so much thereof as remained unpaid, should be brought into hotchpot, showed that he only meant that Stanley Kelsey should account for actual advances, to an extent not exceeding £3,000, less repayments if any. He held, therefore, that Stanley Kelsey was only chargeable with the amount actually advanced—namely, £80.

Maugham v. Sharpe, 12 W. R. 1057, 17 C. B. N. S. 443, followed.

Adjourned summons.

William Wray carried on business under his own name at Laurel House, North-hill, Highgate. He took into partnership his sons Henry Wray and William James Wray and Joseph Turnbull, and the business was carried on by them under the style of "William Wray."

In 1885 William Wray died, and his widow, Eliza Wray, was admitted to the partnership in his place. The business was carried on under the same style as before.

The partners bought North Hill House, Highgate, in 1890 for £1,150, and paid for the same out of the partnership assets.

A conveyance was executed on the 22nd of September, 1890. It was made between the vendor of the one part and "William Wray, of Laurel House, North-hill, Highgate, in the county of Middlesex, optician (hereinafter called the purchaser), of the other part," and witnessed that "in consideration of the sum of £1,150 as purchase-money to the vendor paid by the purchaser on or before the execution of these presents . . . the vendor as beneficial owner hereby conveys unto the purchaser" North Hill House "to hold the same unto and to the use of the purchaser in fee simple."

The conveyance was executed by the vendor and also by Henry Wray, who signed the name "William Wray" at the end of the conveyance with the concurrence of the other partners. Henry Wray retired from the partnership, receiving from his partners the full value of his share in the partnership assets, including North Hill House; and died in 1902. His widow, who was his sole executrix and representative, did not claim any beneficial interest in the property.

The heir-at-law of William Wray was William James Wray, one of the partners. Since the purchase North Hill House had always been dealt with as part of the partnership assets.

This was a summons taken out by the three continuing partners for a declaration that upon the true construction of the conveyance the legal estate in North Hill House passed to the persons then carrying on business under the style of William Wray—namely, the plaintiffs and the late Henry Wray—as part of their partnership property.

H. Greenwood, for the summons.

C. J. Mathew, for the representative of Henry Wray, offered no opposition.

WARRINGTON, J., having stated the above-mentioned facts, said: The only question I have to decide is what has become of the legal estate in North Hill House, for under the circumstances the legal interest and the beneficial interest go in the same way. The question turns upon the meaning to be given to the conveyance to William Wray. An authority has been cited which, although it does not deal with real estate, appears to be exactly in point, Maugham v. Sharpe, 12 W. R. 1057, 17 C. B. N. S. 443. In that case a certain person called William Dolby, to secure an advance made by two persons named Sharpe and Baker, who carried on business under the style of the City Investment and Advance Co., executed a deed whereby he assigned by way of mortgage certain chattels to the City Investment and Advance Co. The question arose in the case as to the effect of that deed and as to the rights of Sharpe and Baker under it, and on that part of the case Erle, C.J., and Williams, J., made the remarks which I am about to read. The Lord Chief Justice said this: "The bill of sale under which the defendants claim purports to convey the property to the City Investment and Advance Co., and not to the defendants by name; and it was contended for the plaintiff that the goods could not pass to Sharpe and Baker. No doubt Dolby considered that there was a company of which the one was manager and the other secretary. It is clear that individuals may carry on business under any name and style which they may choose to adopt, and I see no reason why the defendants may not do so under the name of the City Investment and Advance Co. If parties pretend to be a corporation, and presume to usurp the rights and powers of a corporate body as against the Crown, they may render themselves liable to be proceeded against for so doing. But, as between these parties, the City Investment and Advance Co. are Sharpe and Baker, and consequently the conveyance in question is a conveyance to those individuals." Williams, J., made the following remarks: "It has been objected on the part of the plaintiff that that conveyance is inoperative, because it is necessary in a grant that the grantees should be named, otherwise the grant can in law have no operation. I apprehend, however, it is fully settled that a grant may be good though the grantee be not named by his Christian or surname. In Shepherd's Touchstone, p. 236, the learned author, after discussing the consequences of a mistake in the Christian name or surname of the grantee, goes on to say: 'And yet, if the grant do not intend to describe the grantee by his known name, but by some other matter, there it may be good by a certain description of the person, without either surname or name of baptism'; for, he adds, 'id certum est quod certum reddi potest.' In this case, I apprehend, the meaning of the grant is plain; the deed purports and intends to convey the goods to those persons who use the style and firm of the City Investment and Advance Co. They may or may not be a corporation, but when it is ascertained that those who carry on business under that name are the defendants, the deed operates to convey the property to them."

It seems to me that although the decision in that case only dealt with chattels, the reasoning of the judgment applies to the particular case before me. I have to ascertain who was meant by the person described as William Wray in the deed; and I find on the authority of this judgment that I may, instead of William Wray, read the deed as a conveyance to the four partners—Eliza Wray, Henry Wray, William James Wray, and Joseph Turnbull. So reading the deed and inserting the names of the partners, it becomes a conveyance to these four persons. The legal estate is not affected by the fact that the purchase-money was partnership property, and the beneficial interest was already vested in the four partners. I will therefore make a declaration that the legal estate passed to the plaintiffs and Henry Wray as joint tenants, and that on the death of Henry Wray it passed to and is now vested in the plaintiffs in fee simple.

E. N. (who was illegitimate), while under sixteen, resided with her mother for three years in the parish of West Ham under circumstances which rendered her irremovable from that parish and settled therein. After attaining sixteen she had acquired no new settlement.

Held, she had acquired a settlement for herself in West Ham.

Appeal from order of Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 513, [1904] 2 K. B. 121) (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.), affirming the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), on a special case (52 W. R. 30, [1903] 2 K. B. 627).

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case is set out at length in the court below and the necessary facts are given in Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Emma Neep, an illegitmate child, was born in the Wisbech Union in 1879. From the 27th of June, 1890, to the 28th of July, 1893, she resided with her mother in the West Ham Union in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the statutes in that behalf, render her irremovable therefrom and settled therein. Afterwards she went into service, but has had no settled residence. The Court of Appeal were of opinion that she had acquired a settlement in West Ham.

Aug. 3.—Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case, if it were res integra, I might be inclined to favour the view which Mr. Lush has urged upon us with so much ability. Indeed, I am not sure that I would not go further than he does and strive to bring back the meaning of the word "settlement" to the meaning it had when Butt and Lord Kenyon were its expositors; but the statute which has turned a "status or irremovability" into a settlement has rendered such an effort impossible.

The case of Reg. v. Elvet, 7 W. R. 586, 2 E. & E. 266, expounded as it was by your lordships in this House, decides the question here in debate. Rightly or wrongly, this House has decided that unemancipated residence could found a settlement in the Highworth case, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465. I see no answer to what the Master of the Rolls points out, that if a part of the residence while under sixteen may be available to make up the settlement, with what logic could it be suggested that the whole residence under sixteen cannot do so also.

If that decision was wrong, we must abide by it till it is altered by an Act of Parliament. I move, therefore, that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The question proposed in the special case for the opinion of the court is whether Emma Neep, the mother of the pauper, acquired a settlement in West Ham under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, ss. 34, 35.

The opinion of the Court of Appeal was in the affirmative. In the result of that opinion I agree. But I was much impressed by the argument of counsel as to the difficulties that may arise if it be held that an unemancipated child can acquire a settlement by residence, no part of which is after emancipation. And therefore, without expressing disagreement with the view of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, I should be disposed to rest the case on section 35 rather than on section 34. Emma Neep was herself illegitimate. Her mother married after Emma was born, and derived from her husband a settlement in West Ham. Emma Neep resided with her mother and her mother's husband in West Ham, and she took and followed her mother's settlement until she attained the age of sixteen. On attaining that age she "retained" her mother's settlement. But her settlement then, in my opinion, ceased to be a derivative settlement, and became a statutory settlement—a settlement created for the first time by the second clause of section 35 of the Act of 1876. And thus Emma Neep acquired a settlement which was no longer a derivative settlement in the parish of West Ham.

By the first clause of section 35 all derivative settlements are abolished, with two exceptions—one in the case of a wife, which has no application to the present question; the other in the case of a legitimate child under the age of sixteen. In the latter case the child on attaining sixteen retains the settlement which it had taken up to that age. But it can no longer be a derivative settlement, for the enactment expressly abolishes derivative settlements, with the two exceptions I have referred to. A corresponding result must, as it seems to me, follow in the case of an illegitimate child, though the provision is rather obscure owing to its brevity. "The practical effect of the second clause of section 35 is," says Lord Watson, "to place illegitimate, as nearly as may be, on the same footing with legitimate children."

SPACEY v. DOWLAIS GAS LIGHT AND COKE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Factory — Gas mains — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A workman was employed by a gas company in opening up a road under which a gas main was laid so as to get at the main. While doing so he was injured by an accident. The gas company owned the gasworks where the gas was manufactured and the mains under the roads in the district which were connected with the gasworks and were used for distributing the gas to the consumers' houses. The place where the accident happened was about a quarter of a mile from the gasworks, and there was no steam, water, or other mechanical power used there. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was admitted that the gasworks themselves were a factory.

Held, that the gas mains did not form part of the factory, and that the applicant was not employed on or about a factory when the accident happened.

Appeal from an award by Judge Gwilym Williams at the Merthyr Tydfil County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a workman in the employment of the Dowlais Gas Light and Coke Co., who owned the gasworks and distributing mains connected therewith at Dowlais. The applicant while employed in opening up a road for the purpose of getting at a gas main was injured by an accident. The place where the accident happened was about a quarter of a mile from the gasworks, which were a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. No steam, water, or other mechanical power was used at the place in question. The applicant claimed compensation upon the ground that the gasworks and gas mains were all part of one concern, which was a factory within the Act, and that therefore the employment at the time of the accident was "on or in or about a factory."

The county court judge held that the gas mains were part of the factory, and that therefore the applicant was entitled to compensation.

The employers appealed.

A. Parsons, for the employers.—The gasworks themselves are a factory within the definition in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by reason of the incorporation therein of the definition of factory in section 149, sub-section 1 (c), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The gasworks are a factory because gas is made there by the aid of mechanical power. The gas mains, however, are no part of the factory. They are concerned, not with the manufacture, but with the distribution of gas after it has been manufactured. The county court judge misapplied some dicta in Fenn v. Miller, 48 W. R. 369, [1900] 1 Q. B. 788, and therefore misdirected himself in coming to his conclusion. If his decision was right every place to which the mains extend are part of the factory. Such a conclusion cannot be supported. The decision is therefore wrong.

Bigham (J. Sankey with him), for the applicant.—Such undertakings as gas, electric light, and water undertakings are different from other undertakings which are carried on in factories. In ordinary factories the goods are manufactured in the factory and then delivered to purchasers either at the factory or by means of carts or by rail. Gas, electric light, and water can only be delivered by means of mains which belong to the undertakers and which are part of one entire undertaking. The gasworks are only valuable if they are connected with a system of mains so that the gas may be supplied to the houses of consumers. It is impossible to separate the manufacture from the supply of gas. Therefore the county court judge was right in holding that the applicant was at the time of the accident employed on or about a factory. Further, assuming that the mains are no part of the factory, still the applicant was employed "about" the factory. "About" denotes physical contiguity, and that physical contiguity with the factory is provided by means of a continuous line of pipes. The county court judge's finding, so far as it is a finding of fact, cannot be disturbed.

He referred to Powell v. Brown, 47 W. R. 145, [1899] 1 Q. B. 157; Atkinson v. Lumb, 51 W. R. 516, [1903] 1 K. B. 861.

COLLINS, M.R.—It seems to me to be quite clear that this case falls outside the largest meaning which can be given to the word "about" as used in section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the county court judge, in arriving at the conclusion that the applicant was employed "on or in or about a factory," mistook and consequently misapplied what this court has said as to the meaning of the word "about." He treated the applicant as having been employed at the time of the accident about the factory because he was employed on or about the main through which the gas passed. Underlying that conclusion is this—that the gas main is itself part of the factory, as that is the only way in which the applicant can be said to have been employed about the factory. The factory where the gas was manufactured was a quarter of a mile away from the place where the applicant met with the accident. The county court judge treated the main as part of the factory. When we look at the definition of the word "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which refers to the Factory and Workshop Acts, now the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, it is obvious that the conditions therein specified which make any particular premises a factory come to an end and are entirely spent when the gas is made and ready for delivery to consumers, and that the mains, which form the channel or road through which the gas when made travels without assistance and is delivered to consumers, are no part of the factory. That method of delivering the gas is something different from its manufacture, which is completed and over before the delivery through the mains begins. It would be unduly extending the decisions of this court if we were to make the area of the factory extend to the mains, especially considering that the area of the factory would thereby be made to extend to every place in which the mains were laid. The county court judge only arrived at the conclusion he did by a misdirection, and as the whole of the materials are before the court, there is no reason for sending the case back to him, and the appeal must be allowed and his decision reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The applicant cannot be brought within the Act of 1897 by reason of the physical proximity of the main where the accident happened to the factory where the gas was manufactured. Therefore the only way in which he can be brought within the Act is by saying that the mains are all part of the factory. In my opinion that contention cannot be maintained. The mains do not form part of the gas factory. They are not used for or in connection with the manufacture, but only with the supply of the gas. They are practically necessary for the purpose of the gas company's business, but the business of the supply of gas is distinct from the business of its manufacture. No doubt it is convenient that the gas company should undertake the supply of gas as well as its manufacture. The gasworks are a factory within the meaning of the definition in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897 by reason of the premises being used for the manufacture of gas by mechanical power, which has nothing to do with the pipes by means of which the gas is delivered to consumers.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the ordinary use of language a gas factory is a place where gas is manufactured. There are two businesses carried on by the gas company—one the making of gas, and the other the distribution of gas when made. Those two businesses might conceivably be carried on by different persons. We ought not to extend the word factory so as to make it include the physical thing by means of which the gas is distributed. There is danger connected with the manufacture of gas, and the Legislature has accordingly extended the protection of the Act to employment in that work. The applicant's employment had no connection with the manufacture of gas, but was connected with the method adopted of delivering the gas to consumers. In my opinion the Act does not apply.

COULTHARD v. CONSETT IRON CO. (a.)

tion Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 2; First Schedule, s. 1, sub-section 2.

A. was married to B. in 1882, and lived with her till June, 1905. He then left her owing to a quarrel, being at the time out of work. He took with him one child, whom he subsequently sent back to B. After A. left her B. supported herself, partially by occasional work and partially by charity of relatives. Within three months from the time A. left B., A. met with an accident, resulting in his death, he having been at the time in employment for three weeks, during which he did not contribute to his wife's support.

Held, B. was wholly dependent upon her deceased husband within section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from the award of the judge of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne County Court.

The respondent, Elizabeth Ann Coulthard, was married to her husband in 1882, and lived with him to June, 1905, there being three children of the marriage. He had been for some weeks out of work and the furniture had to be sold to support the family. A quarrel arose between the respondent and her husband, resulting in the husband leaving her. He took one child with him, but subsequently sent him back to the respondent. He left the town where the respondent was living, and she never saw him again, although she stated in her evidence that she "expected him back every day to provide a home."

About three months after he left the respondent he met with a fatal accident in the course of his employment at the appellants' works. He had been so employed for three weeks previous to the accident, but had never sent any part of his earnings to the respondent, who had just managed to support herself by occasional work and assistance from her relatives; she was for one week obliged to go to the workhouse.

Upon these facts the county court judge found that the respondent and her children were dependent upon the deceased and made an award.

Ruegg, K.C. (Meynell with him), for the appellants.—The applicant to come within the Act must be dependent upon the deceased at the time of his death. It is immaterial whether there was a legal obligation upon the deceased to support the applicant, if as a matter of fact he was not supporting her: Rees v. The Penrikyber Navigation Colliery Co., 51 W. R. 247, [1903] 1 K. B. 259. [ROMER, L.J.—In that case the deceased was the son of the applicant. There was no legal obligation upon him to support his mother, only indirectly under the poor law. The mother would have had no claim against the son.] The same question has arisen in Scotland. The decision of Sneddon v. Addie & Sons' Colliery (Limited), 6 F. 992, is against me admittedly, but I submit the earlier case of Turners (Limited) v. Whitefield, 6 F. 882—a case of husband and wife—was correct. If the husband deserts his wife, and contributes nothing to her support, how can she be said to be dependent upon him, especially if she does not look to him but manages to support herself. The facts of the present case clearly show desertion, and the respondent was able for two months to support herself.

Syme, for the respondent, was not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This was an appeal from the decision of a county court judge, who has held that the wife was dependent, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, on the earnings of her husband at the time of his death by an accident. The contention is that on the facts no dependency existed at the time of the death. The facts upon which that contention is sought to be supported are these: The husband some months before his death had left the wife. In point of fact he was in work, and had been in work some three weeks before the date of the accident. There had been some quarrel between the husband and the wife; he had fallen out of work, sold the furniture, and finally withdrew from the same house and town where his wife lived. Under these circumstances they were separated at the time of the accident. The wife had no other source of livelihood than her husband's earnings. From time to time she was able to earn a little herself, and she received doles from some of her relatives—given only out of charity. They just sufficed to keep her alive up to the time of her husband's accident. Under these circumstances the learned county court judge came to the conclusion that in fact she was dependent on her husband at the time of his death. Mr. Ruegg says that that cannot be a proper finding on the facts. The finding could only be appealed from on the ground that the learned judge has misdirected himself. This man was undoubtedly earning wages at the time of his death. We must look to the statute to see whether the wife was a dependent within its meaning. [The learned judge read section 7, sub-section 2, and first schedule, section 1, sub-sections 1 and 2, of the 1897 Act.] Why was this woman not a dependant? I think it is an important fact as distinguishing it from the decision so much relied on by Mr. Ruegg that the relation actually subsisting was that of man and wife, and that therefore there was a direct obligation upon the husband to support his wife. True, if the wife has means of subsistence irrespective of her husband's earnings which she can and does rely upon and treats as a source of income, then she may be said in fact not to be dependent upon her husband. The House of Lords have decided that it is a question of fact whether she is dependent. She is dependent if there is a primary obligation upon the husband to support her by his earnings and she has in fact no other source of income to rely on other than that. It has been contended, on the authority of some Scotch decisions, that if from any source the wife has managed to subsist, has been able to live, then inasmuch as she has not been drawing money from her husband's earnings she cannot be said to be dependent at the time of his death. That was the main argument. In support of it he relied upon Turners (Limited) v. Whitefield, where it was held "that a woman who had been for fourteen years living apart from her husband, and was supported by an illegitimate son, was not wholly or in part dependent on the earnings of her husband, and was not entitled to compensation under the Act." Mr. Ruegg argued from this case that no inference as to dependency could be drawn from the primary legal obligation to support the wife. When that case is examined it does not go to any degree in the direction which Mr. Ruegg seeks to assert. The inference of fact drawn was that the wife had another source of subsistence upon which she was dependent. There were three special reasons which made it conclusive in fact that she was not dependent upon her husband. The facts are the other way in this case. There was no certain source of income. She only had those precarious doles and precarious opportunities of earning something herself other than the wages of her husband. The distinction is brought out in the next case reported in 6 F., at p. 992, Sneddon v. Robert Addie & Sons' Collieries (Limited). There, in July, 1901, a husband deserted his wife and thereafter did not contribute anything to her support. She suffered from chronic bronchitis and varicose veins to an extent which incapacitated her from work requiring ordinary exertion, and she became unable to do anything for her own support. Her husband having in 1904, in the course of his employment, sustained injuries from which he died, she claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from his employers. It was held that the claimant was dependent on the earnings of her husband at the time of his death. Lord Moncrieff, in the course of his judgment, said: "If in order to constitute total dependency in the sense of the statute it is essential that the deceased workman was at the date of his death supporting the respondent, the judgment is wrong, because the dead workman did not contribute a farthing to her support from the time that he deserted her in 1901. But I do not think we are tied up to such a construction of the statute. A husband is primarily bound to aliment his wife. Exceptional cases, no doubt, may be figured in which, notwithstanding that primary obligation, the wife could not be said in any reasonable sense to be wholly dependent on his earnings. She might have means of her own, or she might be earning her own livelihood, or she might be living apart from her husband under an express or implied agreement with him that she would make no claim upon him, but look for support either to her own exertions or her relatives. That was the case recently decided by the first division of the court in Turners (Limited) v. Whitefield. That case in no way conflicts with the sheriff's judgment . . . Indeed, speaking for myself I think that this point has already been decided by an unanimous decision of this division in the case of Cunningham v. M'Gregor & Co., 3 F. 775. In that case it is true that the husband, who lived apart from his wife and family, contributed on an average about £5 a year towards their support. But the question raised was not whether the wife was partially dependent upon him—that was admitted—but whether she was wholly dependent upon him. The court held unanimously that she was wholly dependent upon her husband." The case of Cunningham v. M'Gregor & Co., referred to by Lord Moncreiff in his judgment, seems, also directly in point in this case. The Scotch authorities, which though not binding on this court are always treated by it with the greatest respect, are conclusive that in such a case dependency exists. For such reasons, not only on the authority of the Scotch cases, but for the reasons I have stated, it is perfectly clear that the decision of the learned county court judge was right and will not be impeached by us.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is purely one of fact. Was the wife at the time of the husband's death dependent on his earnings? I think that it cannot be said that on the evidence before him the learned county court judge could not reasonably come to the conclusion that the wife was dependent on the husband's earnings at the time of his death. He was admittedly earning wages at the time of the accident. He had left her to get work. [The judge stated the facts as set out above.] The wife tried to support herself. It was clear that she was not able to support herself by her own labours, and she had no means of her own to maintain herself. She was clearly dependent on somebody. She had a husband living whose duty it was and who was liable to support her. Can it therefore be said that it was unreasonable to infer that she was dependent on him at the time of his death. I think it ought to be inferred, unless there are other circumstances to justify the conclusion that at the time of the death in fact she did not and could not look to the husband and his wages for her support. The evidence before the learned county court judge did not compel him to come to any such conclusion. I think on the evidence that the county court judge could reasonably hold that the wife did look to the husband and depended on him for support. They had lived together for a considerable time until he left her, owing to some quarrel, to get work. He was away for three months. He did get work for a short time before his death. Is it a fact that the wife treated him as having nothing to do with her, and was she in no practical sense looking to him as her husband who was liable to support her? There was one piece of evidence which alone shows that the county court judge might come to the conclusion he did. The wife says "I expected him back every day to provide a home." I see no reason to doubt that statement. She looked to him to maintain and support her. I think she was at the time of the death dependent on her husband, and in fact I think that dependency was not valueless but substantial. I consider there was evidence for the conclusion to which the county court judge came.

MATHEW, L.J.—The case was argued on the assumption that the husband left his wife with the intention of never returning to support her. Even if that were made out it seems to me that the position of the wife was unaffected. She would not cease to be dependent on her husband, although the husband's intention was not to return. But I think on the evidence the county court judge could be asked to say that there was permanently a dependency on the obligation of the husband to the wife and children. The wife was clearly dependent on the husband. The man went away to look for work and took one child with him. The inference from that is that sooner or later he would revert to the old position. After a time the child was sent back. It is said that that was discreditable to the father. Why should that be said. Probably at the time he was unable to provide for it. Subsequently he got work for about three weeks before his death. He did not send his wife any money, but possibly he was in debt. Under these circumstances it cannot be said that she was not dependent on him. Can it be said that she ceased to be dependent because of the assistance of others. She had no right to that That could not take it out of the Act. She was clearly dependent, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BEHRENS v. RICHARDS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trespass—Alleged highway—Existing user—Coast—Foreshore—Injunction—Practice.

Although there may be failure to prove any pubbic right of way recognized by law over the foreshore or the rough cliff paths leading to the sea, it does not follow that in an action for trespass by the owner of the locus in quo, even where the defendants trespassed and broke down obstructions in assertion of their supposed rights, the court is bound or will, in the absence of good reason, grant an injunction.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff owned part of the coast where there were paths leading to the sea, which had been for many years used by fishermen and others. Such user did no damage to the plaintiff, or interfere with any plans for building or development of the property. The plaintiff put obstructions upon these paths, which the defendants, in assertion of their supposed rights of highway, broke down. The plaintiff brought an action claiming an injunction. The Attorney-General was not a party. The defendants failed to prove any public rights of way.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to have an injunction, and that it was sufficient to give him nominal damages.

Action.

This was an action for trespass brought to negative an alleged public right of way over paths and roads leading to the shore of the sea on a part of the Cornish coast belonging to the plaintiff, and situated in the parish of St. Hilary, near Marazion. These paths and ways led to certain coves called Channell Rush, King's Cove, Pixie's Cove, and Bessie's Cove, and were called respectively during the trial the "green way," the "purple way," and the "red path," from the colouring on the map used. The green way was hardly more than a footway. The purple way which joined the green way at a point on the cliff was widened and developed into a road about 1870.

As far back as the evidence went there was always a means of carrying fish up this cliff in baskets by this way.

Fishermen had landed their fish in King's Cove for a long time, but for some years—say, ten to twenty years—the fishing had been indifferent and much less had been done. At Bessie's Cove there was a slipway, and in recent years it had been more used than King's Cove by the fishermen. In Pixie's Cove there were some beautiful natural caverns, and the path there had been chiefly used by persons going to explore these caverns. To the north of Bessie's Cove, at a spot where the road was some seven feet wide, there was a small recess or bay which the defendants said had been used as a passing-place for carts. The plaintiff had acquired the property in which this part of the coast and these paths were situated about eighteen months before the action. Being of opinion that he was within his rights, he took physical means to prevent the country people from using the disputed ways. He dug a trench across the road to the north of the purple and green ways so that no cart could go that way, and he also built a wall. These obstructions of the existing way were not made in the course of the erection of new buildings or of any development of this part of the property for new purposes. He also put a fence at the junction of the green and purple ways. He filled up the turf bank at a gap leading to Pixie's Cove so that access could not be obtained to that cove by the old path, and he planted the place alleged to be a passing-place with hyacinths. The defendants, who were eleven in number and were fishermen and others of a like station in life, took forcible means to assert what they conceived were their rights. They filled up the trench, reopened the gap through Pixie's Cove, and demolished the fence, and they, or others, trampled on the hyacinths. Under these circumstances the plaintiff brought the action asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from trespassing upon the disputed ways and for damages. The defendants pleaded that all the ways were common and public highways, and that what they had done was for the purpose of enabling them to use these highways.

Astbury, K.C., G. A. S. Garland, and the Hon. T. H. Watson, for the plaintiff.—We do not press for an injunction, if we can have a declaration made that there is no public right of highway over the paths in question. Still we say that we are entitled to it as the defendants are asserting against us what they say is a right, and they evidently intend to repeat their conduct: Bourke v. Davis, 38 W. J. G. Wood and J. R. Randolph, for the defendants.—It is unnecessary for the plaintiff to ask for an injunction. He does not want the roads, and no damage was being done to him by their use. The court will not under the circumstances grant an injunction against the defendants in any case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 1.—BUCKLEY, J.—The plaintiff asks an injunction to restrain the defendants from trespassing on the disputed ways. The defendants plead that all the ways in question are common public highways. First, as regards the passing-place, the matter is to my mind too insignificant to require any intervention by this court. That a passing-place was a convenience at the spot in question I have no doubt, and it was no inconvenience or injury to the plaintiff. There was no reason why he should plant it with hyacinths. I pass by this petty contest without further mention. It is matter for the application of reason, common sense, and ordinary forbearance, not for an injunction. As regards the three ways—the green way, the purple way, and the red path, the action is not so constituted as that I can in this proceeding determine so as to bind the public whether there be public rights over those ways or not. The Attorney-General is not a party. I have only to decide whether the defendants have as matter of defence made out that they have such a public right of way as they allege so that the plaintiff was not entitled to exclude them. In my opinion the evidence falls short of establishing the defence that these ways are common and public highways. To those who are conversant with the Cornish coast or with many other parts of the coast in this country it will be familiar that there are frequently to be found rough tracks or paths which have in fact been used without objection made by the landowner for very many years. From this fact alone it is difficult in surroundings such as there are in this case to infer an intention to dedicate. In permitting persons to stray along the cliff edge or wander down the cliff face or stroll along the foreshore the owner of the land was permitting that which was no injury to him, and whose refusal would have been a churlish and unreasonable act on his part. From such a user nothing, I think, is to be inferred. If it were otherwise, a landowner would be compelled to prohibit such user as this lest at some future time, when perhaps the cliffs now practically deserted may become the site of a place like Bude, Cromer, or Bournemouth, he should be told that he could not lay out his estate as he was minded because rights of highway existed which precluded him from so doing. No part of the disputed ways has ever become repairable by the parish. The parish roads (as is common in many parts of Cornwall) are in this neighbourhood joined by rough tracks coming up from the irregular contour of the broken coast line, which serve to give access to the foreshore on the lands adjoining the foreshore; and these rough cart tracks in turn degenerate into mere rough foot tracks crossing the moorland and ending sometimes in the roughest of paths by which the adventurous may scramble down the face of the cliff to the sea. From the mere fact that the landowner has never raised objection to any one who was so minded making use of tracks such as these no inference of dedication can, I think, be drawn. There may no doubt exist, and there does in my opinion in this case exist, another question—that is, whether a public right may in some such case have been acquired for the purpose of access to the foreshore as the means of reaching the highway of the sea and there exercising the public right of fishing. That arises in the present case as regards King's Cove. In Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald. 302, Holroyd, J., speaks of public common law rights with respect to the sea of obtaining access thereto by and from such places as necessity or usage have appropriated to those purposes. I am pronouncing no final opinion, but only an opinion as between the parties to these proceedings, when I say that I think these defendants have failed in making out a public right over the green and purple ways for the purpose of access to King's Cove for fishing. As regards dedication, the purple way, as I have said, as such, has existed, I think, only from 1870, and substantially the user of the purple and green ways has been by tenants of the estate. Moreover, as regards about the last fifty years, the circumstances have been such as regards settlements and tenancies as that dedication binding the owner of the inheritance is not to be presumed. On the whole, therefore, I have arrived at the conclusion that the defendants have not established the public rights of way which they assert. The order will, therefore, contain an expression of the opinion of the court to that effect. From the fact, however, that I arrive at the conclusion that the defendants have not established the common public rights which they claim, it does not, in my opinion, follow that the plaintiff is entitled to the formidable weapon of an injunction of this court. He asks the court by injunction to forbid the continued user of ways which have in fact for many years past been enjoyed, and whose enjoyment is no injury to the owner of the land, unless and until, under altered circumstances, the reasonable enjoyment of his property is affected by its continuance. No doubt it is the law that upon the foreshore of this country and the rough cliff paths which exist in many places along the coast the public have not a right of way recognized by the law, and no doubt it is true that rights of property are as a general proposition entitled to protection by, if necessary, an injunction of this court. But it does not follow that if the owner of the foreshore—say, at some well-known seaside resort—came to this court for an injunction to restrain the nurserymaids from wheeling their perambulators on the sand or the children from playing on the rocks, this court is bound to make, or in the absence of good reason, would make, such an order. In Llandudno Urban Council v. Woods, [1899] 2 Ch. 705, Cozens-Hardy, L.J., then a judge of first instance, refused it. The existing security of the tenure of land in this country is largely maintained by the fact that the owners of the land behave reasonably in the matter of its enjoyment. It would, in my judgment, be a disastrous thing, not for the public only, but for the landowners also, if this court, at the caprice of the landowner, not because circumstances have altered, but merely because he was minded that it should be so, entertained every trivial application to restrain persons by injunction from using paths which, though not public highways, have in fact been used by permission of the owners for many generations, and whose user is no injury to the owner of the land. The landowner, if he be wise, will rather erect upon the road or path a notice expressive of permission, or even of invitation, to persons who make use of the way in an orderly and reasonable manner. I am glad to say that the plaintiff in this case, by his answers to myself in the box, disclaimed any intention of acting thus capriciously, and that he has by his counsel offered to make a disclaimer in terms which I will read presently in the exact words in which Mr. Astbury offered it, and which will form part of the order of the court. The people must understand that in availing themselves under this disclaimer, of the user which the plaintiff concedes they must conduct themselves in an orderly and reasonable manner. If effect be really given by the plaintiff to that disclaimer and the people act temperately and with good feeling in availing themselves of it, and if, by mutual concession as regards the purple and green ways, the plaintiff's intended building at King's Cove is rendered harmless by such a substitution or preservation of a way to the foreshore at that place as I have suggested, no further difficulty ought, I think, to arise in this case. The plaintiff must bear in mind that in proceedings properly instituted he might have great difficulty in maintaining that there is not at some one of the places here in dispute a public right of access to the foreshore for fishing, and that, as between Bessie's Cove and King's Cove, there is no obvious reason why the access should be by the former and not by the latter. As to this, however, I need say no more. I have only to consider whether, the defendants having failed, as I think, to make out that the ways are public, the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. For the reasons which I have given, I think not. It is enough, in my judgment, that I should mark the opinion of the court that the acts of the defendants were wrongful by giving nominal damages. As regards the costs of the action, I think that both parties are to blame, and that neither the plaintiff, who fails to obtain an injunction, nor the defendants, who fail to establish the public rights which they claim, ought to receive costs. In dealing with the costs I have also borne in mind that the plaintiff makes a disclaimer which I am about to read. I wish to add, as matter to the plaintiff's credit, that he offered an undertaking not to enforce an order for costs if he obtained one. The judgment which I pronounce is this: The court being of opinion that the defendants have failed to establish any right of public cartway or public footway over the purple way, the green way, and the red path, or any of them, as public highways, and the plaintiff voluntarily disclaiming any intention of preventing the fishermen in the district from reasonably exercising their calling, or of refusing to permit the defendants or any member of the public to exercise reasonable passage to or from such portions of the foreshore abutting on the plaintiff's property for the purpose of fishing or enjoying the beauties of the locality as may not from time to time interfere with his own or his tenants' user and enjoyment of his property, the court doth not think fit to make any order except that the defendants do pay to the plaintiff 40s. damages.

GOLDSMITHS' COMPANY v. WYATT. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Imported watches—Customs Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 47), s. 59—12 Geo. 2, c. 26.

Imported gold and silver watches are not "plate" within the meaning of section 59 of the Customs Act, 1842, and a seller of such watches which have not been assayed, stamped, and marked as required by the Customs Act, 1842, is not, therefore, liable to the penalties imposed by 12 Geo. 2, c. 26.

Case stated.

The special case was in the following terms:

"This is an action brought by the plaintiffs for (1) £40 for penalties under the statutes 5 & 6 Vict. c. 47, s. 59 (the Customs Act, 1842), and 12 Geo. 2, c. 26, in respect of the sale of certain gold and silver watch-cases—to wit, two gold watch-cases and two silver watch-cases of foreign manufacture imported into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from foreign parts since the commencement of the said Customs Act, 1842, which said gold and silver watch-cases were sold and exposed for sale in England before the same had been assayed, stamped, and marked as alleged to be required by the said Customs Act, 1842, and the Hall Marking of Foreign Plate Act, 1904; (2) a declaration that the said gold and silver watch-cases were respectively gold and silver plate within the meaning of sections 59 and 60 of the Customs Act, 1842, section 10 of the Revenue Act, 1883 and the Hall Marking of Foreign Plate Act, 1904."

"1. The plaintiffs are the Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of Goldsmiths of the City of London, who are and have been a guild and corporation time out of mind, with divers privileges confirmed and enlarged from time to time by divers statutes and by several charters from his Majesty's royal predecessors, Kings and Queens of this realm, amongst other things, for the searching, assaying, marking, and regulating wrought plate in order to ascertain the standard thereof for the good and safety of the public.

"2. The defendant is William Wyatt, carrying on business as a watchmaker, jeweller, and dealer in plate at No. 198, Ebury-street, Eaton-square, in the county of London.

"3. On the 14th day of March, 1905, four watches, of which two were in silver watch-cases, and two in gold watch-cases, were exposed for sale by the defendant at his said shop, and were then and there sold by him (the defendant) to one Sir Walter Sherburne Prideaux, an agent of the plaintiffs, for the sum of £7 7s. The said watches have been marked and numbered respectively 1, 2, 3, and 4.

"4. None of the said watch-cases are battered within the meaning of section 59 of the Customs Act, 1842, nor are they richly engraved, carved, chased, or set with jewels or other stones, and they are each and all of them of foreign manufacture, and have been imported into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland since the commencement of the Customs Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 47).

"5. None of the said four watch-cases were wrought or made prior to the year 1800.

"6. In the opinion of the Commissioners of Customs none of the said four watch-cases may be properly described as hand-chased, inlaid, bronzed, or filigree work of an Oriental pattern. The watch-case forming part of the said watch No. 3 is not incapable of receiving the marks referred to in the statute 12 Geo. 2, c. 26, or any of such marks by reason of the smallness or thinness thereof.

"7. None of the said four watch-cases so exposed for sale and sold on the 14th day of March, 1905, as aforesaid, at the time of the said exposure for sale and sale had been assayed or stamped and marked with the marks of the said plaintiffs or with the marks of any other duly authorized assay office in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"8 The said four watch-cases have been weighed and assayed. No. 1 weighs 11dwt. 7gns., and is of a standard less in fineness than 11oz. 2dwt. of fine silver in every pound weight troy. No. 2 weighs 10dwt., and is of a standard greater in fineness than 11oz 2dwt. of fine silver in the pound weight troy. No. 3 weighs 2dwt. 3gns., and is approximately of a standard in fineness of 14 carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy, but has a dome and bow of base metal, and No. 4 weighs 11dwt. 10gns., and is of a standard of fineness of 18 carats of fine gold in every pound weight troy. All the said watch-cases bear Swiss Government hall-marks indicating the true standard of gold or silver employed in their manufacture and agreeing with the above-mentioned assays, and the dome of the watch-case No. 3 bears the mark 'cuivre,' denoting that the same is of base metal. . . .

"10. No legal proceedings have been instituted by the plaintiffs since the year 1842 in respect of the sale and exposing for sale of foreign watch-cases forming part of watches imported into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and sold or exposed for sale before the same have been assayed, stamped, and marked. . . .

"12. Gold and silver watch-cases forming part of gold and silver watches imported into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland since the passing of the Revenue Act, 1883, have not been entered to be warehoused nor deposited in a bonded warehouse, but have been delivered for home use before they have been assayed, stamped, and marked.

"13. All highly finished articles of foreign plate, after being assayed, stamped, and marked by an assay office, have to go back to the shop for the marks to be 'set' and 'finished' before such articles can be placed on the market. The assaying, stamping, and marking of British-made watch-cases is invariably performed while the cases are in the rough and before they are polished, and before the movements are inserted therein. Foreign-made watch-cases are now never imported into the United Kingdom without being made up into finished watches, but formerly such cases when intended to be assayed and marked were, like British watch-cases, sent to the assay offices in an unfinished state, and were subsequently 'finished.'

"The points of law raised by the special case for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether the said gold and silver watch-cases forming part of the said watches are respectively gold and silver plate within the meaning of sections 59 and 60 of the Customs Act, 1842, section 10 of the Revenue Act, 1883, and the Hall Marking of Foreign Plate Act, 1904; (2) whether upon the facts set out in the special case and agreed between the parties the defendant is liable to penalties under the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 47 (the Customs Act, 1842), which penalties are defined by the statute 12 Geo. 2, c. 26, in respect of the sale and exposing for sale of any one or more of the said gold and silver watch-cases. If the court shall decide the first question in the affirmative, a declaration shall be made accordingly. If the court shall decide the second question in the affirmative in respect of any one or more of the said watches, a declaration shall be made and judgment given accordingly. If the court shall be of opinion that the defendant has not incurred any penalty in respect of any of the said watches, judgment shall be entered for the defendant."

Eldon Bankes, K.C. (Graham Campbell with him), for the plaintiffs.—These watches are plate within the meaning of section 59 of the Customs Act, 1842 and are therefore liable to the penalties imposed by 12 Geo. 2, c. 26. Watch-cases are recognized as "plate" in various Acts of Parliament as in 25 Geo. 3, c. 64, and 38 Geo. 3, c. 24. If watch-cases are to be regarded as "plate" for the purposes of the Customs Act, 1842, they must equally be so whether they are imported separately or with the works. It is not necessary for an article to be wholly made of gold or silver in order to be "plate": Scott v. Solomon, [1905] 1 K. B. 577.

Asquith, K.C. (Newbolt and Sebastian with him), for the defendants.—No one has ever suggested before that finished gold and silver watches are "plate," though this Act has been in force over sixty years. "Plate" means something substantially composed of gold and silver. That finished watches are not included in section 59 is shown not only by the context but by previous legislation, 38 Geo. 3, c. 24, and 43 Geo. 3, c. 68.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., replied.

CHANNELL, J.—This case raises the question whether gold and silver watches are gold and silver plate within the meaning of section 59 of the Customs Act, 1842, for if they are they are also within the other two Acts mentioned in the case. The word "plate" is one which is capable of a considerable diversity of meaning, and the difficulty is to determine what is the precise meaning that it ought to be held to bear in this particular section. But I cannot help saying at the outset that according to the ordinary use of language such an expression as gold and silver plate would not be understood to include a gold or silver watch. It is not an ordinary expression to use for such a thing. For instance, it is fairly clear that under a bequest of "all my plate" (without other words to assist the construction) a gold or silver watch would not pass. I have been referred to a number of statutes dealing with other matters of various kinds, some of which include watches within the category of plate, and others of which exclude them. But I do not think that a consideration of those statutes helps us much. Thus, in the Acts imposing a custom's duty on imported articles, gold and silver watches are not included under the head of plate, but are placed in a separate class by themselves. But there are obvious reasons for that. A comprehensive class like "plate" is useful to embrace a variety of articles which are respectively imported in but small quantities, but when you are dealing for purposes of custom's duty with specific articles which are imported in large quantities like watches, it would presumably be more convenient to place them in a class by themselves especially when the amount of the duty payable is made to depend upon the value of the article, which value in the case of watches would lie as much, if not more, in the works than in the precious metal of the case. Therefore those Acts do not afford us much guide to the meaning of the term "plate" in the Act before us. Nor do the Acts relating to excise duty on plate made or wrought in Great Britain. The duty thereby imposed did for a time attach to watch-cases, though afterwards watch-cases were exempted from the duty, probably with the object of encouraging the manufacture and export trade in them. Nor is any assistance to be got from the Acts requiring a licence for the sale of plate. Leaving those statutes one comes to the comparison of the two —12 Geo. 2, c. 26 and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 47—upon which the contention here mainly turned. The former of those two Acts provides, by section 5, that "no goldsmith, silversmith, or other person whatsoever making or selling, trading or dealing in gold or silver wares shall sell, exchange, or expose to sale within that part of Great Britain called England any gold or silver vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold or silver whatsoever . . . or export the same out of this kingdom" before it has been duly assayed and marked. The subject-matter of that section, then, includes anything that could be described as gold or silver ware, vessel, plate, or manufacture. And section 6 provides that certain wares of gold or silver, not including watches or watch-cases, shall be excepted from the requirements of the former section as to marking. I do not think that that statute was intended to deal in any way with imported articles; its operation has always been treated as confined to articles of gold or silver manufactured in this country. Then the Act of 1842 provides by section 59 that "All gold or silver plate not being battered which shall be imported from foreign parts after the commencement of this Act and sold, exchanged, or exposed to sale within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland shall be of the respective standards now required for any ware, vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold or silver"—referring back to the language of the Act of George II.—"wrought or made in England; and that no gold or silver plate so to be imported as aforesaid not being battered shall be sold, exchanged, or exposed to sale within the United Kingdom until the same shall have been assayed, stamped, and marked either in England, Scotland, or Ireland in the same manner as any ware, vessel, plate, or manufacture of gold or silver wrought or made in England, Scotland, or Ireland respectively is or are now by law required to be assayed, stamped, and marked." Now the subject-matter of that section is "gold and silver plate," and the question is whether that expression was intended to cover everything that was included in the expression "ware, vessel, plate, or manufacture" in the earlier Act. According to ordinary rules of interpretation I think one ought to say that if the Legislature had intended to cover precisely the same ground it would have used the same language. And having regard to the difference of the language in the two Acts I think I am justified in assuming that a different subject-matter was to some extent intended to be dealt with. But Mr. Bankes has relied on the proviso at the end of section 59: "Provided always that no article or ware of gold or silver so to be imported as aforesaid shall be liable to be assayed, stamped, or marked as aforesaid which would not be liable to be assayed, stamped, or marked if it had been wrought or made in England." He contends that the use of the word "ware" as applied to the imported articles with which the section deals shews that the draughtsman was using the terms "ware" and "plate" as interchangeable terms and as covering the same ground. But that, to my mind, is not a necessary inference. It may well be that the expression "ware of gold and silver" would include "gold and silver plate," but the converse is not true, not all wares of gold and silver come under the head of gold and silver plate. The two expressions are not co-extensive. Under these circumstances I must consider the meaning of the term "plate" in the later Act by itself without any regard to the classes of articles that were included in the term "ware" in the earlier. One of the tests, no doubt, to be applied for the purpose of determining the meaning of an Act is to consider what was the mischief intended to be provided against. Now here the mischief aimed at was the same as that which was aimed at by the earlier Act—namely, the defrauding of purchasers by selling as gold and silver, articles made partly of those metals, but below the recognized standards of fineness. The provision was intended for the benefit of purchasers to insure them an opportunity of knowing what they were buying. Then does that apply to the watch-cases to which the questions in this case relate. Mr. Asquith does not dispute that if the cases were imported separately from the works they would be plate within the meaning of the section. But here the case finds that they were not so imported. Does a watch-case forming part of a finished watch come within the object of the section? Does the section apply to a composite article such as a watch, the value of which no doubt partly depends upon the quality of the gold or silver of which the case is made, but mainly upon the quality of manufacture of the internal parts of the watch? I think it does not. It may be that if very cheap works were put into a gold or silver case the case might be the more valuable part of the two. But that would be of but rare occurrence, and in general the value of a watch lies mainly in the works, the quality of the metal of the case being of a secondary consideration. I do not think the protection afforded by the section was intended to extend to the purchaser of a finished watch, inasmuch as he does not in general buy it for the sake of the value of the case. Nor would a finished watch come within what persons would ordinarily understand by the use of the word "plate." No one using the word in its ordinary sense would say that the mere fact that an article was partly made of silver and gold would bring it within the category of gold or silver plate. There is one argument which was addressed to me in support of the defendant's contention, and which I ought not to leave unnoticed—namely, that though the Act has been in force for more than sixty years no attempt has ever been made to treat finished watches as coming within its operation. Where, indeed, the court is called upon to construe an Act of Parliament expressed in unambiguous language it ought to put its own construction upon it regardless of the construction that has been commonly put upon it by other persons less skilled in the law. The fact that a mistaken interpretation has been generally put upon it cannot alter the law. But where the question is as to the meaning of an ambiguous term of common use the fact that it has for a long period of years been understood in a particular sense by persons who have an interest or duty in enforcing the Act becomes very material. And I think I am entitled to take into consideration the fact that the ambiguous term plate, which may mean very different things in different contexts, has not been hitherto understood as covering a completed watch of which a part only is gold or silver. I do not think that in order to make a thing come within the term "gold or silver plate" it would be necessary that it should be made entirely of gold or silver, but it must be a thing of which the precious metal is the main constituent of value, the part consisting of other material being merely accessory to the part which is made of gold or silver. But when the gold or silver which forms part of the article is accessory to the principal part which is not made of those metals I think that it could not be treated as coming within the word "plate." I must answer both the questions raised in the special case in the negative.

Landlord—Tenant—Yearly tenancy—Construction of agreement.

By an agreement of tenancy certain licensed premises were let from a certain date "until such tenancy should be determined as hereinafter mentioned," at an annual rent of £70 clear of all deductions except landlord's property tax, payable quarterly. The tenant agreed further to keep the premises in repair, not to assign or underlet without notice, to keep up the licences wherever necessary, and the landlord had the right to eject the tenant for misconduct. The tenancy was terminable by three months' notice in writing.

Held, that, having regard to the above terms, the agreement was one for a yearly tenancy, terminable only by a three months' notice expiring at the end of any full year.

Action tried by Jelf, J., without a jury.

This was an action brought by Daniel Lewis to recover possession of certain licensed premises known as the Carpenters' Arms, Mountain Ash, in the county of Glamorgan, and the question raised was whether the notice to quit was a valid one.

By an agreement of tenancy dated the 1st of June, 1901, made between Thomas Morris and the defendant, Morris let the premises in question to the defendant for a term thus expressed in the memorandum: "To hold the same under and by the said John Baker until such tenancy shall be determined as hereinafter mentioned at the yearly rent of seventy pounds clear of all deductions except landlord's property tax by quarterly payments on the 13th day of August, the 13th day of November, the 13th day of February, and the 13th day of May in each year, the first payment to be made on the ensuing 13th of August." Baker further agreed to keep the premises in repair, not to assign or underlet the premises without written consent, to keep the Carpenters' Arms during all lawful hours as a licensed house, and to deliver up at the termination of the tenancy all fixtures, &c., at a valuation to the landlord. It was further agreed that if John Baker should be convicted of any offence through which the licence is indorsed Morris should be at liberty to enter and eject Baker and his family, and that it should be lawful for either of the parties to determine the tenancy thereby created by giving to the other of them three calendar months notice in writing.

On the 11th of May Morris gave notice in writing to determine the tenancy as and from the 13th of August, 1903.

On the 12th of February, 1904, Morris assigned his interest in the premises to the plaintiff, who now sought to recover possession of them.

J. R. Atkin (Danckwerts, K.C., with him).—This tenancy is one determinable at three months' notice. The words in the habendum, "until such tenancy shall be determined as hereinafter mentioned," fix the date of the determination of the tenancy at the expiration of the three months' notice: Doe d. King v. Grafton, 18 Q. B. 496; Dixon v. Bradford Coal Supply Society, [1904] 1 K. B. 444, 52 W. R. Dig. 83, is distinguishable.

Bankes, K.C. (Kimber with him), for the defendant.—This is a yearly tenancy determinable at three months' notice. This case is covered by Dixon v. Bradford Coal Supply Co. The provisions of the agreement as to the tenant paying rates, keeping the premises in repair, and keeping up the licences are inconsistent with the tenancy being less than a yearly one.

He also referred to Doe d. Pitcher v. Donovan, 1 Taunt. 555; and Soames v. Nicholson, 50 W. R. 169, [1902] 1 K. B. 157.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23.—JELF, J., read the following judgment: This is an action by the assignee of the reversion to recover possession of a licensed public-house, let by one Thomas Morris to the defendant by an agreement in writing dated the 1st of June, 1901. The case turns entirely on the question whether a notice dated the 11th of May, 1903, given by Thomas Morris to the defendant to quit the premises on the 13th of August, 1903, was or was not a good notice to terminate the agreement. In order to answer this question I have to determine whether the agreement of the 1st of June, 1901, created, as the plaintiff contends, a tenancy terminable by a three months' notice on either of the four quarterly days mentioned in the agreement, or, as the defendants contend, a yearly tenancy terminable by a three months' notice only at the end of any full year. Every case of an express agreement must be decided on its terms according to the view taken by the court of the intention of the parties, regard being had to any rules of construction to be gathered from the decided cases. The principal case relied on for the plaintiff was Doe d. King v. Grafton, while for the defendant it was contended that the case was covered by Devon v. Bradford Coal Supply Co. In order to decide which of these contentions is correct it is necessary to scrutinize carefully the provisions of the agreement of tenancy. It then becomes apparent that the whole difficulty in the present case is caused by the insertion in the habendum of the words "until such tenancy shall be determined as hereinafter mentioned." If these words had been left out, all the other terms of the agreement, the yearly rent payable quarterly in every year, the obligation to repair, and to keep the licences wherever necessary, the right of the landlord to eject the tenant for misconduct, and lastly the clause for determining the "tenancy hereby created" by three months' notice would point to a yearly tenancy with the one special term of three months instead of the ordinary six months' notice to quit: see Doe. d Pitcher v. Donovan. It is unlikely that such a tenancy should be only intended to last for six months certain and that it might be put an end to on the 13th of November, 1901, before it had lasted a year. But it was contended for the plaintiff that the words "until such tenancy shall be determined as hereinafter mentioned" incorporate by reference the clause as to the three months' notice and form the terminus ad quem, so to speak, of the tenancy and so bring the case within Doe d. King v. Grafton, and no doubt there is much force in this argument though not so much as if the words "at any time," or similar words had been added to the notice clause, as was the case in Soames v. Nicholson. In Doe d. King v. Grafton, however, there was no relegation to a later part of the agreement of the clause as to notice, but the terminus was stated definitely in the habendum itself, and several indications of a yearly tenancy present in this case were there absent. Dixon v. Bradford Coal Supply Society, on the other hand, shows the importance of looking to all the terms of the agreement in order to find out (when there is an ambiguity) the intention of the parties, and lays stress on the parts of the agreement which point to a yearly tenancy. On the whole I think that the words "until such tenancy shall be determined as hereinafter mentioned" may fairly be treated as parenthetical, and as having the same kind of effect as the words "terminable however as hereinafter mentioned" which are often to be found in the habendum. The case is not free from doubt, but for the reasons which I have given I am of opinion that the agreement creates a yearly tenancy, and that the notice to quit is bad, and that the defendant is entitled to succeed on that ground.

REX v. WILLIAM BARRACLOUGH. (a.)

Criminal law—Obscene libel—"Obscene"—Sufficiency of indictment—"To the manifest corruption of the morals of his Majesty's subjects"—Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 64), s. 7.

In an indictment charging the publication of an obscene libel it is sufficient to aver that the publication is obscene, and that it has been unlawfully published. It is unnecessary to aver the "intent" by the use of a common form expression as "to the manifest corruption of the morals of his Majesty's subjects," although, in the opinion of the court, as a matter of practice it were more desirable to do so.

The object of the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, s. 7, which provides that "It shall not be necessary to set out in any indictment . . . instituted against the publisher of any obscene libel the obscene passages, but it shall be sufficient to deposit the book . . . containing the alleged libel with the indictment or other judicial proceeding, together with particulars showing precisely by reference to pages, columns, and lines in what part of the book . . . the alleged libel is to be found, and such particulars shall be deemed to form part of the record . . ," was to obviate the setting out of the matter by a clear reference to the document deposited.

Case stated by Jelf, J., on the trial at the Leeds Assizes in August, 1905, of William Barraclough upon an indictment charging him with the publication of a defamatory and obscene libel.

The indictment charged that the defendant, intending to injure a certain person, unlawfully and maliciously did publish a false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel in the form of a type-written document which contained lewd, wicked, scandalous, obscene, false, malicious, and defamatory matters to the damage of that person and "to the evil example of all others in the like case offending and against the peace of our Lord the King."

There was no averment in the indictment that the publication was to the "manifest corruption of the morals of his Majesty's subjects."

It was objected on behalf of the defendant that the indictment was bad on the ground that so far as it purported to charge the publication of a defamatory libel it did not set out the words of the alleged libel, Reg. v. Bradlaugh, 3 Q. B. D. 607.

The judge upheld the objection and held that in so far as the indictment purported to charge a defamatory libel it failed.

It was then objected that the indictment so far as it alleged the publication of an obscene libel was bad by reason of the omission of the words "to the manifest corruption of the morals of his Majesty's subjects," although for this purpose the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, s. 7, made it unnecessary to set out in the indictment the obscene passages.

The learned judge overruled these objections, holding that the term "obscene" connoted that the libel tended to the corruption of morals.

The jury found the defendant guilty and he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, the sentence to be respited until after the decision of this case.

The question arising under the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, is sufficiently stated by the Lord Chief Justice.

Atkinson, K.C. (Palmer with him), for the defendant. — The indictment should aver the intent to corrupt public morals. It is an essential part of the offence. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—You must answer Jelf, J.'s ruling that obscene connotes corruption of morals.] [JELF, J.—It seems to me tautology to say an obscene libel is published to the manifest corruption of the morals of the public.] A document may be obscene and yet not corrupt public morals. [WALTON, J.—The mere publication of an obscene book is not a crime.] I agree fully. In fact this indictment was not framed as an obscene libel, but a defamatory libel. And it was at the last moment, when Reg. v. Bradlaugh was called to the attention of the prosecution that the charge for an obscene libel was set up. On such an indictment it would be impossible to know whether the grand jury found a true bill for a defamatory or obscene libel, whereas the averment of the intent would leave no doubt. [JELF, J.—The framer of the indictment did not intend a defamatory libel because in the "particluars" required by the statute he set out the whole of the document, which would have been meaningless in the case of a defamatory libel.] The particulars were not exhibits and were not before the grand jury, neither was the book itself. They should have been deposited with the indictment according to the statute. [DARLING, J.—There is no indictment till the grand jury find a true bill.] The grand jury cannot possibly find a true bill unless all the proper material is supplied to them. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We cannot look into the grounds upon which the grand jury find a true bill. They may even rely upon secondary evidence. The prosecution could not possibly have done more than they did do.]

Waugh, K.C. (Compston with him), for the prosecution.—It may be that there may be publication of obscene matter which is yet not unlawful, such as the handing of the document to a judge for the purposes of justice. But here we aver that the publication is "unlawful and malicious," and the defendant must prove the contrary. It is a presumption of law that an obscene libel tends to the manifest corruption of morals, and being a presumption need not be set out.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I have no doubt in this case, although I think that my brother Jelf was put in a difficult position by the form of the indictment. In order to avoid any difficulty of this kind it would be better that the indictment should contain the common averment that its publication was to the manifest corruption of the morals of his Majesty's subjects. The question we have to consider is whether there was sufficient material alleged in the count to justify the case being tried as to the publication of an obscene libel. I need not refer to the objections to the counts for a defamatory libel, because Jelf, J., withdrew those. After a full argument he held there was sufficient left in the allegations to justify him in leaving to the jury the charge of a publication of an obscene libel. He did not quash any part of the indictment. The two counts he withdrew on the ground that they were mere surplusage, while the two remaining were counts for obscene libel. Mr. Waugh pointed out that the indictment contained the words "unlawful and malicious." There is also the extract, "which contained lewd, wicked, scandalous, obscene, false, malicious, and defamatory matters . . . to the evil example of all others in the like case offending and against the peace of our Lord the King." In order to prevent arguments of this kind arising it is better that the old practice be followed. But, granting there is before the jury the indictment and the book containing the obscene libel, it is impossible to say that the learned judge ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury, upon the ground that it could only be treated as a defamatory libel and not as an obscene libel. There is a distinct allegation of the publication of scandalous, obscene, and false matter. I agree with Mr. Atkinson if the indictment had contained the averment the defendant would be able to show by way of defence that the publication was not unlawful and was not obscene. But, the book being deposited, it seems to me the learned judge would have been wrong in withdrawing the case from the jury. It may be tested in this way. Assuming it to be an indictment of obscene libel, and the words to be set out in the indictment, so that the judge and jury could see for themselves whether the obscene publication was to the manifest corruption of the morals of his Majesty's subjects, could the judge have withdrawn the case from the jury because there was no averment to that effect in the indictment? I think that reasoning has the clear support of Cockburn, L.C.J., in Q. v. Hicklin, at p. 370: "The recorder thought an indictment could not have been sustained inasmuch as to the maintenance of the indictment it would have been necessary that the intention should be alleged and proved—namely, that of corrupting the public mind by the obscene matter in question. In that respect I differ from the recorder. I think that if there be an infraction of the law, the intention to break the law must be inferred and the criminal character of the publication is not affected or qualified by there being some ulterior object in view of a different and of an honest character." I am therefore of opinion that, embarrassing as the count was in one sense, it was impossible for the learned judge to stop the case. If Mr. Atkinson could have alleged that there was a statement of two separate offences in this indictment an objection might have been raised on another ground. But there is only one offence alleged here. I think it would have been wrong to quash the whole indictment on the ground that two offences were alleged.

On the second point I think there is no argument. [The judge read section 7 of the 1888 Act set out above.] The object is to substitute the deposit for the setting out of the words. The document appears for the first time upon the application to the magistrate for committal; is proved by a witness, is annexed, and forms part of the depositions; it is first in the legal custody of the clerk to the justices, then the clerk of assize and finally it serves the judge and jury. What else could be done in this case in effect? The document must have remained with the clerk of the assize. The indictment is deposited and is called a bill of indictment at that stage. It is deposited, and annexed to it are the particulars which refer to the document which is in the custody of the clerk of assize. The statute says nothing as to how it is to be deposited. It uses the word deposited because the framers of the statute knew the document would be in the custody of the officials. It could not otherwise be done than by a reference to the document which was in the custody of one or other of the officials. The object being to obviate the setting out of the matter by a clear reference to the document. In this case every line of the particulars was relied upon. I am of opinion there was a fulfilment of section 7, and the objection cannot be allowed to prevail.

WILLS, J., concurred.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that if the thing is called obscene and is published, that it follows that all those allegations which are usually put into an indictment are included in the same statement that the defendant published it and that it was obscene. The intent, as it appears to me, in such a case being part of the indictment, it is not absolutely necessary to set out allegations with that iteration to which we are accustomed in indictments, most of which is useless. I think it better to allege the intent, partly because it gives notice to the defendant of that which he is charged with, and partly because of the case of Q. v. Thomson, (1900) 64 J. P. 456, where the Common Serjeant—and there is no one for whose opinion I have more respect—in trying a person for the publication of an obscene libel, had it objected that other books could not be put in evidence to show the intent. He says: "Whilst the question of the intention with which the book was sold is part of the indictment, it is impossible to say that the holding out and offering other books may not bear on the intent. If the defendant sold other books whose titles go to suggest that they are indecent, it is some evidence to show that she sold this book with the intention alleged in the indictment. I cannot exclude the evidence." I think the intent is part of the indictment; but it would certainly be alleged as a grievance if evidence of that kind were tendered, and because the indictment did not state the intent the judge should think it better not to admit such evidence. It would be regrettable. Therefore, if for no other reason, it would be better to draw up the indictment in the old form.

WALTON, J.—I had some doubt upon the question whether the indictment was sufficient during the argument. The crime of obscene publication involves two things—the matter must be obscene and the publication must be unlawful. In the ordinary form of indictment it is alleged that the publication is unlawful and malicious, and also tending to "corrupt the morals of his Majesty's subjects." These particular words did not occur in the indictment, and the question was whether there was sufficient in the indictment as framed to allege the offence; the words which were relied upon are these: "that the defendant did unlawfully and maliciously publish, &c." That sufficiently alleges the matter as obscene, and it also alleges that the publication was unlawful. It seems to me that, though it is better to follow the old form, the offence is sufficiently described by using the words "lewd, wicked, scandalous, obscene . . ." and the expression "malicious and unlawful." The defendant could establish the negative of either of these things, and either publication was not unlawful or not obscene. It seems to me, therefore, that the allegation as to the offence is sufficient.

MURPHY v. O'DONNELL. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Engineering work—Construction—Mechanical power—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 2.

A. contracted with B. to erect a machine on the third floor of B.'s building. C., who was in the employment of A., had to superintend the carrying out of the work. The machine was delivered in parts at B.'s building, and the heavy parts of the machine were raised to the third floor by pulleys, whilst the lighter parts were carried up by the lift, to work which mechanical power was required. When all the parts were on the third floor, and whilst C. was engaged in erecting the machine, for which no mechanical power was required, a piece slipped and injured C.

Held, the erecting of the machinery was a distinct and separate part of the contract from the delivery of the parts on to the third floor. The erection alone constituted the "construction" within the meaning of the statute, and as no mechanical power was required for that purpose, the injured workman was not entitled to compensation under the Act.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Leeds County Court.

The respondent George Murphy was a machinist in the employ of the appellant John William O'Donnell.

The appellant had contracted to supply to Messrs. Stocks' tannery a machine, which would be driven by steam power, and which was to be erected in situ upon the third floor of the building. The machine was delivered at the tannery in packing cases, and the heavier parts of it were raised to the third floor by pulleys, but the lighter parts were taken up by the lift, which was worked by mechanical power.

The respondent was in charge of the work. Whilst he was putting into position some of the smaller parts by means of chains and pulleys, a part slipped and caught his foot, necessitating amputation.

No mechanical power was used or required for the purposes of erecting the machine.

The county court judge found that the respondent was engaged in engineering work and entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

By section 7, sub-section 2: "'Engineering work' means any other work for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used."

R. A. Shepherd, for the appellant.—The respondent was not engaged upon engineering work within the meaning of the statute. The engineering work was the construction of the engine, if the erection of the engine could be called construction at all. But for the erection of the machine no mechanical power, steam or otherwise, was required. The only mechanical power used at all was in getting the parts of the machine to the third floor, but that was not part of the erection. It was part of the delivery; the contract being to deliver on the third floor.

Ruegg, K.C. (Bridgwater with him), for the respondent.—The whole work was one entire work and cannot be separated. In ordinary parlance he was doing engineering work throughout the job. In Cosgrove v. Partington, 17 T. L. R. 39, the work included the hoisting of iron girders by means of a steam winch for the purposes of putting on new top story on a mill. The workman was injured while so employed, and it was held that he was entitled to compensation.

He also referred to Rae v. Fraser, 36 Sc. L. R. 782.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question here is whether a man, who was employed as a workman by a contractor who had undertaken to deliver a machine to a particular place which happened to be on the third floor of a building, comes within the definition under the Workmen's Compensation Act as a person engaged in engineering work which by section 7, sub-section 2 is defined as "any work for the construction, or alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used." The employer of the workman, the undertaker, had to deliver the machine upon the third floor of the proprietors' premises, and he had to employ a skilled workman to erect it in situ. The machine was delivered at the bottom floor of this building, and the parts had to be brought up to the upper floor. The heavier parts of the machine, being too big to be taken up in the lift, were got up by pulleys without the use of any mechanical power, but the smaller parts were taken up in the lift, which was worked by mechanical power. After they were got on to the floor, the workman was engaged in putting the parts together, and whilst so engaged, using no mechanical power, one of the things he was moving slipped and he met with an accident. The county court judge says that under these circumstances he came within the meaning of the Act. It seems to me there was no evidence that he was engaged in any work "for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used." The evidence was the other way. The delivery of the parts on to the upper floor was not engineering more than the sending of goods by train from Manchester to London, the delivery to London being by steam transit. The actual engineering work began when the parts were on the upper floor, and it is found that there no steam or other mechanical power was used at all. It seems to me the two things were separable. The obligation to deliver the separate parts was separable from the construction, and the case does not fall within the statute unless the mechanical power is used in the construction. There is no evidence upon which the judge could find that the man was engaged in engineering work. The appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. There is no evidence, in my judgment, upon which the county court judge could find that the workman was engaged, at the time of the accident, on engineering work within the definition of the Act. The only part of the definition upon which it is contended the workman was engaged upon engineering work is the following: "Any other work for the construction of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used." The only work of construction in any sense upon which the workman was employed was the work of putting up the pieces of the machine so as to make the engine a complete working engine. That is the only work which could be regarded as construction work. The workman had to do other work. He had to superintend the carrying of the parts up to the third floor. For the purpose of carrying up certain parts mechanical power was used, but that was used for the carrying and not for any constructive purposes whatever. When you came to the constructive part, the putting of the pieces together, no mechanical power was used at all. That being so, it seems to me clear that the case does not fall within the definition. Whenever machinery was used it was used for the purposes of carrying and not for the purpose of construction.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There were two parts of the contract. One involved the use of mechanical power, the other did not. The parts of the contract were separable and distinguishable, one was the carrying, the other the construction. The man was injured in the construction of the engine for the purpose of which no mechanical power was used.

Appeal allowed.

TEMPERLEY STEAM SHIPPING CO. v. SMYTH & CO. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Incorporation of terms of charter-party—Arbitration clause—Cesser clause—Dispute "in the loading"—Demurrage.

By a charter-party the plaintiffs' steamer was to load a cargo at Bahia Blanca for a port in the United Kingdom at a certain rate per day, and all time on demurrage over and above the lay days to be paid for according to a certain rate; the charterers' liability to cease upon shipment of the cargo, and the vessel to have a lien on the cargo for the recovery of all bill of lading freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever. By clause 39, if the cargo could not be loaded from certain specified causes, the time lost was not to be counted as part of the lay days, and "should any dispute arise under this clause in the loading of the steamer, same to be settled in the Argentine Republic by" arbitration. The cargo was shipped under a bill of lading which made it deliverable to the charterers, they paying freight against delivery at the charter-party rate of freight "all the terms and exceptions in which charter-party . . . are herewith incorporated and form part hereof," the shipowners to have an absolute lien upon the cargo for the freight, demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever. A delay occurred in the loading, and on the completion of the loading the master of the ship claimed demurrage, but the charterers denied liability upon the ground that the delay was due to one of the causes specified in clause 39 of the charter-party. The charterers requested that the dispute should be referred to arbitration under that clause. The master refused, and the vessel sailed. On arrival at the port of discharge the shipowners claimed a lien for demurrage due at the port of loading, and brought an action to recover the amount. The charterers applied, under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to stay the proceedings in the action with a view to having the dispute settled by arbitration in accordance with clause 39.

Held, that, notwithstanding the cesser clause in the charter-party, inasmuch as the charterers were also the holders of the bill of lading the arbitration clause was incorporated in the bill of lading, and the court had jurisdiction to stay the proceedings in the action; and that in the circumstances, in the exercise of its discretion, it would do so.

Held, also, that a dispute arises "in the loading" within the meaning of clause 39 if the loading is claimed by one party and denied by the other to have been delayed by one of the causes named in the clause, and none the less because the extent of the delay cannot be ascertained until the loading has been completed.

Appeal by the defendants from the refusal of Channell, J., to stay the action and refer the dispute between the parties to arbitration in pursuance of an arbitration clause contained in a charter-party.

The action was brought by shipowners for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien on certain goods discharged from the steamship Woodbridge for the sum of £681 for demurrage at the port of loading, and for payment of that sum which had been deposited in a bank in joint names. On the 7th of January, 1905, a charter-party was entered into at Buenos Ayres between the plaintiffs and one F M. Nicholson, who was the agent there of the defendants, whereby The Woodbridge was chartered to Nicholson to carry a cargo of wheat from Bahia Blanca to a port in the United Kingdom. By clause 23: "Cargo to be loaded at the rate of 200 tons per running day, Sundays and holidays excepted (if the ship be not sooner despatched), and the time for loading shall commence to count twelve hours after written notice has been given by the master, brokers, or agents, on working days between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m., to the charterers or their agents that the vessel is in readiness to receive cargo, said notice to be given at the first port of loading only, and all time on demurrage over and above said laying days shall be paid for by charterers or their agents to the ship at the rate of 4d. sterling per gross register ton per day." By clause 31 the master was to sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight that the charterers or their agents might require, but any difference in amount between the bill of lading freight and the total gross chartered freight, as above, should be settled at the port of loading before the steamer sailed, "charterers' liability to cease upon shipment of cargo (provided such cargo be worth the bill of lading freight, dead freight, and demurrage at port of shipment). Vessel to have a lien on cargo for recovery of all such bill of lading freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever." By clause 39, "if the cargo cannot be loaded by reason of riots or any dispute between masters and men occasioning a strike or lock-out of stevedores, lightermen, tugboat men, cart men, railway employés, or other labour connected with the working, loading, or delivery of the cargo proved to be intended for the steamer, or through obstructions on the railways or in the docks or other loading places beyond the control of charterers, the time lost not to be counted as part of the lay days (unless any cargo be actually loaded by the steamer during such time), but lay days to be extended equivalent to the time lost owing to such cause or causes, and if the cargo cannot be discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the discharge of the cargo, the days for discharging shall not count during the continuance of such strike or lock-out. A strike of the charterers' or receivers' men only shall not exonerate charterers or receivers from any demurrage for which they may be liable under this charter, if by the use of reasonable diligence they could have obtained other suitable labour, at rates current before the strike, and in case of any delay by reason of the fore-mentioned causes, no claims for damages shall be made by charterers or receivers of the cargo, or by the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter. Any time lost by the steamer through any of the above causes to be reckoned as days for loading solely for the purpose of settling the despatch money account. Should any dispute arise under this clause in the loading of the steamer, same to be settled in the Argentine Republic by a committee consisting of two arbitrators, one to be nominated by each party to this contract, and should they be unable to agree the decision of an umpire mutally approved by the two arbitrators shall be final."

The cargo was shipped at Bahia Blanca under a bill of lading, which stated that the cargo was shipped by F. M. Nicholson on board the steamship Woodbridge to be delivered, subject to the terms of charter-party or freight contract, unto the defendants or their assigns, "they paying freight for the said goods, against delivery, in cash, without deduction, the rate of freight to be in accordance with charter-party or freight contract effected at Buenos Ayres, dated the 7th of January, 1905, all the terms and exceptions contained in which charter-party or freight contract are herewith incorporated and form part hereof." By a subsequent clause, "the owner or master of the vessel shall have an absolute lien and charge upon the cargo and goods laden on board for the recovery and payment of freight and demurrage and all other charges whatsoever." The loading of the vessel at Bahia Blanca occupied a longer time than the lay days allowed by the charter-party. The defendants asserted and the plaintiffs denied that the delay was due to labour disturbances within the exception contained in clause 39 of the charter-party. On the completion of the loading the captain, on behalf of the plaintiffs, made a claim for £660 18s. 4d. demurrage, but the charterers repudiated their liability for such demurrage and requested arbitration upon the dispute in accordance with clause 39 of the charter-party. The master refused to go to arbitration, and the vessel sailed for Manchester, where she arrived in due course, and in order to prevent any delay in the discharge and to release the cargo the defendants paid the sum of £661 into a bank to a joint account. The plaintiffs having brought this action, the defendants took out a summons under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for a stay in order that the matter might be referred in accordance with the arbitration clause in the charter-party. The plaintiffs opposed the summons on three grounds—namely, that upon the facts the court in its discretion would refuse to stay the action; secondly, that they were suing the defendants as consignees of cargo under the bills of lading, and not as charterers, and therefore the arbitration clause was not incorporated in the bills of lading, and might be disregarded; and thirdly, that, if the arbitration clause was to be treated as part of the contract between them, it only applied to disputes "in the loading," and did not apply to such a dispute as the present, which had arisen after the loading was completed. It was admitted that there was no dead freight and that the goods shipped were worth the freight and demurrage. The defendants made an affidavit in the action stating that F. M. Nicholson was their representative at Buenos Ayres, and that the charter-party was entered into by him as their agent. The plaintiffs stated that this was the first time that they heard that the defendants were the undisclosed principals of Nicholson, and not merely consignees, and that Nicholson was not himself the real charterer. Channell, J., was of opinion that the plaintiffs were right in their contention that "in the loading" meant during the loading, and on that ground he refused a stay. He also decided that the case was not one in which, in the exercise of his discretion, he would grant a stay.

The defendants appealed.

Pickford, K.C., and Leslie Scott, for the defendants. —Where the charterers are also the consignees of the goods, the contract is contained in the charter-party, and the bill of lading is only a receipt for the goods and does not affect the contract: Rodocanachi v. Milburn, 35 W. R. 241, 18 Q. B. D. 67; Carver on Carriage by Sea (4th ed.), s. 151. Gullichsen v. Stewart, 32 W. R. 763, 13 Q. B. D. 317, does not seem quite consistent with Rodocanachi v. Milburn, which, being a later case, must be taken as the last statement of the law. The decision of the Divisional Court to the contrary effect in Runciman & Co. v. Smyth & Co., 20 Times L. R. 625, was wrong. It purported to follow the decision of this court in Hamilton v. Mackie, 5 Times L. R. 677, but this latter case was between shipowners and indorsees of the bill of lading, and not between shipowners and charterers, and the action was to recover bill of lading freight. That was a very different case. If, however, the defendants had to rely upon the bill of lading by reason of the cesser clause, the arbitration provision in clause 39 of the charter-party is incorporated in the bill of lading. Further, clause 39 speaks of any dispute "under this clause," not "under this charter-party," and that is clearly incorporated in the bill of lading. Secondly, the bill of lading in anyone's hands incorporates clause 39 of the charter which is not inconsistent with the bill of lading. The cesser clause did not apply to relieve the charterers from liability. That clause only comes into operation when the shipowner obtains a lien on the cargo, and does not apply if the shipowner is left unprotected for the particular breach complained of: Hansen v. Harrold, [1894] 1 Q. B. 612. It only applies to discharge the charterers when a new contract between the shipowner and the bill of lading holder is brought into existence. [They also referred to Restitution Steamship Co. v. Pirie, 6 Asp. Mar. L. C. 428, 7 Asp. Mar. L. C. 11*n*.] Again, Channell, J., was wrong in confining the arbitration clause to disputes arising during the loading, in holding that it did not apply to a dispute as to demurrage arising after the loading was completed. Lastly, the learned judge was wrong in the exercise of his discretion in refusing a stay. It was more convenient that this dispute of fact as to the cause of the loading should be settled at a place where the facts were known. No question of law was in dispute.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Adair Roche, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have to prove two things: First, that there is an existing contract to refer the dispute to arbitration; and secondly, if there is, that it is a proper case in which to stay the action and refer the dispute. The charterer's liability ceased under the charter-party when the goods were loaded as they were worth the bill of lading freight, dead freight and demurrage. The bill of lading only incorporated the conditions of the charter-party applicable to the reception of the goods at the port of discharge (Gullichsen v. Stewart), and therefore did not incorporate the arbitration clause as to disputes in the loading: see Scrutton on Charter-parties (5th ed.), p. 41-43. In Rodocanachi v. Milburn the jury found as a fact that the bill of lading was signed upon the understanding that it was to be treated only as a receipt for the cargo and in no way to affect the clauses in the charter-party; and the argument and judgment proceeded upon that footing. Gullischen v. Stewart was not cited there, and it cannot be said that in those circumstances the court in Rodocanachi v. Milburn intended in any way to modify their earlier decision in Gullichsen v. Stewart. [They also referred upon this point to Serraino v. Campbell, 39 W. R. 356, [1891] 1 Q. B. 283, and Turner v. Haji Mahomed Azam, [1904] A. C. 826.] Further, the dispute did not arise "in the loading," but after the loading was completed. Secondly, the learned judge had properly exercised his discretion in refusing to stay the action. Questions of commercial law might arise, and it would be very undesirable to refer any such questions to lay arbitrators in the Argentine Republic. It would be very inconvenient for the plaintiffs to have the arbitration there, as their ship and all their witnesses had left. Upon all grounds the decision of the learned judge was right.

Pickford, K.C., in reply.—He was willing to undertake that no question of law would be raised by the defendants before the arbitrators.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from Channell, J., who refused to stay proceedings with a view to a reference under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. The plaintiffs are the owners of the steamship Woodbridge, and have brought this action for a declaration that they are entitled to a lien to the amount of £661 on a cargo carried in the said steamship from Bahia Blanca to Manchester under a charter-party. The defendants, who are the charterers and also holders of the bill of lading, dispute the plaintiffs' right to the amount claimed, but have paid it into a bank in the joint names of the parties so as to release the cargo. The lien claimed is for demurrage at the port of loading. The defendants contend that the question whether any such demurrage is payable or not depends on clause 39 of the charter-party, which provides that should any dispute arise under that clause in the loading of the steamship it shall be settled by arbitration, and they accordingly apply under section 4 of the Arbitration Act to have the dispute settled by arbitration as provided by the clause. The plaintiffs contend that, as a matter of construction, the clause does not cover the dispute in this case, and Channell, J., has accepted that view. They also contend that, having regard to the cesser clause in the charter-party and to the fact that the defendants, although charterers, are holders of the bill of lading, the arbitration clause, even if applicable to the facts cannot be invoked. The main argument before us has been on the latter point.

The charter-party purports to be made between the plaintiffs and F. M. Nicholson as charterer. Nicholson was, in fact, the agent for the defendants. The cesser clause (clause 31) is as follows. [His lordship read the clause.] Clause 23 provides for the rate of loading. [His lordship read that clause and also clause 39 and continued:] First, with regard to the construction of clause 39 itself. I cannot agree with Channell, J., that it relates only to a dispute that must arise for settlement before the loading is complete. It seems to me that the dispute arises "in the loading" within the meaning of the clause if the loading is claimed by one party and denied by the other to have been delayed by one of the causes named in the clause, and none the less because the extent of the delay cannot be ascertained until the loading has been completed. With regard to the point that clause 39 cannot apply by reason of the cesser clause and (or) the fact that the charterers are also the holders of the bill of lading, if the case were free from authority I cannot think that there would be any difficulty. A dispute has arisen between two parties to a contract by which they have agreed that in an event which has happened there shall be an arbitration. Why is the arbitration not to take place? The fact that the liability of the charterers is to cease on shipment of the cargo cannot affect the matter, because the clause is quite independent of whether personal liability subsists or not. It is common ground that a lien subsists if anything is due and the only question is for what amount. Why is the amount not to be ascertained in the manner provided by the contract? The cesser clause itself cannot bring about this result, and if it can be reached at all it must be because of the bill of lading. But the bill of lading in terms provides that "all the terms and exceptions contained in the charter-party or freight contract are herewith incorporated and form part hereof," and further, "the owner or master of the vessel shall have an absolute lien and charge upon the cargo . . . for the recovery and payment of freight and demurrage and all other charges whatsoever." I can see nothing at all inconsistent in the provision of the charter-party that the amount of demurrage at the port of loading is to be ascertained by arbitration at the port of loading, and the provision in the bill of lading that there is to be a lien for the amount, so as to prevent former provision operating between the parties to the charter-party who are also the parties to the bill of lading. Apart from authority I think this would be clear. It is, however, necessary to examine the authorities, and the respondents can certainly vouch one in their favour, which does not seem to be distinguishable—viz., Runciman & Co. v. Smyth & Co. That case, however, purported to be decided on the authority of Hamilton v. Mackie. This latter case was an action by the shipowners against the indorsees of the bill of lading who were not the charterers and was for bill of lading freight. The case is very shortly reported, and I will read the judgment of Lord Esher: "The law on the subject had been laid down several times. Where there was in a bill of lading such a condition as this, 'all other conditions as per charter-party,' it had been decided that the conditions of the charter-party must be read verbatim into the bill of lading as they were there printed in extenso. Then if it was found that any of the conditions of the charter-party on being so read were inconsistent with the bill of lading, they were insensible and must be disregarded. The bill of lading referred to the charter-party, and therefore when the condition was read in, 'all disputes under this charter shall be referred to arbitration,' it was clear that that condition did not refer to disputes under the bill of lading, but to disputes arising under the charter-party. The condition, therefore, was insensible, and had no application to the present dispute which arose under the bill of lading." He treats the dispute in that case as arising exclusively under the bill of lading, and not under the charter-party, and therefore as not covered by the clause which related to disputes under the charter only. Here the dispute arises under the charter-party and is between the parties to it, and, unless as between these parties the bill of lading has annulled this part of the contract of the charter-party, it still subsists and binds the parties. There is no doubt that, where the charterer takes the bill of lading in his own name, the rights and obligations as between him and the shipowner are different from those of a person other than the charterer who has become the holder of a bill of lading purporting to incorporate the charter-party, though the precise extent of the difference is not quite clear. In Rodocanachi v. Milburn, decided in 1886, Lord Esher, M.R., says: "In my opinion, even so, unless there be an express provision in the documents to the contrary, the proper construction of the two documents taken together is that as between the shipowner and the charterer of the bill of lading, although inconsistent with certain parts of the charter, is to be taken only as an acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods"; and he adopts fully what was said by Lord Bramwell in Sewell v. Burdick, 33 W. R., at p. 469, 10 App. Cas. at p. 105. On the other hand, in Gullichsen v. Stewart decided in 1884 in the Court of Appeal consisting of Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, M.R., and Bowen, L.J., it was held that a charterer who was also the bill of lading holder could not set up the cesser clause in the charter as an answer to a claim for demurrage at the port of discharge. The broad distinction between the position of a charterer, who ships and takes a bill of lading, and an ordinary holder of a bill of lading is, I think, that in the former case there is the underlying contract of the charter-party, which remains until it is cancelled, and taking a bill of lading does not cancel it in whole or in part unless it can be inferred from the inconsistency of the terms of the two documents that it was intended to do so. On the other hand, in the case of the holder of the bill of lading who is not the charterer there is no presumption that he contracts in any terms but those of the bill of lading, and if the bill of lading purports to import the charter-party the presumption is that it incorporates only those clauses which relate to the conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods: Russell v. Niemann, 13 W. R. 93, 17 C. B. N. S. 163. With all deference to the learned judges who decided it, I think Runciman & Co. v. Smyth & Co. is not supported by the authority relied upon, and is not in accordance with principle. If the clause is operative, as I think it is, between the parties, I think the fact that the ship sailed away from Bahia Blanca without performing its conditions, though pressed to do so, debars the owner from relying upon the inconvenience of conducting the reference in the Argentine now. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will only add a few words upon the question of discretion. I think that the matter should be disposed of by arbitration in accordance with clause 39 of the charter-party. If the question raised were one of English law it would be better to try it in the Commercial Court here, but it is clear upon the facts that there is no such question for the decision of the arbitrators, and, moreover, an undertaking has been given by the defendants' counsel that no such question of law will be raised on the arbitration. It would be very undesirable to submit to those commercial men who will act as arbitrators any question of commercial law. The charter-party contains the ordinary cesser clause, substituting a lien for demurrage for the personal liability of the charterers. Clause 39 seems to be contained in a slip annexed to the charter-party, and no doubt it was put there on account of the state of affairs at the port of loading. Almost immediately after the ship arrived at the port of loading it was seen that the loading was not progressing properly and that the ship would be detained beyond the time allowed for loading, and the dispute at once arose as to whether the detention of the ship was due to any of the causes specified in clause 39. That dispute ought to and could have been disposed of at the time on the spot. The charterers requested arbitration upon it. The master, however, absolutely refused to go to arbitration, and sailed home. When the ship arrived the shipowners at once claimed a lien on the cargo for demurrage, and the very sensible course was adopted of placing the amount claimed in a bank in joint names so as to release the cargo pending the settlement of the dispute. The shipowners thereupon issued a writ against the charterers and the action was transferred to the Commercial Court, and an application was immediately made for a stay of proceedings in the action upon the ground that the contract between the parties contained a submission of the dispute to arbitration. The question is whether that application ought to be granted. I have come to the conclusion that it ought. It was said that it would be inconvenient to the shipowners to send the case back to the Argentine Republic because their ship is here and their crew has dispersed. I am not at all clear that it is necessary that the captain or crew should give evidence. I do not know that they can be of any assistance to the arbitrators. However, if there is any such inconvenience the shipowners cannot complain of it, because it was entirely their fault that the ship left the port of loading without the dispute having been settled by arbitration. Looked at from the point of view of the charterers, the balance of convenience is decidedly upon the side of those who seek to have the matter referred. If this action proceeded in the Commercial Court it would be necessary for them to bring their witnesses over here, or else a commission would have to issue to examine them in the Argentine Republic. Either of those two courses would involve serious delay and expense, and I decline to impose such a burden on the charterers. I therefore agree that the action should be stayed, and that this question of fact—for it is a question of fact and nothing else—should be settled by arbitration.

The court made the following order: "Appeal allowed; defendants to have costs of this appeal and of the application to the judge in any event. Proceedings in this action stayed. Arbitrators to deal with questions of fact only, and make award thereon. The award when made to be brought before the Commercial Court, and stay of proceedings to continue until the award is so brought before the court or further order. Costs of action and reference to be reserved to Commercial Court."

Appeal allowed.

Further consideration.

On the 1st of July, 1873, articles of partnership were entered into between W. T. Bourne and George Grove.

G. Grove died on the 9th of May, 1901.

A deposit of deeds was made on the 7th of February, 1902, in favour of Messrs. Berwick & Co., bankers, accompanied by a memorandum of deposit signed by the testator, W. T. Bourne, in the name of "Bourne & Grove." The memorandum related to certain hereditaments which formed part of the assets of the partnership of "Bourne & Grove."

W. T. Bourne died on the 3rd of September, 1902. His estate was insolvent. The overdraft at the bank was then about £4,500.

An action was commenced against Bourne's executors to administer his estate.

By an order dated December, 1903, in the claim of the executors of the will of G. Grove to rank as creditors against the capital which G. Grove had in the business of Bourne & Grove, it was ordered that the executors of G. Grove be at liberty to prove for £3,000 against the estate of W. T. Bourne, and are to have a lien for the amount of such debt and costs on the assets of the said partnership.

The partnership real estate, the subject of the deposit of the 7th of February, 1902, had been sold and realized about £5,000. It being insufficient to pay both the bank and Grove's executors in full, the question had to be determined which of them was entitled to priority.

Upjohn, K.C., and Stamp, for the parties having the conduct of the action.

Jenkins, K.C., and P. Wheeler, for Grove's executors.

Butcher, K.C., and Martelli, for the bank.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Owen Thompson, for Bourne's executors.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: In my opinion this case is covered by the authority that has been cited. Grove died on the 9th of May, 1901. At that time the firm was in debt to his bankers, Messrs. Berwick & Co. Mr. Bourne, the surviving partner, carried on the business and got an overdraft from the bank on the security of the deposit of partnership deeds.

The circumstances are set out in the master's certificate, and these are the facts with which I have to deal. Messrs. Berwick were the bankers of the firm of Bourne & Grove during the late partnership down to the death of the partner George Grove.

Between the death of George Grove and the date of the memorandum of deposit the testator "drew out sums amounting to £8,685 9s. 1d. The overdraft on the 7th of February, 1902, was £5,088 9s. At this time the said Messrs. Berwick & Co. required security to be given for the said overdraft, in consequence whereof the testator, William Temple Bourne, deposited the title deeds of the said hereditaments with Messrs. Berwick & Co., and signed the said memorandum of deposit by way of security for such overdraft. Between the date of the said memorandum of deposit and his death, the testator, William Temple Bourne, paid to the credit of the said account sums amounting in all to £6,825 9s. 8d. and drew out sums amounting in all to £6,200 13s. All cheques upon the said account were drawn in the names of Bourne & Grove, and appeared to have been drawn for the purposes of the said business." Now, the rule in Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572, would make the actual indebtedness of the firm at the death of Grove disappear before the date at which the security was given, but on the authority of In re Langmead's Trusts, 3 W. R. 602, (1855) 20 Beav. 20, it appears to me that the lien which Grove had for the amount due to him would not interfere with the raising of money for the purpose of the business carried on by the surviving partner by giving security for an overdraft. The bankers, it is admitted, knew of the death of Grove. They also knew that the account was not altered in any way. They knew that they were only paid off, if they ever thought about it, by the application of the rule in Clayton's case. The account was not altered in any way. It certainly would be rather strong to say that because the bankers were paid off, because of the rule in Clayton's case, they could not possibly take a security afterwards without being fixed with some impropriety of conduct. In my view Langmead's case shows that that is not the law. The 39th section of the Partnership Act declares what is now the nature of a partnership lien. "On the dissolution of a partnership every partner is entitled, as against the other partners in the firm, and all the persons claiming through them in respect of their interests as partners, to have the property of the partnership applied in payment of the debts and liabilities of the firm, and to have the surplus assets after such a payment applied in payment of what may be due to the partners respectively after deducting what may be due from them as partners to the firm; and for that purpose any partner or his representative may, on the termination of the partnership, apply to the court to wind up the business and affairs of the firm." Lord Lindley, in his note to that section, refers to In re Langmead, which I observe he there also treats as though it related only to specific chattels, which I venture to think is an oversight, because In re Langmead did not deal with a chattel at all, but with a chose in action—namely, a policy of assurance. In re Langmead was a case where the partners were brewers, and part of the partnership property was a policy of assurance. It does not appear how they bought it, probably they had taken it as security for some loan. This was sold by the surviving partner, and the deceased partner's executors claimed a paramount title.

Lord Romilly puts the case in this way in 20 Beav., p. 25: "I think that the case of the petitioner cannot be put higher than one of an express trust vested in William Langmead to sell the property and apply the proceeds in payment of the debts of the partnership. If that had been the case, a purchaser from William Langmead, even with express notice of that trust, would not have been bound to see to the application of the purchase-money." That is confirmed by the Court of Appeal, by Knight-Bruce, L.J., on the same ground, and by the other Lord Justice on a different ground. I observe that Lord Lindley in his treatise speaks of this right as this quasi lien, or whatever else it may be called, and I think that the argument really is founded on a certain misapprehension as to the nature of the right by treating it as though it were in fact an equitable mortgage security. The right is as stated in the Partnership Act, and it cannot be put higher, as Lord Romilly says, than a trust to realize and pay the debts, with, of course, a receipt clause. That being so, what has happened is that the surviving partner, finding debts still due, borrows money, and goes on carrying on what had been the partnership business, and which had become his. So far as I can see there is nothing whatever to put the bank upon any inquiry or to fix them with notice that he was intending to use the money otherwise than in accordance with the trust to which Lord Romilly refers in In re Langmead. If that was so, the case is indistinguishable from In re Langmead.

The Irish case In re Thomas Ryan, L. R. Ir. 3 Eq. 222, I think can be explicable, although it is very difficult to follow the very lengthy judgments, reading all the evidence in full, and must have been put, I think, on the ground that, applying In re Langmead, the purchaser or mortgagee had notice that the purpose for which the sale or mortgage was being made was improper. I do not see how otherwise he can possibly, consistently with the authorities, have been held liable. Of course if a man knows as a fact, and it is brought home to him, that the surviving partner is going to pay a gambling debt or something of that sort, I do not say for a moment that he would be assisted by In re Langmead, which puts it, to my mind, on a very intelligible ground—namely, that a trustee has power to sell and power to give receipts. The purchaser is entitled to rely on the power to give receipts, except so far as he is fixed with the express knowledge that there is an improper application intended. Further than that Mr. Jenkins has not relied upon it. So far as I can see, there is no answer to the second point, that the executors of the partner might have got the deeds; they did not, and the bankers have got them, and therefore, on the authority of the cases cited, they appear on that ground to have a better equity. Messrs. Berwick have a first charge upon what was comprised in the security.

DAVY v. SCARTH. (a.)

Partnership—Receiver—Remuneration of receiver—Debt of receiver to partnership—Set-off.

In an action for dissolution of partnership, one of the partners, who was indebted to the partnership, had been appointed receiver.

Held, that his remuneration as receiver could not be deducted from the debt due by him to the partnership.

Further consideration.

An action had been brought for dissolution of a partnership that had existed between Davy and the defendant. The defendant had been appointed receiver in the action. It appeared from the master's certificate, filed in July, 1905, that the defendant as receiver had passed his accounts showing that he had in hand a sum of £1,892 12s. 8d., and that there was also due to the partnership from the defendant as partner a sum of £1,457; the master further certified that he allowed the defendant as receiver the sum of £280 for remuneration and £48 1s. 6d. for costs—making together the sum of £328 1s. 6d.

The defendant was unable to pay any part of the debt of £1,457 due by him to the partnership.

The question on further consideration was, whether the defendant was entitled to deduct from the partnership assets in his hands the sum (£328 1s. 6d.) allowed for his remuneration and costs as receiver, or whether that sum ought to be set-off against the debt owing by him as partner.

Elgood, for the plaintiff (the executrix of Davy), admitted that there was no express authority on the point raised.

Luxmoore, for the defendant.

FARWELL, J., said that the defendant, as receiver, was an officer of the court, and was entitled to be paid for the work that he was employed to do. He was therefore entitled to retain out of the partnership moneys in his hands the sum of £328 1s. 6d. which had been allowed him by the master for remuneration and costs, notwithstanding the fact that he was himself indebted to the partnership estate and was unable to pay what he owed.

BISHOP OF CREDITON v. BISHOP OF EXETER. (a.)

Deed—Execution—Alterations after execution—Blanks filled up—Date altered—Alteration immaterial.

B. executed the deed some months later in* 1900; the blanks were filled up and the year altered from 1899 to 1900.

Held, that the validity of the deed was unaffected by these alterations.

Pigot's case, 11 Rep. 26*b*, since Aldous v. Cornwell, 16 W. R. 1045, L. R. 3 Q. B. 513, applies only to material alterations.

Action.

This was an action brought for the purpose of determining whether certain alterations made in the date of a deed after some of the parties had executed it thereby rendered it invalid.

It had been intended to build a new church in St. Jude, a newly-formed parish made out of an old one in Plymouth, and it was necessary, in order to vest the patronage of the new church in the vicar and certain trustees therein named of the old parish, to execute a deed, in pursuance of the Church Building Acts (8 & 9 Vict. c. 70 and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 37).

Under these Acts it was necessary for this object to have an agreement in writing between the bishop of the diocese and the patrons and incumbent of the parish in which the new church was to be erected.

The agreement in question was made by a deed between the defendant of the first part, the vicar and churchwardens of the old parish, who were patrons of the parish of St. Jude, of the second part, the vicar of St. Jude of the third part, and the plaintiffs of the fourth part. After reciting that it had been proposed to build in St. Jude a new church, to be named St. Simon's, it was declared that the advowson and patronage of the new church should be vested in the plaintiffs and the vicar for the time being of the old parish. The deed was executed by all parties, with the exception of one of the plaintiffs and the Bishop of Exeter, on the 21st of October, 1899, and the remaining plaintiff on the 23rd of October, 1899.

At these dates the testimonium clause ran as follows: "In witness hereto the said parties to these presents hereunto set their hands and seals this day of , one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine." It was forwarded to the bishop on the 4th of November, 1899, and was executed by him on the 26th of January, 1900. The testimonium was then filled up with the "twenty-sixth" and "January," the word "nine" was substituted for "eight," and the words "and ninety-nine" erased.

It had been the intention of the parties executing it that it should be dated as of the day of execution by the Bishop of Exeter, and a question was accordingly raised whether the alteration in the testimonium rendered the deed invalid. The plaintiffs claimed that the deed was valid. The other parties to the deed were made defendants.

Austen-Cartmell, for the plaintiffs, relied on Doe v. Bingham, 4 B. & Ald. 672; Adsetts v. Hives, 33 Beav. 52; Pigot's case, 11 Rep. 26*b*, 27*a*; a case in Dyer 261*b*; Aldous v. Cornwell, 16 W. R. 1045, L. R. 3 Q. B. 573; Hudson v. Revett, 5 Bing. 368; In re Howgate and Osborn's Contract, [1902] 1 Ch. 451, 50 W. R. Dig. 48.

He referred to Sheppard's Touchstone (7th ed.), on p. 554 (Preston's). SWINFEN EADY, J. mentioned Paget v. Paget, 2 Rep. Ch. 187; Sheppard's Touchstone (8th ed.) (Atherley's), on p. 53.]

The defendants did not appear.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In my judgment there is no doubt that the instrument in question was effective, and that the advowson, patronage, and perpetual right of presentation and nomination to the new church therein mentioned became thereby effectually vested in the plaintiffs and the vicar of Charles (the old parish). The facts are these: [His lordship stated the facts set out above, and continued:] It was perhaps contemplated the bishop would execute in 1899. The instrument was sent to him on the 4th of November, 1899, but he did not execute it until the 26th of January, 1900, and it was then made a deed of that date. If the year had been left blank as well as the month and day, it would only have been necessary to fill in the date, but as the year had been written in it was necessary to alter it. But it was only technically an alteration, for the deed was not dated. In the first place the alteration was only made to carry out the intention of all parties that the deed should be dated and take effect on the day it was executed by the bishop. Substantially, therefore it was not an alteration, only a filling in the date which all parties intended to be the date; and, secondly, it was not a material alteration. The rule laid down in Pigot's case, in 11 Rep. 27*a*, must in the present day be taken to apply only where the alteration is in a material point. In that case it was found as a fact that the alteration was not material and was made by a stranger, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. In the case of Dyer, quoted in Pigot's case, the alteration was material. Pigot's case was considered in Aldous v. Cornwell, where the judgment of the court, consisting of Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn and Lush, JJ., was delivered by Lush, J., and after going through the authorities he says: [His lordship read his remarks on p. 579, and continued:] In other words, Pigot's case is not now any authority that where the alteration is not material the deed is made void. The passage in Sheppard's Touchstone and other authorities which have been cited are to the same effect. The case of Hudson v. Revett is, I think, not immaterial upon this point. That was a case of a creditor's deed in which the amount of one of the principal debts was left blank when the deed was executed. [His lordship referred to Gaselee, J.'s, remarks on p. 390 in 5 Bing., and continued:] In substance that is this case. In this case the date was left blank with the intention that the deed should be dated on, and take effect from, the day on which the Bishop of Exeter executed it. It was in effect an imperfect execution. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the alteration in the deed did not make the deed invalid, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration in the words of the statement of claim.

Ex parte FOWLER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Contract for works—Power to engineer to order direct payment to those supplying contractor with machinery—Exercise of such power after receiving order against the contractor.

The bankrupt had entered into a contract to do certain work for a public authority. The contract contained a clause empowering the engineer to order direct payment by the public authority to those supplying machinery to the contractor in case he should have reasonable cause to believe that the contractor was unduly delaying payment to them. At the date of the receiving order some of the firms who had supplied machinery were unpaid, and the engineer subsequently ordered direct payment to be made to them out of the money which remained due from the public authority to the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order.

Held, that the engineer was entitled to make such order, and that the trustee could not recover such money from the public authority, as the effect of the filing by the bankrupt of his petition was that payment to the machinery firms was unduly delayed.

Held, also, that the authority given by the contractor to the engineer under the clause in question was irrevocable by the contractor and consequently irrevocable by the trustee in his bankruptcy.

Motion by the trustee in bankruptcy to recover from the Aylesbury Urban District Council certain money alleged to be due from the council to the bankrupt under a contract.

The bankrupt had on the 9th of September, 1903, entered into a contract with the Aylesbury Urban District Council for the carrying out of certain drainage works.

The price agreed was £11,546, payable by monthly instalments on the certificate of the council's engineer, less 10 per cent. retention money. The contractor was to maintain the works for six months after the engineer should have certified their completion, and the retention money was then to become payable. The contract also provided that certain machinery should be supplied by certain specified firms; and also that "at each and every certificate in which the engineer shall deem proper to include a sum or sums for machinery, the contractor shall, upon measurement being made, produce to the authorized officer a receipt showing that he has paid to the machinery makers the net sum to be included notwithstanding that he has not at the time of paying such machinery makers received the said sums from the council. If the engineer shall have reasonable cause to believe that the contractor is unduly delaying proper payment to the firms supplying the machinery, he shall have power, if he thinks fit, to order direct payment to them, and shall deduct from the next certificate issued to the contractor the money so paid. (Clause 54 of the contract.)

On the 3rd of October, 1904, when the contract was very nearly completed, a receiving order was made against the contractor. He was adjudged bankrupt upon the 12th or October, and a Mr. Fowler was appointed trustee.

Notice of the adjudication was at once given to the council.

At the date of the receiving order there was due to the bankrupt firm from the council a total sum of £1,574 15s. 10d., of which £1,349 17s. 8d. was retention money, and £224 18s. 2d. was to become payable under the next certificate from the engineer.

The trustee continued the work, which was completed on the 24th of October, and maintained it for six months after completion, as required by the contract.

The bankrupt, however, had not paid the machinery makers regularly, and at the date of the receiving order was indebted to various firms in a total sum of £836 8s. 9d.

On the 7th of February, 1905, the council's engineer made an order under clause 54 of the contract, reciting that he had reasonable cause to believe that the contractor was unduly delaying payment to the firms who had supplied him with machinery, and ordering direct payment of the sum of £224 18s. 2d. to the various firms on account of the money owing to them from the bankrupt.

On the 8th of February the engineer certified that the works had been completed to his satisfaction upon the 24th of October, 1904, but that nothing was due to the contractor, as he had already ordered direct payment to the machinery firms of all that was owing to the contractor.

On the 5th of April the engineer made an order, similar to that of the 7th of February, for the direct payment of £611 10s. 7d. to the various firms of machinery makers.

On the 24th of April, the works having by then been maintained for six months, the engineer issued his final certificate for the payment of the retention money, but deducted therefrom £611 10s. 7d., which he had ordered to be paid directly to the machinery makers, and certified only £738 7s. 1d. as due to the contractor.

The trustee claimed from the council the sum of £224 18s. 2d., due on the completion of the works, and for £1 349 17s. 8d., the whole of the retention money, subject to a charge thereon to the debtor's bankers of £1,220. The council refused to pay the money because of the orders made by their engineer, and the trustee took proceedings against them by way of motion for a declaration that the money in question formed part of the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors, and for an order that the council should pay it to the trustee.

The motion came on for hearing on the 17th of July, when counsel for the Aylesbury Urban District Council objected that the court had no jurisdiction to try the question by way of motion, as a decision in favour of the trustee would not be binding upon the engineering firms, who were no parties to the motion, and would still be in a position to enforce their claims against the council.

The respondents were prepared to pay the money to whoever should be found entitled to it, but they contended that the trustee should have proceeded by an action, in which they could have interpleaded.

Counsel for the trustee then suggested that each of the engineering firms should be served with a copy of the notice of motion, and asked if they would consent to the question being tried on motion.

Bigham, J., consented to this course being adopted, and gave directions accordingly.

The engineering firms having been duly served and consented to the jurisdiction, the motion came on again for hearing on the 10th of August.

S. G. Lushington, for the trustee.—Clause 54 was intended to protect the council against delay in the works arising from non-supply of machinery, not to protect the manufacturers. At the date when the engineer issued his orders for direct payment the machinery had all been supplied, and the council was in no need of protection. Further, upon the adjudication of the contractor the contract vested in the trustee, who did not disclaim it, but, on the contrary, continued and completed the work and became "the contractor" under the contract. The engineer's certificate that "the contractor" was unduly delaying payment was not really a true statement of fact. The trustee could only pay the creditors of the bankrupt by way of dividend, and there could be no suggestion that the trustee was unduly delaying a distribution of dividends on the estate. The machinery makers were unsecured creditors at the date of the receiving order, and the subsequent orders made by the engineers could not make them secured creditors.

A. A. Hudson, for three of the firms of machinery makers.—Clause 54 was intended to protect the machinery makers as well as the council. They would not have supplied the machinery without some such guarantee that they would be paid for it. Further, the bankrupt by clause 54 gave an authority to the engineer to order direct payment to the machinery makers in certain events. This was an authority which he could not revoke, and the trustee standing in the bankrupt's position as "the contractor" has no more power to revoke the authority than the bankrupt had. The bankruptcy put it out of "the contractor's" power to pay the firms, consequently payment thereby became unduly delayed. Finally, the engineer's certificate of undue delay is conclusive and cannot be questioned, unless it is suggested that he acted mala fide.

G. D. Pepys, W. Glynn, and W. E. Ball, for the other machinery makers, argued to the same effect.

Clayton, for the council, stated that they would pay the money as the court might direct.

S. G. Lushington replied.

Mr. A. N. Stephens, solicitor to the bankers, who had a charge on the retention money, conceded that if the court decided in favour of the machinery makers they would be entitled to payment in priority to his clients.

BIGHAM, J.—I doubt whether without the consent of all parties I should have had jurisdiction to deal with this question upon a motion; but as all parties have consented I will decide the points that have been raised. The trustee claims as part of the property divisible among his creditors two sums of money payable by the Aylesbury Urban District Council to the bankrupt under a contract stated the 9th of September, 1903, and amounting in all to £1,574 15s. 10d. On the other hand, certain firms who have supplied machinery to the contractor claim that they are entitled to part of this money in priority to the trustee. Now the contract contains a provision on which, in my judgment, the whole question turns. [His lordship here read clause 54.] That clause, in my opinion, is inserted in the contract not only for the protection of those who supply the machinery but also for the benefit of the council. It is much to the interest of the council to see that contracts of this kind for public works are carried out in a manner satisfactory to all persons who are concerned in the performance of them. The council certainly may, and no doubt frequently do, make contracts of this kind, and they make them much more advantageously when the people who supply the machinery or other goods which are to be used by the contracter in the performance of the contract know that there is a reasonable probability that they will be paid. The council are enabled by inserting a clause of this kind in their contract to give a certain amount of confidence to people who supply goods to the contractor, and in that way they are placed in a better position when they come to make contracts again, than they otherwise would be, and therefore I say that the clause is inserted, not only in the interests of the persons who supply the contractor, but also in the interests of the council themselves. Now, what is the meaning of this clause? I think it means that if the persons supplying machinery to the contractor for the purpose of the contract are not promptly and properly paid by him, they can apply to the engineer, and then it shall be competent for the engineer to intervene and, by a proper certificate given in that behalf, to require the council to pay to the machinery firms the amount of their accounts directly—that is to say, not through the hands of the contractor at all, but the money is to be paid directly by the council to the machinery firms. That is the meaning of the clause. It amounts to an authority given by the contractor—that is to say, by the bankrupt in this case—to the engineer representing the council to dispose of money which would otherwise come to the bankrupt, in a certain way under certain circumstances. It is an authority which, in my opinion, it is not competent for the bankrupt to withdraw, and it was never contemplated that he should withdraw it; and, indeed, it is not contended on behalf of the trustee that the authority was one which could be lawfully withdrawn. It is an authority, therefore, which the bankruptcy of the contractor did not annul. I have, then, to see whether that authority has been properly exercised. On the 3rd of October, 1904, after the machinery had been supplied, the contractor filed his own petition and was adjudicated bankrupt—that is to say, by his own act he put it out of his power to pay for the machinery which had been supplied to him. In my opinion that very act amounted to "unduly delaying proper payment" of the machinery firms within the meaning of clause 54. He prevented himself, no doubt by his own misfortune, from making proper and due payment. I think it would have been competent at that very moment for the engineer to have given the certificate which, as I shall mention in a moment, he subsequently did give, directing that the moneys should be paid direct by the council to the firms supplying the machinery. He, however, did not give the certificate then, but on the 7th of February, 1905, long after the bankruptcy, he gave a certificate by which he certified that certain sums of money were due to various firms who had supplied machinery to the bankrupt. The certificate begins: "Having reasonable cause to believe that the contractors, Messrs. Cooke & Son" (the bankrupt's trading name), "are unduly delaying proper payment to the firms supplying machinery, I hereby under the terms of the contract direct payment to those firms who are hereunder named of the sums respectively payable." In my opinion the circumstances were such as to give the engineer power to execute the provisions of clause 54 by giving that certificate. The power or authority given by that clause was never revoked, and in my opinion it binds the trustee just as much as it would have bound the contractor if he had never become bankrupt. The day after the engineer gave that certificate, he gave another certificate to the effect that the bankrupt or the bankrupt's estate was entitled to receive the the balance of the contract money less the retention money of 10 per cent. which the council were entitled to retain under the terms of the contract during the maintenance of the works, and less the amount of the order or certificate of the 7th of February. Later on, on the 5th of April, 1905, the period during which the maintenance clauses under the contract were in operation came to an end, and the contractor, if he had not been a bankrupt, would have been entitled to the retention money. Then what the engineer did, and I think he had power to do it, was to certify that the machinery firms, having been delayed in the manner before described, were entitled to be paid direct out of the retention money the balance of their accounts, and he gave a certificate accordingly on the same 5th of April. In my opinion he gave that certificate with authority and under circumstances that justified him in directing that these firms were to receive out of the retention money the balance of their accounts. I will make an order for payment by the council direct, in accordance with the certificates of the 7th of February and of the 5th of April of the sum of £836 8s. 9d. to the machinery firms, and the balance will go to the bank.

A collier owned by his Majesty's Government was exclusively engaged in going backwards and forwards carrying coal for the Navy. She appeared in the Navy List under the heading "List of small steam vessels, tugs, &c., employed on harbour service." Her master was not an officer of the Royal Navy. On divers occasions the master of the collier employed a licensed pilot for the port of Cardiff, and the pilot took proceedings under section 591 of the Merchant Shipping Act against the master to recover pilotage dues according to the scale imposed by bye-laws made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and a local Act (in which the Crown were not mentioned) under which the pilots were licensed.

Held, that the collier was a King's ship, and therefore came within the exemption conferred by section 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and that the master of the King's ship was not liable to pay pilotage dues on the scale contemplated by the bye-laws.

Case stated.

At the Cardiff Petty Sessions a complaint was preferred by the respondent against the appellant under section 591 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and the bye-laws made and confirmed by Order in Council pursuant to sections 582 and 583 of the Act called Pilotage Rates, Bye-laws, and Regulations for the Government of Pilots acting under the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act, 1861, for the recovery of the sum of £44 in respect of a claim for dues for the pilotage of the steamship Kharki from Penarth Roads to Roath Basin, Cardiff, on two occasions, and from Roath Basin to Penarth Roads on two occasions.

Upon the hearing of the complaint the following facts were proved or admitted:

The Kharki (net register nottage 338·24 tons) was a coal vessel owned by his Majesty's Government. She was a collier exclusively engaged in going backwards and forwards to various ports carrying coal for the Navy. She flew the Devonport dockyard flag, but not the Navy flag, and she did not carry guns. She was not registered under the Merchant Shipping Act, but had been surveyed by the Board of Trade in accordance with rule 1 of that Act. She appeared in the Navy List under the heading "List of small steam vessels, tugs, &c., employed on harbour service."

The appellant held a Board of Trade certificate as master mariner, and was employed as master of The Kharki by the dockyard authorities at Devonport, under the Admiralty, and acted on the instructions received from the coaling officer at Devonport Dockyard. He was not an officer of the Royal Navy.

The crew of the vessel were engaged at the dockyard under articles of agreement.

The respondent was a licensed pilot for the port of Cardiff, and at the request of the appellant he piloted The Kharki on the 5th of May from Penarth Roads to the Roath Basin, Cardiff; on the 6th of May from the Roath Basin to Penarth Roads; on the 12th of May from Penarth Roads to the Roath Basin; and on the 13th of May from the Roath Basin to Penarth Roads. Pilotage is not compulsory in the port of Cardiff. On the completion of each pilotage service rendered by the respondent the appellant handed him a certificate.

On the 20th of May, 1904, the respondent sent to the appellant a demand in writing for payment of the said dues.

Bye-law of the Pilotages Rates, Bye-laws and Regulations for the Government of Pilots acting under the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act, 1861, made pursuant to section 582 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and approved and confirmed by Order in Council dated the 20th of May, 1903, provides that every licensed pilot who may be employed to pilot any ship to any dock, harbour, or basin in the port of Cardiff, from any point in Penarth Roads, or vice versâ, shall be paid according to the registered tonnage of such vessel as follows: If 300 tons and under 400 tons, £1 1s.

On the part of the appellant it was contended, first, that The Kharki was a ship belonging to his Majesty within the meaning of section 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that inasmuch as the Act neither made a provision for the application of section 591 to the King's ships nor conferred power on the pilotage authority to fix dues for the pilotage of such ships, the appellant, as master of The Kharki, was not liable to pay the pilotage dues claimed, and that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the claim; secondly, that by the common law the Crown was not liable for statutory dues or bound by any statute, except when expressly bound therein; thirdly, that the appellant was not legally responsible for the payment of the dues, because the services were ordered by him in his capacity as a public officer and as agent for the Crown, and the public revenue could not be reached by means of an action against him.

On the part of the respondent it was contended, firstly, that section 741 merely placed King's ships on a different footing from other ships in that they were not liable to be proceeded against in rem, and that the section did not preclude an action from being successfully maintained against the master of a ship belonging to his Majesty in respect of tort or breach of contract; secondly, that The Kharki was not a ship belonging to his Majesty within the meaning of section 741, and that the appellant as master was therefore personally liable under section 591 to pay the dues claimed by the respondent.

The magistrate was of opinion that The Kharki did not perform the services of a King's ship, but was a dockyard vessel or yard craft used exclusively for commercial purposes by the dockyard authorities at Devonport, and he therefore held that she was not a ship belonging to his Majesty within the meaning of section 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that the appellant as her master was therefore liable under section 591 of the Act to pay the dues claimed, and the magistrate accordingly gave judgment for the amount claimed.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate came to a correct determination in point of law.

By section 591 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894: "(1) The following persons shall be liable to pay pilotage dues for any ship for which the services of a qualified pilot are obtained—viz., (a) the owner or master; (b) as to pilotage inwards such consignees or agents as have paid or made themselves liable to pay any other charge on account of the ship in the port of her arrival or discharge; (c) as to pilotage outwards such consignees or agents as have paid or made themselves liable to pay any other charge on account of the ship in the port from which she clears out; and these dues may be recovered in the same manner as fines of like amount under this Act, but that recovery shall not take place until a previous demand has been made in writing."

By section 681, sub-section 2: "Where under this Act any sum may be recovered under this Act, that sum, if recoverable before a court of summary jurisdiction, shall in England be recovered as a civil debt in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Act."

Section 741: "This Act shall not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to his Majesty."

By the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. clxxxvi), s. 35, it shall be lawful for the board to levy, demand, and receive from the master or owner or consignee of every vessel coming into or going out of the port for which such board may have been appointed, and who shall have required and obtained the assistance of a pilot, such reasonable rates for pilotage as may from time to time be provided by the bye-laws to be made by such board for such purpose; and such board shall at all times maihtain an efficient staff of pilots.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and W. Wills, for the appellant.

Pickford, K.C., and John Sankey (Herman Cohen with them), for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Cargo ex Woosang, 1 P. D. 260; The Cybele, 26 W. R. 345, 3 P. D. 8; Palmer v. Hutchinson, 6 App. Cas. 619, 30 W. R. Dig. 138.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think that this appeal must be allowed, though I feel there are strong arguments in favour of both sides. I am unable to agree with the view of the magistrate that a different rule has to be applied because the vessel was employed for what the magistrate terms commercial purposes, by which he means, I suppose, that she carried coal for the supply of his Majesty's ships. I do not think that there was anything commercial in that employment. The vessel was what may be called a coal tender, and was used solely as a tender taking coal to ships of the Navy. I do not understand why any distinction is to be drawn between the service of an ordinary ship of the Navy and the most useful, but less dignified, work which this vessel was performing. In my opinion, the vessel in question was clearly a King's ship, and therefore came within the exceptions defined by section 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. I think, therefore, that we have to consider whether the decision of the magistrate can be supported on one of two grounds, either that a King's ship is liable under the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act to pay the pilotage dues imposed by the bye-laws, or that the master of a King's ship, if he chooses to employ a pilot, is personally liable. I have come to the conclusion that the Bristol Pilotage Act is not sufficient to make the King's ship liable to pay pilotage dues on the scale contemplated by those bye-laws. It seems to me that, whatever may be the rights, duties, and obligations of pilots who are summoned to pilot the King's ships, it cannot be said, in the absence of express language, that there is a necessary implication that the public revenue, by petition of right, can be called upon to pay the scale of pilotage dues which have been imposed by the bye-laws. In my opinion the Bristol Pilotage Act and the Merchant Shipping Act combined are not sufficient to create a debt against the Crown in respect of pilotage services rendered. I have not overlooked the argument of Mr. Pickford, that this conclusion has the effect of depriving the Crown of certain rights under the Bristol Pilotage Act, but I agree with the view presented by the Attorney-General that the two questions are not necessarily dependent upon the same considerations. I think it is possible that the Crown may get the benefit of certain enactments by way of privilege, although it does not incur the obligations which would arise if the Crown were liable to other provisions.

Then as to the other point, that the master is liable because he, as master, has ordered the pilotage, I do not think that can be maintained. The master of a King's ship acts as master on behalf of the Crown; he is an agent in the ordinary sense of the word; and unless it can be clearly implied that the obligation to pay pilotage dues was to be a personal obligation on the master the argument goes too far. If the King's ships are not liable to pay dues under these bye laws, then one cannot find a contract based upon the statute to make the master personally liable; to do so would be an express contradiction of the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act which expressly exempts the Crown. The only way in which it could be suggested that any contract or obligation was created on the part of the master would be, as was indicated in Palmer v. Hutchinson, by showing grounds for alleging a contract on the part of the Crown which could be enforced by petition of right.

RUSHMER v. POLSUE & ALFIERI (LIMITED). (a.)

Nuisance—Noise—Crowded neighbourhood occupied by printing trade—Private resident—Injunction.

A trade not carried on in the particular and established manner of a district devoted to that trade principally, and causing serious disturbance to a resident in that district by making noises in excess of those made by carrying on the trade in the particular and established manner of the trade of the district constitutes a private and actionable wrong which may be restrained by injunction. There can be no prescriptive right to commit a nuisance constituting a private and actionable wrong.

In this case the defendants appealed from a judgment of Warrington, J.

The plaintiff carried on the business of a dairyman, and had for nearly twenty years occupied a house in the City of London in the midst of a district which was largely used by persons carrying on the business of printing. His business was carried on in the lower part of the house he occupied, and in the upper part of it he lived with his family.

The defendants some short time before this action was commenced set up a machine for printing in a house adjoining the plaintiff's premises, and up to that time the plaintiff had suffered no inconvenience or discomfort from noise, though the house was not as quiet as one which might be situated in a district more used for residential purposes.

After the defendants' coming the plaintiff was caused much annoyance from the machinery that had been set up, and thereafter sought relief by claiming an injunction restraining the defendant from working their machinery in such a manner as to cause annoyance to the plaintiff from noise.

Warrington, J., found as a fact that the defendants had so carried on their work during the night time as to amount to a legal nuisance entitling the plaintiff to an injunction, which he granted.

The defendants appealed.

Duke, K.C., F. Hinde, and G. H. Couch, for the appellants.—Warrington, J., stated the law correctly, but did not apply those principles properly, this appears from his findings of fact. He treated as serious an amount of noise which was not such according to the standard of a printing neighbourhood. A person living in a district specially devoted to a particular trade cannot complain of a noisy nuisance caused by the carrying on of a branch of that trade without carelessness and in a reasonable manner.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Coote, for the respondent.—Respondent is entitled to an injunction if the result of the appellants' printing operations at night in a house adjoining that of respondent, is to cause serious inconvenience to respondent and his family even though the locality is devoted to the printing trade, carried on by printers in a particular and established manner not constituting a public nuisance. Printing carried on in such a manner is an actionable wrong if it causes serious inconvenience to respondent and his family. Prescriptive rights alone could prevent such conduct of the appellants being actionable.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 14.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The principles applicable to the case were thus laid down by Warrington, J., in the earlier part of his judgment. "The question I have to answer is whether the defendants, by working the machine in question, seriously interfere with the comfort physically of the plaintiff and his family in the occupation of his house according to ordinary notions prevalent among reasonable English men and women: Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & S. 315, 322. And for the purpose of answering this question I am not to look at the defendants' operations in the abstract by themselves, but in connection with the circumstances of the locality and in particular to the nature of the trades usually carried on there, and the noises and disturbances existing prior to the commencement of the defendants' operations: Sturges v. Bridgman, 11 Ch. D. 852, 865; St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 13 W. R. 1,083, 11 H. L. C. 642. But if after taking these circumstances into consideration I find a serious and not a slight additional interference with the plaintiff's comfort as above defined, I think it is the duty of the court to interfere: Crump v. Lambert, 15 W. R. 417, L. R. 3 Eq. 409." It seems to me that these principles as expressed by Warrington, J., contain nothing which is not supported by the authorities cited by him. And I find nothing in these authorities which makes them inconsistent with one another, although Mr. Terrell, arguing on behalf of the plaintiff respondent, urged—and urged very strongly in argument, and told the court that he had urged the same argument before Warrington, J., that the case of Crump v. Lambert, would entitle the plaintiff to an injunction if the result of the defendants' printing operations at night in a house adjoining the plaintiff's residence was to cause serious inconvenience to the plaintiff and his family, even though the locality was devoted to the printing trade carried on by printers in a particular and established manner not constituting a public nuisance; and he argued that the printing so carried on in such a district, in such a locality, was an actionable wrong if it caused serious disturbance to the plaintiff and his family by reason of the printing machines being used on premises immediately adjoining the plaintiff's residence; and that prescriptive rights alone could prevent such conduct of the defendants' business constituting an actionable wrong. I do not think the case of Crump v. Lambert justified either part of this argument; and I further think that, if it did, it would be inconsistent with the judgmens of Lord Westbury and Lord Cranworth in St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping and the judgment of Thesiger, L.J., in Sturges v. Bridgman. Now, this appeal is based partly upon the judgment being against the weight of evidence, and partly on the ground that Warrington, J., having regard to the evidence, could not have properly applied the principles laid down in those cases. The learned judge, however, in the statement of facts at the beginning of his judgment, spoke of Gough-square as a small oblong space situate in the City of London, in the district bounded on the east by Shoe-lane, on the south by Fleet-street, on the west by Fetter-lane, and on the north by Holborn, and that it was a district specially devoted to printing and allied trades, and that there was no thoroughfare for wheeled traffic in Gough-square. The learned judge concluded this statement of facts by saying, "For a house in the heart of the City of London the plaintiff's is in a quiet situation, but for such noises as arise from neighbouring business establishments. Prior to the starting, in September, 1904, of the defendants' machinery there was no noise proceeding from the house which is No. 10, Wine Office-court. The house on the other (the west) side of the plaintiff's—viz., No. 7, Gough-square—had for some time been occupied by persons maintaining and working machinery; and I come to the conclusion on the evidence that in the day time the plaintiff must have been subjected to a noise from that source, but no noisy machinery had been worked at night in this house. Nearly opposite to the plaintiff's house was a large printing establishment, Messrs. Pardons, in which work on certain days of the week proceeded at night, and some distance further away were the printing works of the Daily Telegraph, which were run regularly at night. I find on the evidence, and particularly that of the plaintiff's two daughters, that no disturbance at night was caused by noise arising from these sources." It was urged upon us by Mr. Duke and Mr. Hinde, the counsel for the defendants, that, if one takes these findings of the judge in conjunction with the finding at the end of his judgment —that, as a fact, the night-work caused serious disturbance to the plaintiff and his family, and that such disturbance had not been previously experienced by them—it becomes apparent that, although the learned judge referred to the principles laid down in Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & S. 315, p. 322; Sturges v. Bridgman, 11 Ch. D. 852, 865; St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 13 W. R. 1,083, 11 H. L. C. 642; and Crump v. Lambert, 15 W. R. 417, L. R. 3 Eq. 409, as the principles governing his judgment, and that although the passages referred to, taken by themselves, may not be inconsistent with the judgment in this, yet, if those cases are examined, it would seem that the learned judge has not applied the principles established by these cases, and that this especially appears to be so if the findings at the end of the judgment in this case are read in connection with the evidence, and that if they are not so read those findings are contrary to the evidence. There are, in my opinion, considerable grounds for this conclusion. The findings of the learned judge are quite consistent with the view that the cases above referred to establish such principles that in an action for nuisance not alleged as a public nuisance the standard of comfort to be applied—when the tribunal dealing with the facts asks itself the question whether the acts done by the defendants constitute a material interference with the ordinary comfort, physically, of human existence—is the same in a district devoted to a trade carried on by traders in a particular and established manner as it would be outside such a district so devoted to a particular trade. To put it in another way, the findings of the learned judge and his judgment are consistent with his having taken the view that if a man lives in a district or street where there are numerous printing establishments, and a printing office is opened next door to him which is carried on in a district devoted to the printing trade in the particular and established manner of the printing trade of that district, he has ground for complaint and a cause of action for nuisance, because to him individually there may arise serious discomfort from the printing operations carried on next door in a house not previously used as a printing office, or in a house not previously used for night printing. This was the argument, in fact, presented to us by Mr. Terrell as counsel for the plaintiff, who contended that on this view the findings of the learned judge were amply established by the evidence, which clearly showed, in the language of Lord Romilly, in Crump v. Lambert, which he cited, that there was a material interference with the ordinary comfort of human existence. I may observe that I do not myself think that Lord Romilly meant by his decision to exclude the proposition of law that in a district or street devoted to trade a different standard of comfort should be applied when answering the question whether there had been a material interference with ordinary comfort in such a district from that which would otherwise be applied, for he says, at page 414, "the smoke at defendant's factory has produced a completely new state of things as regards the plaintiff's house and grounds"; but I cannot but see that these words are not inconsistent with the contention that, even in a district or street devoted to trade, if a new factory or printing-house is opened, subjecting the occupiers of some house in the district to discomfort interfering materially with human comfort, this is sufficient to constitute an actionable wrong, and that the words are consistent with the law, being that the defendant in such a case could not ask to have Lord Romilly's words, "ordinary comfort of human existence," qualified by the addition, "as enjoyed in this district devoted to a particular trade." But if Lord Romilly did mean this, it seems to me that his words are plainly inconsistent with these words of Lord Westbury in the St. Helens case (at p. 650): "If a man lives in a street where there are numerous shops and a shop is opened next door to him which is carried on in a fair and reasonable way, he has no ground for complaint because to himself individually there may arise much discomfort from the trade carried on in that shop. But when an occupation is carried on by one person in the neighbourhood of another, and the result of that trade, or occupation, or business is a material injury to property then there unquestionably arises a very different consideration. I think that in a case of that description the submission which is required from persons living in society to that amount of discomfort which may be necessary for the legitimate and free exercise of the trade of their neighbours would not apply to circumstances the immediate result of which is sensible injury to the value of the property"; and, further, that Lord Romilly's words are also inconsistent with the words of Lord Cranworth in the same case, at p. 653, when speaking of a case tried by him in the county of Durham as a Baron of the Exchequer. He says: "It was proved incontestably that smoke did come and in some degree interfere with a certain person; but I said, 'You must look at it not with a view to the question whether, abstractedly, that quantity of smoke was a nuisance, but whether it was a nuisance to a person residing in the town of Shields." The view that the standard of what freedom from smoke, smell, and noise a man may reasonably expect will vary with the locality in which he dwells seems to me confirmed by the following passage in Lord Halsbury's judgment in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, 53 W. R. 30, [1904] App. Cas. 179, 185: "A dweller in towns cannot expect to have as pure air, as free from smoke, smell, and noise as if he lived in the country and distant from other dwellings, and yet an excess of smoke, smell, and noise may give a cause of action; but in each of such cases it becomes a question of degree, and the question is in each case whether it amounts to a nuisance which will give a right of action." The view is confirmed also by the jugment of Lord Hardwicke in The Fishmongers' Company v. East India Company, 1 Dick. 163, cited by Lord Macnaghten and also by Lord Davey. It should also be observed that the present action is an action brought for a nuisance on the ground that the thing alleged to be a nuisance is productive of sensible personal discomfort, and not upon the ground that the alleged nuisance produces material injury to the plaintiff's property. And Lord Westbury in St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 13 W. R. 1083, 11 H. L. C. 650, draws a distinction between these cases, saying of the case where the thing alleged to be a nuisance is productive merely of personal inconvenience and interference with one's enjoyment, one's quiet, one's personal freedom, anything that discomposes or injuriously affects the senses or nerves, whether that may or may not be denominated a nuisance, must undoubtedly depend greatly upon the circumstances of the place where the thing complained of actually occurs. If a man lives in a town, it is necessary that he should subject himself to the consequences of those operations of trade which may be carried on in his immediate locality, and which are actually necessary for trade and commerce and also for the enjoyment of property and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town and of the public at large. These observations seem peculiarly applicable to the case of a plaintiff who carries on, in fact, the business of supplying milk to the persons employed in the very trade to which the district is devoted, and who gets compensation for the personal annoyance to which he is subjected when residing, for the convenience of his milk trade, in a district in which there are very few other residents. My brethren are, I believe, of opinion that the evidence in this case, and in particular the evidence of the expert called by the plaintiff and the evidence with reference to the noise made at night by the printing machines of the Daily Telegraph and of Messrs. Pardon, is not of such a character as to justify the conclusion that the learned judge, in his ultimate finding, in fact failed properly to apply the law as laid down in the House of Lords in St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, and in the Court of Appeal in Sturges v. Bridgman, and acted on a view of Lord Romilly's decision in Crump v. Lambert, inconsistent with those decisions. I do not think I ought to differ from this conclusion or inference of fact; and, accepting this conclusion, it would not be right to review the decision in fact of the judge who tried the case and saw and heard the witnesses. I think, however, that I ought to point out that, in my view, it would be inconsistent with the view expressed by Lord Westbury in St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, in the passages I have already read, and also inconsistent with the view expressed by Thesiger, L.J., in Sturges v. Bridgman, where he says: "Whether anything is a nuisance or not is a question to be determined, not merely by abstract consideration of the thing itself, but in reference to its circumstances; what would be a nuisance in Belgrave-square would not necessarily be so in Bermondsey, and where a locality is devoted to a particular trade or manufacture carried on by the traders or manufacturers in a particular and established manner not constituting a public nuisance, judges and juries would be justified in finding, and may be trusted to find, that the trade or manufacture so carried on is not a private or actionable wrong." It would be inconsistent, in my opinion, with the above-cited passages to hold that the fact that night work caused a serious disturbance to the plaintiff and his family, in a locality devoted to a particular trade carried on by the traders in a particular and established manner, constituted private and actionable wrong. Nor do I think that the fact that the noise of the defendant's printing machine was a substantial addition to pre-existing noises would amount to a legal nuisance, if such noise was only the result of carrying on the trade in the district devoted to that trade according to the particular and established manner. So to hold would, in my judgment, be to disregard the standard of comfort which a person living in such a district would have a right to expect; and, in effect, to hold, as Mr. Terrell argued, that the plaintiff in such circumstances would have suffered a private actionable wrong, unless the defendant could establish a prescriptive right, which I much doubt whether he could ever do in respect of a nuisance which he could not prevent, and therefore could not acquiesce in. I do not think, to use the words of Lord Westbury, that the plaintiff would have, in such a district, a good cause of action merely "because to himself individually there may arise much discomfort from the trade carried on" in the newly opened printing office. It may be, however, that Warrington, J., did not intend by his judgment anything to the contrary of this, and intended to find that the defendants' trade was not carried on in the particular and established manner of the printing district, but caused serious disturbances to the plaintiff and his family by making noises in excess of those made by carrying on the trade in the particular and established manner of the trade of the district. I should not myself have arrived at this conclusion on the evidence as it appears from reading the notes, but I agree that this is not a sufficient ground for reviewing the decision of the learned judge if he, in fact, applied the principles established by St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping and Sturges v. Bridgman. In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—The plaintiff in this action complains of a nuisance by noise, causing serious interference with the physical comfort of himself and his family. The plaintiff has been for the last seventeen or eighteen years, and still is, the occupier of a house, No. 8, Gough-square, situate in the City of London, in the heart of a district the buildings in which are, to a large extent, used for carrying on printing businesses. He himself carries on the business of a dairyman on the ground-floor of his house; the rest is occupied as a residence by himself and his family. Down to a time shortly before the commencement of this action no printing business was carried on in either of the houses which adjoin the plaintiff's, but recently the defendants have established printing works in No. 10, Wine Office-court, which is one of those adjoining houses, and Warrington, J., has held that these works are so carried on during the night (not by day) as to amount to a legal nuisance entitling the plaintiff to an injunction, which the learned judge has granted. From this decision the present appeal has been brought. The learned judge, at the commencement of his judgment, has stated the legal principles on which he proposed to act, and the learned counsel who appeared for the appellants admitted, and in my opinion rightly admitted, that no fault could be found with the law as laid down by his lordship. What they alleged was that the learned judge had failed to give due effect to the principles which he himself laid down. Warrington, J., said (among other things not necessary to be stated) that, for the purposes of his decision, he was not to look at the defendants' operations in the abstract and by themselves, but in connection with all the circumstances of the locality, and in particular with regard to the trades usually carried on there and the noises and disturbance existing prior to the commencement of the defendants' operations; but that if, after taking these circumstances into consideration, he found a serious and not merely a slight interference with the plaintiff's comfort, he thought it his duty to interfere. It is contended that the learned judge, in coming to the conclusion that a serious and not merely a slight interference had been caused by the defendants' operations, applied a wrong standard, and treated as serious an amount of noise which was not such according to the standard of a printing neighbourhood, though it might be serious according to the standard of a London West End square, or, still more so, of a quiet country neighbourhood. I am unable to see that this contention is well founded. What I understand the learned judge to have done is to consider, first, the noise and disturbance which existed at the commencement of the defendants' operations; and, secondly, the noise and disturbance caused by the defendants' operations themselves; and to have come to the conclusion that those noises and disturbances taken together create an amount of discomfort by night in excess of that which an ordinary person could reasonably be expected to put up with in a printing neighbourhood. Although he does not, in his final conclusions, use precisely the same language in his finding with respect to the night work as he does in his finding with respect to the day work, I think he meant to find that in one case he did not, while in the other he did, find such a substantial addition to pre-existing noises as amounted to a legal nuisance. And though he does not say in so many words that on both findings he bore in mind the circumstances of the locality, I, nevertheless, think that that also was his meaning. Having considered the evidence, I find myself unable to differ from the decision of Warrington, J., as I understand it, and, in my opinion, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Warrington, J., who has granted an injunction restraining the defendants from so working a printing machine as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has for seventeen years been residing with his family at 8, Gough-square, Fleet-street. In the lower part of the house he carries on a milk business. The defendants' machine is next door to the plaintiff's house. This is a district specially devoted to the printing and allied trades, most of which are noisy, though not all equally noisy. The district is one in which it is not reasonable to expect the same quiet and freedom from noise as might be looked for in more purely residential neighbourhoods. Warrington, J., has stated the legal principles which it was his duty to apply as follows. [His lordship then read the portion of the judgment of Warrington, J., that appears above.] In my opinion that is a statement of the law which is not only accurate, but adequate. He then proceeds to deal with the evidence. He does not leave us to infer the conclusions at which he has arrived, for he states certain definite findings of fact. The first is that, although in the daytime the plaintiff must have been subject to some noise from printing works in the immediate neighbourhood, no disturbance at night was caused by noise arising from any of these sources. He finds, secondly, that as regards ordinary working hours in the daytime the plaintiff had not proved such a substantial addition to pre-existing noises as would amount to a legal nuisance. He finds, thirdly, that the night working of the defendants' machine causes a serious disturbance to the plaintiff and his family such as had not previously been experienced by them, and he held this to be a legal nuisance entitling the plaintiff to an injunction. In my opinion it is not right for the Court of Appeal in a case like this to overrule the decision on issues of fact of a judge who has seen and heard the witnesses; and, this being so, I think the appeal must fail. I cannot doubt that the learned judge did apply the legal principles he himself enunciated, and I do not think we ought to embark upon the consideration of the question whether his mind may not have been influenced by some other legal view than that expressed by him, but some arguments were raised by counsel for the appellants and for the respondents to which I desire shortly to refer. It was strenuously contended by Mr. Duke that a person living in a district specially devoted to a particular trade cannot complain of any nuisance by noise caused by the carrying on of any branch of that trade without carelessness and in a reasonable manner. I cannot assent to this argument. A resident in such a neighbourhood must put up with a certain amount of noise. The standard of comfort differs according to the situation of the property and the class of people who inhabit it. This idea is expressed by Lord Thesiger, L.J., in Sturges v. Bridgman, when he said that what might be a nuisance in Belgrave-square would not be a nuisance in Whitechapel. But whatever the standard of comfort in a particular district may be, I think the addition of a fresh noise caused by the defendants' works may be so substantial as to create a legal nuisance. It does not follow that because I live, say, in the manufacturing part of Sheffield I cannot complain if a steam-hammer is introduced next door, and so worked as to render sleep at night almost impossible, although previously to its introduction my house was a reasonably comfortable abode, having regard to the local standard; and it would be no answer to say that the steam-hammer is of the most modern approved pattern and is reasonably worked. In short, if a substantial addition is found as a fact it is no answer to say that the neighbourhood is noisy, and that the defendants' machinery is of first-class character. It was, on the other hand, urged by Mr. Terrell that any kind of noise occasioning discomfort is actionable unless the defendant can prove a prescriptive right to create a noise. I do not think this argument can be supported, and I see no ground for supposing that Warrington, J., was influenced by it. The lower standard of comfort existing in Whitechapel would equally exist in one of the numerous districts which have sprung up in late years on the outskirts of the city, and which are occupied by persons of the same class as those who occupy the older houses in Whitechapel. In short, prescription has nothing to do with the case. In the result I accept Warrington, J.'s, findings of fact and his enunciation of legal principles, and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

MARCHIONESS OF HUNTLY v. GASKELL. (a.)

Practice—Pleading—Embarrassing endorsement of writ—Abuse of process of court—Striking out—Married woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Costs—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.

Where a writ is embarrassing because the endorsements thereon state claims wilfully framed in a manner that cannot be supported, that are not made in good faith, and that are intentionally too general, it is the proper course to strike out the writ altogether with its endorsements, but with leave to issue a fresh writ in proper form.

A married woman, who is the real plaintiff in an action, may, when her action is dismissed with costs, be ordered, under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), to pay costs, when taxed, out of property settled for her separate use without power of anticipation, but it is not necessary to appoint a receiver.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Kekewich, J. It appeared that the plaintiff, who was a daughter of Sir William Cunliffe Brooks, Bart., deceased, had commenced proceedings in the Scotch courts for a declaration that her father, the testator, was a domiciled Scotchman at the date of his death, and that she was for that reason entitled to legitim out of his personalty.

The Scotch courts decided that he was a domiciled Englishman at the time of his death, and the plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords, where the appeal is now pending.

The present action was brought against the trustees of the will of Sir William Cunliffe Brooks, and the writ, inter alia, claimed in its indorsements administration of the deceased's real and personal estate, a declaration that until plaintiff's claim for legitim was satisfied none of the deceased's assets should be disposed of; a declaration that plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the Scotch real estate on account of permanent improvements thereon.

These indorsements were considered by the defendants an abuse of the process of the court because the claims were not within the jurisdiction of the English courts, and it was held by Kekewich, J., that certain of the claims should be struck out as being embarrassing and an abuse of the court's process, and from this order the plaintiff appealed.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the appellants.—There is nothing frivolous and vexatious in an action, the object of which is to preserve plaintiffs' interests pending an appeal to the House of Lords. An action should not be stopped merely because it is embarassing. The plaintiffs are acting bonâ fide.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and C. G. Church, for respondents, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The judgment of Kekewich, J., was too lenient. When an indorsement is as vicious in the way this one is the court should, instead of striking out this and that portion, strike out the whole of the indorsement and leave plaintiff at liberty to issue a new writ wherein he shall state the claims on which he really relies. With respect to the claim for legitim, it is obvious that the right of legitim gives no specific right against real property, plaintiffs had no right to administration of the real estate and the claim was intentionally framed in a manner that could not be supported; in other paragraphs there are claims not made bonâ fide, since their basis is the Scotch right of legitim and are claims held unfounded by the Scotch courts; other indorsements disclose an intentional want of particularity and are embarassing because of their generality. In these circumstances, having regard to what has been deliberately done, we shall strike out the writ altogether and leave plaintiff at liberty to issue a new writ in which she may state her claims intelligibly, and not claims that cannot be supported. In substance, therefore, the judgment of Kekewich, J., will be affirmed, but the form of the remedy will be different, and the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J., was of the same opinion. The writ in its present form is an abuse of the process of the court.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It would be shocking if we were not at liberty to put a stop to a plain abuse of the court's process and an attempt to use that process for an illegitimate object. We should not tinker and amend the writ in the circumstances of this case. I think our proper course is to strike out the writ and leave plaintiff at liberty to commence an action claiming such relief as she may be advised, and in a form not open to such objections as in this action. The judgment of Kekewich, J., was right as far as it went.

Nov. 8.—Church, for the respondents, stated that under her father's will plaintiff had certain property settled to her separate use without power of anticipation. He asked that the costs when taxed should be paid out of her separate estate, notwithstanding the restraint, under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63).

He cited Pawley v. Pawley, 53 W. R. 375, [1905] 1 Ch. 593.

Ward Coldridge, for appellant.—Husband and wife are in this case co-plaintiffs. There is no authority for making such an order.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The section covers the case, and an order will be made for payment of the costs when taxed out of the plaintiffs' separate property but there will be no order for receiver.

Summons.

This was a summons to review taxation under the Solicitors Act, 1843, under the following circumstances:

Messrs. Grant, Bulcraig, & Co. had acted as solicitors for a Mr. Croft, and had delivered three bills of fees, charges, and disbursements amounting respectively to £110 3s. 8d., £16 13s. 10d., and £7 14s. 6d., a total of £134 12s.

A common order under the Solicitors Act, 1843, was obtained on the 8th of December, 1904, ordering the taxing-master to tax and settle these three bills, and containing the usual provision that if more than one-sixth were taxed off the bills the solicitors were to pay the costs of taxation, but if less than one-sixth were taxed off, then Mr. Croft was to pay the costs of taxation.

The taxing-master taxed off £22 4s. 6d., and in his certificate stated that he had taxed and settled the bills at £111 7s. 6d., and that this sum, as he had dealt with the bills, entitled the solicitors to the costs of taxation.

At the taxation three objections were taken by the solicitors representing Mr. Croft, and overruled by the taxing-master, any one of which, if allowed, would have caused the costs of the taxation to be paid by Messrs. Grant, Bulcraig, & Co. instead of by Mr. Croft:

1. An item of 3s. 4d. "for attending and drawing up order and copies" was admitted not to be chargeable, but had been allowed by the taxing-master because the solicitor on the same occasion might have charged 4s. 6d. for "notice of application and copies to file and service," but had not done so.

2. The bill of £7 14s. 6d. was discovered to be wrongly added, and had been allowed by the taxing-master to stand as if it had been originally delivered for a total amount of £6 14s. 6d.

3. An item of £5 for a deposit paid on the presentation of a bankruptcy petition was entered in the bill of costs, but was objected to on the ground that it ought to have appeared in the cash account and should be carried over to such account. It had been allowed by the master on the ground that it was a court fee and as a payment made by the solicitors in pursuance of their professional duty. This summons asked for the review of the taxing-master's decisions on these three points.

Ashton Cross, for the applicant, now asked for a reversal of all three decisions, objecting that the first two were outside the sphere of the master's discretion when taxing a bill, and that the third item was wrongly allowed, being of the nature of the payment in the case of In re Kingdon and Wilson, 50 W. R. 533, [1902] 2 Ch. 242, where it was decided that payments for estate duty should not be included in a bill of costs.

Cozens-Hardy, for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J., in a considered judgment, stated the above facts and continued: There is an unbroken line of authorities since the passing of the Act which establishes that, for the purposes of taxation under the Act, and the costs thereof, the solicitor is bound by the bill that he has delivered. In the case of In re Carven, 8 Beav. 436, Lord Langdale says that, "if a solicitor has delivered his bill, he is bound by it, and the taxation must be on that bill; he is not entitled as of course to reduce his demand or to reserve the power of delivering a bill containing other charges." Another general rule was recognized and approved by the Court of Appeal in In re Heather, 18 W. R. 1079, 5 Ch. App. 694; and again in In re Thompson, 34 W. R. 112, 30 Ch. D. 441, where Cotton, L.J., says, at p. 448: "Now it has been well established that, when a solicitor sends in his bill, he gives the client to whom he sends it a right to have that bill taxed. . . . The rule has been carried so far that even when objections have been made to particular items of a bill delivered, and the solicitors have, with the assent of the client, taken back the bill for the purpose of reconsideration, and have struck out certain items, the court has held that the bill to be taxed must be the bill as it was originally sent in and not the bill as amended." Nor has the taxing-master any power to add or strike out items; his functions, as defined by the order, are to tax and settle. To "tax" is to deal seriatim with each item by way of allowance or disallowance. To "settle" is finally to ascertain the amount (if any) recoverable. The only way in which the solicitor can add or strike out items, or increase amounts, is by special application to the court, as was done in In re Walters, 9 Beav. 299, and In re Whalley, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 91, 20 Beav. 587; but such alteration is not allowed to affect the costs of taxation of the original bill, it is merely to prevent the solicitor from losing charges which he is entitled to make, but has overlooked; in neither case is he allowed to diminish the amount of his charges. The reason for the rule is stated by Cotton, L.J., in In re Thompson: "it was laid down to prevent any attempt being made by solicitors to impose on clients, who did not know what the proper charges were, by sending in a bill which could not stand taxation and then, when taxation was insisted on or threatened, sending in a bill which they knew would stand taxation." The solicitor is treated strictly because he is dealing with his client in a matter in which the solicitor is an expert and the client is not, but the reasoning has no application to details which are not the subject of taxation and the accuracy of which the client is as well able to test as the solicitor; such matters become mere matters of evidence, and the taxing-master may allow the solicitor to correct blunders therein if, in his discretion, he thinks proper to do so. Thus, in Williams v. Barber, 4 Taunt. 806, it was held that a mistake in the dates (e.g., Trinity Vacation instead of Hilary) did not vitiate a bill so as to support a motion for a new trial on the ground that the plaintiff had not delivered a correct bill such as was required by the statute then in force. By parity of reasoning, I think that the taxing-master might tax an item although the date was wrongly given and might allow the error to be corrected if he finds that he can do so without injustice to the client. The principles that I have stated dispose of the first two items. The first is: "3s. 4d. for attending and drawing up order and copies." This is admittedly not chargeable at all; but the solicitor might have charge 4s. 6d., for notice of application and copies to file and service, and omitted to do so. The taxing-master, to quote his own words, "has left the 3s. 4d. item, which is not strictly chargeable, to cover the work done in respect of the above named." In other words, he has disallowed the item as charged and has altered the bill by substituting another item. In my opinion, he cannot do this, and the summons succeeds in respect of this 3s. 4d. The second item is an error in casting. The bill delivered is for £7 14s. 6d., but the items amount only to £6 14s. 6d. The taxing-master has c rrected the casting, and I am of opinion that he was right in so doing. This is not taxation, but arithmetic, and the client was as competent to add up a row of figures as the solicitor. It is objected that the order mentions £7 14s. 6d. as the amount of the bill to be taxed, but this is only for the purpose of identifying the bill. If necessary, I should have no difficulty in amending this error under the slip order. The last item is £5, the deposit paid under rule 147 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1896. It was contended on the authority of In re Buckwell, 50 W. R. 629, [1902] 2 Ch. 596, and In re Kingdon, 50 W. R. 533, [1902] 2 Ch. 242, that this sum ought to have been included in the solicitors' cash account and not in the bill of costs. The taxing-master disallowed the objection, and there was a dispute before on the question whether he had stated that it was the settled practice to insert such deposit in the bill of costs, although this is not the reason given for his decision. I accordingly reserved my judgment in order that I might communicate with the senior taxing-master, because, in matters of this sort where no principle of justice is involved, I should be slow to disturb the settled practice, even although such practice should appear inconsistent with decisions in cases that appear analogous. The taxing-master informs me, after inquiry amongst his brother taxing-masters, that there is no settled practice in the Chancery Taxing Office, but he refers me to rule 112 (1) of the Bankruptcy Rules and the scale of costs thereunder, and I find in the latter (set out in Williams on Bankruptcy (6th ed.), p. 563) the following: "Attending official receiver with deposit, 6s. 8d. The amount of the deposit is to be charged in the petitioning creditor's bill of costs." I hold, therefore, that this £5 was rightly inserted in the bill of costs and that the client's objection thereto fails. The result is that the applicant succeeds on the 3s. 4d. and fails on the £1 and the £5—i.e., he succeeds on one and fails in two of his three objections. I accordingly give him one-third and order him to pay two-thirds of the costs of this application. In other words, there will be a set-off of the costs, and he will pay the solicitors one-third of the costs of this application.

In re WALBRAN, DECEASED.
MILNER v. WALBRAN. (a.)

Will—Construction—Bequest between the children of A. and B.

By her will the testatrix gave a moiety of certain property to be equally divided between the children of F. M., now of Leeds, and J. C., of New York, or their heirs. Both F. M. and J. C. were nephews of the husband of the testatrix, and were both alive and had children living at the death of testatrix, but F. M. had not then been for some years living with his family.

Held, that the gift was to the children of F. M. and to J. C. personally, and that the division was to be into moieties, one moiety going to the children of F. M. and the other moiety going to J. C.

Adjourned summons.

The testatrix, Jane Walbran, by her will dated the 26th of September, 1903, after appointing the plaintiffs to be the executors and trustees thereof, made this devise: "And I declare that they (the trustees) shall sell all my messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, situate at or near Fellbeck, Pateley Bridge, Yorks, and after paying all expenses of duties shall divide the proceeds into two parts. One equal part I leave to John Thomas Walbran, now of Dallas-road, Victoria, B.C., and the other equal part to be equally divided between the children of Francis Maximilian Walbran, now or late of 9, Marlborough-grove, Leeds, and James Christopher Walbran, 420, Ninth-street, South Brooklyn, New York, or their heirs."

The testatrix died on the 26th of June, 1904, and her will was duly proved by the executors.

The said John T. Walbran, Francis Maximilian Walbran, and James Christopher Walbran were nephews of the late husband of the testatrix, J. T. Walbran and J. C. Walbran being brothers.

Both F. M. Walbran and J. C. Walbran had children living at the date of the death of the testatrix, but F. M. Walbran had not been living with his wife and children for the last five years.

This summons was taken out by the executors of the testatrix to determine whether upon the true construction of the said will the moiety of the net proceeds of sale of the textatrix's hereditaments at or near Fellbeck, Pateley Bridge, Yorks, which the textatrix directed to be equally divided between the children of Francis Maximilian Walbran and James Christopher Walbran or their heirs, was divisible (a) between the defendant James C. Walbran and children of the said Francis Maximilian Walbran in equal shares per capita, or (b) between the defendant J. C. Walbran and the children of the said F. M. Walbran, the defendant J. C. Walbran taking one-half thereof and the children of the said F. M. Walbran taking the other half equally between them, or (c) between the children of the defendant J. C. Walbran and the children of the said F. M. Walbran in equal shares per capita, or (d) between the children of the defendant J. C. Walbran and children of the said F. M. Walbran, the children of the defendant J. C. Walbran taking one half thereof equally between them and the children of the said F. M. Walbran taking the other half thereof equally between them, or to determine in what other manner the said moiety was divisible.

R. M. Pattisson, for the summons.—To ascertain the meaning of the will the circumstances of each case must be looked at, also the position in which the parties were placed: Stummvoll v. Hales, (1864) 12 W. R. 1137, 34 Beav. 124.

Mark Romer, for the defendant James Christopher Walbran.—The first question is whether upon the construction of the will J. C. Walbran takes a share, or whether only his children are entitled to take the share. To enable the children to take the word "of" should have been used or it must be understood: In re Featherstone's Trusts, (1882) 31 W. R. 89, 22 Ch. D. 111. In order to override this grammatical construction there must be a very strong intention to that effect manifested in the will, which is entirely absent in the present case, and therefore it is submitted that only J. C. Walbran takes a share, and that his children have no interest in the share. This is a gift to the children of A. and to B. rather than a gift to the children of A. and to the children of B. Upon the question as to whether the division should be per capita or per stirpes the word "between" strictly construed imports a division in equal shares as between two parties only, and therefore it is submitted that the division ought to be per stirpes and not per capita.

Younger, K.C., and Goldberg, for the children of Francis Maximilian Walbran.—The parties entitled to take are the children of Francis Maximilian and J. C. Walbran, and the division should be per capita. This is in accordance with the plain grammatical sense of the words as they stand: Hawes v. Hawes, (1880) 14 Ch. D. 614, 28 W. R. Dig. 197. It was expressly decided by Kay, J., in In re Featherstone's Trusts, upon the proper grammatical construction of the words used, a bequest to children of A. and B., that it would be necessary to insert the word "of" in order to enable the children of B. to take, and he so decided after his attention had been called to the opinion expressed by Mr. Vaughan Hawkins in his book on Wills, which opinion was against this view. The grammatical construction ought to be followed unless there is something in the will to lead the court to come to a different conclusion. Upon the question as to whether the division should be per capita or per stirpes, all the authorities are in favour of a division per capita. In Dowding v. Smith, (1841) 3 Beav. 541, where there was a bequest to A. and to the children of B., to be equally divided, it was held that the children took per capita. The word "between" was absent in that case.

T. R. Hughes, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the children of James Christopher Walbran.—Upon the true construction of the gift the children of James Christopher take and not James Christopher himself. Primâ facie the gift is for an equal division between the children of Francis Maximilian and the children of James Christopher, who were in the same degree of relationship to the testatrix. Whether the father or the children take, the division should be per stirpes and not per capita. The more strict way of construing this bequest would be to insert the word "of." One very important circumstance to be taken into account is whether A. and B., the two donees of the gift, were in the same degree of relationship to the testatrix. In Mason v. Baker, (1856) 2 K. & J. 567, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 112, where the bequest was to all the children of my brother R. and my sister M to be equally divided between them share and share alike, it was held by Wood, V.C., that the gift was to the children of R. and the children of M. in equal shares, as there was nothing from which an intention that M. was to take an equal share with the children of R. could be inferred. In Lugar v. Harman, (1786) 1 Cox 250, a bequest amongst all the children of my late cousin E. L. and my cousin P. F. and their lawful representatives was held to be a bequest to the children of E. L. and to P. F. himself, and not to the children of of P. F. But this case was disregarded by Romilly, M.R., in the case of In re Davies' Will, (1860) 9 W. R. 134, 7 Jur. N. S. 110, 29 Beav. 93, and he held that a gift of residue between and amongst all and every the child and children of A. deceased and B. in equal shares and proportions, was a gift to the children of A. and the children of B. in esse at the testator's death per capita. [JOYCE, J.—As it is not a question of technical terms, how can these cases help in deciding the present case.] Only to show how other judges have regarded it. Hawes v. Hawes was a very plain case and it was impossible that it should have been decided otherwise than it was. In the present case there is no reason for putting James Christopher upon the same footing as the children of Francis Maximilian. In Dicker v. Mitford, (1782) 3 Brown's Ca. in Par. 442, a testator gave the whole of his fortune to be equally divided between any second or younger son of his brother J. W. and his sister S. The sister had a younger son, but the brother had none, and it was held that the younger son of the sister was entitled to the whole. There it was otherwise shewn that the testator meant the children of both. It is an instance of a document drawn up in the common form of speech. Lord Eldon in Lady Lincoln v. Pelham, (1804) 10 Vesey, at p. 176, said that a bequest to the younger children of A. and to the younger children of B. meant the same exactly as a bequest to the younger children of A. and B. This dictum was cited and followed in Fletcher v. Fletcher, L. R. Ir. 9 Ch. D. 301.

M. Romer, in reply on the question of the admissibility of extrinsic evidence to enable the court to construe a difficult will where the words themselves required no interpretation, but the difficulty was only in the construction of the sentence in which the words occur, referred to the dissentient judgment of Rigby, L.J., in In re Grainger, Dawson v. Higgins, 48 W. R., at p. 674, [1900] 2 Ch., at p. 763, which was cited with approval by Lord Davey in Higgins v. Dawson, 50 W. R. 337, [1902] A. C. 1. Rigby, L.J., decided that the will must be construed without the aid of extrinsic evidence. In all the cases in which the courts have decided in favour of the children taking there has been some indication of intention in the will which the courts have laid hold of.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18.—JOYCE, J.—In this case the testatrix by her will gave a portion of her estate to be equally divided between the children of Francis Maximilian Walbran, now or late of 9, Marlborough-grove, Leeds, and Charles Christopher Walbran, of 420, Ninth-street, South Brooklyn, New York, or their heirs.

Now, if it is to be determined what is the effect of a gift to A. or B., you must know who A. and B. are: see the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in In re Sibley's Trusts, (1877) 5 Ch. D. 494, 25 W. R. Dig. 317. In order to determine the effect of a gift to the children of A. and B. you must know something about A. and B. In the first place, notwithstanding what may have been said or may hereafter be said to the contrary, I cannot doubt that the proper grammatical reading of the expression "children of A. and B.," the preposition not being repeated before B., and A. and B. not having or being capable of having children together, is the children of A. and the individual B., not his or her (viz., B.'s) children. But the expression "the children of A. and B." may mean the children of A. and the children B., and in a will it must have that meaning if B. to the knowledge of the testator be dead, leaving children still alive.

In the present case A. and B. were both living. Each is a nephew of the testatrix, but A.—that is, Francis, had deserted, or at all events was living apart from his family. On the other hand, no reason is suggested by the testratrix to pass over B.—that is, James, in favour of his children. I hold the division to be between James, not his children, and the children of Francis. Now as to the mode of division. The gift is not to the children of A. and B as tenants in common or in equal shares, but it is to be equally divided. Something is given to be equally divided between the children of A. and B. In strictness the word "between," as its etymology suggests, when it is a matter of dividing, implies a division into two parts rather than more, and when you consider the nature of the gift in this case I think it would be very strange to make a class of one nephew and the children of another and divide among them in equal shares. Upon the whole I think that the testatrix intended, and the will expressed, that the division should be into moieties, the one moiety going to the children of Francis and the other moiety going to James.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. SCHEVZIK. (a.)

London—Structure—Projection beyond general line of buildings—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 22; s. 73, sub-section 8.

An iron framework affixed to the front wall of a building by means of bolts and stay rods, was filled in on the front and sides with leaded glass, and covered on the top with zinc, came forward about 4 feet 6 inches from the front wall of the building, the bottom being about 11 feet above the pavement.

Held, that the iron framework was not a "building structure" within the meaning of section 22, sub-section 1, of the London Building Act, 1894, and following Hull v. London County Council, 49 W. R. 396, [1901] 1 K. B. 580, that it was not a "projection" within section 73, sub-section 8, of that Act.

Case stated.

On the 2nd of June, 1904, the respondent appeared to answer two informations which had been laid against him by Thomas Chilvers on behalf of the

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

London County Council. The first of the informations charged that the respondent on or about the 21st of December, 1903, at No. 86A, Brick-lane, in the Metropolitan Borough of Stepney, and within the Metropolitan Police District, did unlawfully erect a structure in contravention of Part III. of the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.)—to wit, a structure beyond the general line of buildings of a street called Brick-lane aforesaid—without the consent in writing of the appellants, whereby the respondent became liable to the penalty prescribed by section 200, sub-section 3, of the said Act as amended by the London Building Act, 1894 (Amendment) Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 137), and to have an order made against him to demolish the said structure. The second information charged that the respondent at the time and place above mentioned did unlawfully extend from a building a projection beyond the general line of buildings in the street aforesaid without the permission of the appellants contrary to section 73 (8) of the London Building Act, 1894.

The two informations were heard together, and the following facts were either proved or admitted.

The respondent is the proprietor of the premises situate at 86A, Brick-lane aforesaid, and known as the Russian Vapour Baths, and he had caused to be placed over the doorway leading to the said baths the thing complained of which is hereinafter referred to as the alleged structure or projection.

The alleged structure or projection consisted of an iron framework filled in on the front and sides with leaded glass and covered over on the top with zinc, and was about 10 feet, 6 inches long, about 5 feet, 6 inches high from the bottom to the top of the gable, and came forward about 4 feet 9 inches from the front wall of the building, the bottom being about 11 feet above the pavement. There were letters on the glass of the said alleged structure or projection forming on the front the words "The Russian Vapour Baths," and on the side "Vapour Baths," indicating the position of the baths, and these were made visible at night by means of about twenty electric lights arranged inside.

The alleged structure or projection was beyond the general line of buildings as defined by the superintending architect, and was erected without the consent in writing of the appellants.

The alleged structure or projection was fixed to the front wall of the said building by means of six bolts at the bottom and two stay rods at the top, which latter went right through the said wall.

The appellants contended that the respondent had erected and brought forward a structure in contravention of the provisions of Part III. of the London Building Act, 1894, and that he had also extended a projection from the said building in contravention of section 73 (8) of the said Act.

The respondent contended that the alleged structure or projection was neither a structure nor a projection within the meaning of the sections above referred to.

Upon the above facts the magistrate came to the conclusion that the alleged structure or projection was not a structure within the meaning of Part III. of the London Building Act, 1894, nor was it ejusdem generis with any of the matters or things described or referred to in Part III., nor was it a projection within the meaning of section 73 (8) of the said Act, nor ejusdem generis with any of the matters or things described or referred to in any part of that section.

The magistrate dismissed both the informations.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above facts the magistrate was right in law in dismissing the informations or either of them.

By the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 22, sub-section 1: "No building or structure shall, without the consent in writing of the council, be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street."

Section 73, sub-section 8: "Except in so far as is permitted by this section in the case of shop-fronts and projecting windows, and with the exception of water pipes and their appurtenances, copings, stairs, courses, cornices, facias, and other like architectural decoration, no projection from any building shall extend beyond the general line of buildings on any street except with the permission of the council after consulting the local authority."

Avory, K.C., and Daldy, for the appellants.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Randolph, for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

The following cases were cited in argument: Hull v. London County Council, 49 W. R. 396, [1901] 1 K. B. 580; Coburg Hotel v. London County Council, 16 Times L. R. 9, 63 J. P. 805, 48 W. R. Dig. 120; London County Council v. Illuminated Advertisements Co, 53 W. R. 220, [1904] 2 K. B. 886.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We are all of opinion that this structure does not come within section 22 of the Act, and I only refer to my observations in London County Council v. Illuminated Advertisements Co. with regard to the sections following section 22 to indicate that in my opinion section 22 is a building section, and that it does not extend to or include things which are added on to buildings. It is not necessary to say more on this part of the case, except that there is no finding of fact in this case which would bring this structure within the decision in Cobury Hotel v. London County Council. With regard to the second question in the case, which turns on section 73, sub-section 8, speaking for myself only, I do not withdraw anything which I have said as to not being satisfied with the decision in Hull v. London County Council, but the reasoning of that case (and the judgment was delivered after consideration) undoubtedly applies to this case. I think the principle of Hull v. London County Council is that section 73 forms part of a group of sections which deal with the question of the construction of buildings. I do not refer again to all the sub-sections of section 73, I will only point out that the section deals with such things as balconies, verandahs, outside steps, barge boards, cornices, pipes, shop fronts, copings. Therefore I think, looking at the section it is easy to see that at any rate there is a ground for contending that the view which was the view of Bruce and Phillimore, JJ., in that case was the right one, though I should have been better pleased had the matter been looked at from rather a broader standpoint. I come clearly to the opinion that this is a projection from the building, and I think that ought to be distinctly stated. I think that no one can look at this thing without seeing that it is a projection from the building; but if my brother Bruce is right, a mere projection from a building is not of itself sufficient, and this argument is strengthened by the fact that there are a considerable number of undoubted projections which, either adopting the reasoning of my brother Bruce or accepting the views suggested, I particularly call attention to those very heavy lamps which are hung on big brackets and are as rigidly fixed to the walls as this is, and which, on the reasoning of my brother Bruce, and possibly on the view taken or presented in argument, do not come within this section. Speaking for myself, I do not accept the argument that the London County Council could not deal with such things under section 164. I quite understand

Mr Avory's point, that under section 164 there is only power to make bye-laws regulate them, but it seems to me by no means to follow that under that power there may not be bye-laws providing that their structure and method of erection and fastening and matters of that sort shall be subject to the approval of the London County Council. Be that as it may I do not think the matter has been left absolutely at large by the Legislature. I think there are other sections in that Act which apply to it. It is important also to remember that this is primâ facie a building Act, and therefore we should expect to find in such sections as sections 22 and 73 provisions with regard to buildings. It seems to me that, looked at fairly, this obstruction is in the nature of a hanging porch fastened to the wall of the building, and I am of opinion that it undoubtedly projects from the building, but that it does not project from the building in the sense of section 73 as construed by the court in the case of Hall v. London County Council, although I should have been better pleased if the decision in that case had dealt with the question on broader lines as indicated in London County Council v. Illuminated Advertisements Co. I cannot see any distinction or ground upon which I ought to distinguish this case from Hull v. London County Council. I only desire to say, coming to that conclusion, that there is an important matter which I have mentioned more than once since I have been sitting in this court, and I refer to it again because of its extreme importance, and that is the importance of uniformity in the decisions of this court. The Court of Appeal have recently recognized that it is in the public interest, and in order that people may know with certainty what their position is, that courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction should follow their decisions unless there are strong grounds which enable the courts to say that the previous decisions should not be followed. I have no doubt that the matter can so be arranged that these cases can be reviewed by the Court of Appeal. There is no difficulty about that being done if it is really desired to take the matter further. But failing that, as I cannot on any ground satisfactory to my own mind distinguish the principle of this case from the principle of Hull v. London County Council, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I have come to the conclusion that Hall v. London County Council was rightly decided. It seems to me, looking carefully at the Act, that the language of section 73 does not cover the structure, if I may call it so, which we are considering in this case. I think section 102 in Part IX. contains the true definition of this particular sort of a thing affixed to a building. That section says "the expression 'structure' includes any building, wall, or other structure, or anything affixed or projecting from any wall or other structure." That is exactly what this is—not a part of the building, but something affixed to and projecting from a building, wall, or other structure. If that language had been used in section 73 I should have come to the conclusion that Hall v. London County Council had been wrongly decided. The matter may also be dealt with, I think, under section 164. How far it may be dealt with under that section it is not necessary to decide at the present moment, but power is given to make bye-laws for the regulation of lamps, signs, and other structures overhanging the public highway, so that in two parts of the statute you have this very structure itself, this projection, dealt with; but in section 73 it is not, in my opinion, dealt with. That leads me to the conclusion that Hall v. London County Council was rightly decided, and I am willing to follow it in this decision. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case I agree with the court, but I must say that, speaking personally, I should have come to the conclusion that this structure is a projection extending from the building within the meaning of section 73. I do not think that it is a building connected with part of the building itself, and therefore it is not within that part of the judgment which I gave in Coburg Hotel v. London County Council, but I should have thought it was a projection. I agree that according to section 73 there has to be something of a permanent character—something permanently attached to the building, something which is not merely to be regarded as temporarily put there; not of a light character which, to use the words of Hull v. London County Council, does not extend over the roadway. But when a permanently constructed framework like the present one is attached to a building in the way this one is attached I should have thought that it was a projection within the meaning of section 73, and that we ought so to regard it. I am therefore hampered in the present instance by the previous decision in Hull v. London County Council. If that case is to be taken to apply to a projection like the present, I think it is wrong. I should certainly have come to the contrary conclusion myself, but I follow what the Lord Chief Justice says, and I consider myself bound by that case. Before, however, I conclude what I have to say I wish to point out that in that case I cannot help thinking the court was more or less influenced, in coming to the conclusion at which they arrived, by considering the way in which the sign or wooden box was attached to the wall, and by the fact that there was a space between it and the wall and that it did not extend at all over the highway, and generally the small and insignificant character of that which was the subject of the case. If the reasoning of Bruce, J., is considered, it will be seen that he said: "A projection from a building means a part of a building projecting or jutting out; it means a prominence extending from the building in the sense of coming out from the building as part of the building." Now, I think that in the general sense of these words this framework does so. "If the words are taken in this sense they fall in with the scope of the section. It is quite clear that the object of the section is to preserve the width of the street and the general line of building frontage in order to preserve uniformity." In the case with which Bruce, J., was dealing, I do not think anyone could have said that the wooden box did interfere with the width of the street or the general line of building frontage, nor had it anything to do with the maintenance of architectural uniformity, but when one finds a framework of this kind which projects solidly and for a considerable distance over the highway, on which the public are accustomed to walk, it seems to me that, if one is to judge of the proper meaning of this section by considering what the object of it was, this was within the object of the section, while the other was not. It is easy enough when dealing with a small matter such as a lamp might be, or as the box was in Hull v. London County Council, to deal with that under section 164. The power to regulate it is sufficient. But when you have a structure like this, and I do not use the word structure advisedly—I mean a framework of a heavy kind projecting from a building, as this was—then it appears to me that a different set of considerations arise. More than a regulation is required; a power is wanted which will enable one to do that which section 73 does enable the London County Council to do with regard to architectural projections.

However, although that is my view, I am unable to say that what I have been pointing out as possibly the reason which actuated the court in the case of Hull v. London County Council is really the distinction between the two cases. I do not pretend to say that it is. I think I must adopt the reasoning in Hull v. London County Council, and agree with the rest of the court; but I should, if I had been left to myself, and without decision, have come to the conclusion that this structure could have been dealt with as a projection under section 73.

Bankruptcy—Payment to creditor after petition—Protected transaction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 49.

A payment made by a debtor before receiving order to one of his creditors in good faith and for valuable consideration, and taken by the creditor without notice of any available act of bankruptcy, is a protected transaction within section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, even though made after the presentation of a petition against the debtor.

In re Badham, Ex parte Palmer, 10 Morr. 252, distinguished.

Motion to set aside a deed of assignment executed by the bankrupts after the presentation of the petition.

In November, 1904, Dunkley & Son, the bankrupts, applied to the Inland Revenue authorities for the return of income tax overpaid by them, and on the 23rd of November an order was made for payment to them of the sum of £117 16s. 9d. On the 28th of November they committed an act of bankruptcy by noncompliance with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice, and on the 1st of December a petition was presented against them. On the 5th of December they executed an assignment of the money due to them from the Inland Revenue to a creditor named Crane as security for a past debt. They had no intention of preferring Crane, and Crane had no knowledge of the petition or of the act of bankruptcy at the time when the assignment was executed. A receiving order was made against Dunkley & Son on the 10th of December, they were adjudicated bankrupts and a trustee was appointed on the 22nd of December. The trustee now moved to set aside the assignment.

July 17.—Hansell, for the motion.—The assignment is bad because it was made after presentation of the petition, and a creditor cannot then get security for a past debt even without notice of an act of bankruptcy, because the property has ceased to be the debtor's. It is true that the assignment cannot be a fraudulent preference within section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, because it was made after the petition had been presented, nevertheless the creditor is not protected by section 49 because he has been paid out of moneys of the trustee: In re Badham, Ex parte Palmer, 10 Morr. 252.

Herbert Smith, for the respondent.—In that case there was fraudulent preference which is not suggested in the present case. An assignment made by a bankrupt after act of bankruptcy was held good in In re Seaman, Ex parte Furness Finance Co., 44 W. R. 496, [1896] 1 Q. B. 412.

Hansell, in reply.—A creditor who is unsecured at the date of the act of bankruptcy cannot get a valid security after that event.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 1.—BIGHAM, J.—On the 28th of November, 1904, the debtors committed an act of bankruptcy. On the 5th of December they assigned to one of their creditors named Crane a debt to secure £76 owing to Crane, and Crane gave notice of the assignment. On the 10th of December a receiving order was made against the debtors on a petition which had been presented on the 1st of December, and on the 22nd of December they were adjudicated bankrupt. The question is whether the assignment is good as against the trustee. I think it is. The title of the trustee no doubt related back to the date of the act of bankruptcy committed on the 28th of November, and thus, primâ facie, the assigned debt forms part of the estate which vests in the trustee. But the effect of section 49 of the Act has to be taken into consideration. That section protects a transaction such as the one in question, provided it takes place before the date of the receiving order and the person entering into it has not at the time notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt. The assignment of the debt to Crane did take place before the date of the receiving order, and it is not suggested that Crane had notice of any act of bankruptcy. In these circumstances it appears to me that section 49 applies, and that therefore Crane has a good title as against the trustee. It was argued, however, on behalf of the trustee, that the case was governed by the decision in In re Badham, Ex parte Palmer. In that case the trustee sought to invalidate two payments made by the bankrupt on the ground that the bankrupt when making the payments intended to prefer the creditors to whom the payments were made. There was no doubt that the bankrupt had that intention; but inasmuch as the petition had been presented before (not after) the date of the payments, the learned judge was constrained to find that the section dealing with fraudulent preference (section 48) did not apply. He then, however, allowed the notice of motion to be amended by striking out the claim to invalidate the payments on the ground of fraudulent preference, and by substituting an allegation that they were made contrary to the policy of the bankruptcy laws. On this amended motion the question arose whether the payments were not protected by section 49. They were certainly made before the date of the receiving order, and the payees equally certainly had no notice of any available act of bankruptcy, but the learned judge held that the payments were not made in good faith, that they were contrary to the policy of the bankruptcy law, that they amounted in effect to a common law fraud, and that therefore section 49 did not apply. I do not know on what grounds these conclusions were arrived at, but of course I am bound by the judgment, and I am certainly anxious to give effect to it. It is, however, distinguishable in its facts from the present case. Here the assignment of the debt to Crane was not, in my opinion, made in bad faith. It was no doubt made after petition, but it does not therefore follow that it was made in bad faith; if it did so follow, then no transaction entered into after petition and before receiving order would be within section 49. The preference given by the bankrupts to Crane was perfectly good at common law, and it is not suggested that it was fraudulent under section 48; and not being tainted with bad faith, as appears to have been the case in In re Badham, I see no reason why the creditor should not have the benefit of the protection afforded by section 49.

CROSFIELD & SONS (LIMITED) AND OTHERS v. MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL CO. (b.)

Arbitration—Jurisdiction—Private Acts—Corporation and traders—Argument—Waiver—Practice—Manchester Ship Canal Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. clxxxviii.), ss 88, 202—Manchester Ship Canal Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. clxxxii.), s. 43.

Under the Manchester Ship Canal Acts, 1885 and 1896, the Corporation of Warrington must resort to arbitration as provided by the Acts for the adjustment of differences between the corporation and the canal company, but the traders therein referred to may take proceedings in the courts in the usual way.

This was an appeal from an order (52 W. R. 635, [1904] 2 Ch. 127), of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.; Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissenting), where the case and the various sections of the Acts are set out at length.

The appellants (the plaintiffs in the action) were Crosfield & Sons, Fairclough & Sons, and Monks Hall & Co., traders and manufacturers carrying on business at or near Warrington, and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Warrington.

The respondent company was the Manchester Ship Canal Co.

The question of competency was alone argued and the various provisions of the Acts are dealt with in their lordships' judgments.

By an agreement made on the 9th of April, 1896, between the corporation of Warrington and the company, after reciting that disputes and differences had arisen between the corporation and the company in connection with the dredging, and that for the purpose of settling such disputes and differences the corporation and the company had agreed to enter into and execute the agreement now being stated, and also reciting that the traders and manufacturers and other persons then or thereafter carrying on business at or near Warrington were entitled to use portions of the canal and River Mersey and the lock and works at Walton on the terms and conditions therein referred to, and that the corporation and the company had agreed to alter those terms and conditions as thereinafter mentioned, it was provided, amongst other things, as follows:—

Clause 1: "Sub-section 14 of section 88 shall for the purposes of this agreement be read and have effect as if the same were in the words following (that is to say): (a) The company shall forthwith at their own cost dredge the bed and banks of the River Mersey (meaning thereby a channel in and along the River Mersey having a minimum width of fifty feet at the bottom) and for ever after maintain the same dredged so that at all times there shall be a depth of eight feet of water at low water of spring tides in the said channel between the western boundary of the works of Monks Hall & Co. (Limited) at or near Bank Quay and Howley Lock. The portion of the old bed of the River Mersey between the westerly end of the river diversion and Walton Lock (which portion of the River Mersey is shewn on the plan hereunto annexed and therein coloured blue) is admitted and agreed to be a portion of the River Mersey within the limits aforesaid."

Clause 4: "The company bind themselves effectually to execute and complete at their own cost the several dredging and other works prescribed by this agreement."

Clause 5: "All penalties (if any) incurred by the company to the corporation under or by virtue of the said agreement of the 12th day of December, 1893, are hereby absolutely waived and released."

Clause 6: "If and whenever the company shall fail to maintain the channel referred to in the first clause of these presents and navigation is thereby obstructed then and in each such case the traders and manufacturers carrying on business at Warrington shall have the right of navigation in respect of vessels passing through the Walton Lock of the portion of the Manchester Ship Canal extending from Eastham to the Walton Lock and of the portion of the River Mersey within the limits described in clause 1 (a) of this agreement free of all tolls and dues until the aforesaid channel shall have been made and completed to the reasonable satisfaction of the surveyor for the time being of the corporation. Provided always that no such trader or manufacturer as aforesaid shall be entitled to the right of navigation referred to in this clause if the company immediately on the receipt of a written notice from the surveyor for the time being of the corporation certifying the fact of such obstruction and its position and extent commence to dredge and continue to dredge the aforesaid channel to the reasonable satisfaction of the surveyor for the time being of the corporation."

Clause 7: "Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained it is hereby declared and agreed that if the company fail to fulfil any of the provisions of this agreement and shall not within six months after receiving notice in writing from the corporation comply with such notice and fulfil the provisions of this agreement then upon any such event the rights, powers, and privileges of the corporation and of the said traders and manufacturers under the Act of 1885 (except sub-section 6 of section 88) shall thereupon revive and have full force and effect notwithstanding this agreement or the said agreement of the 12th day of December, 1893, and as if such agreements had never been executed.

Clause 8: "If and whenever the company shall neglect or fail to maintain the channel referred to in the first clause of these presents and the corporation shall give to the company a written notice specifying the obstruction to such channel and its nature and extent then and in any such case and so often as the same shall happen upon the expiration of six calendar months after the time of giving such notice the corporation may if they think fit remove such obstruction and the company shall thereupon pay to the corporation the costs reasonably incurred by them in effecting the removal of such obstruction: Provided always that if and whenever the corporation elect to avail themselves of the power hereby conferred upon them the operation of clause 7 of this agreement shall for the time being and from time to time as often as the corporation shall avail themselves of such power be suspended and shall not operate or take effect until notice (in addition to the notice required by clause 7) has been served upon the company by the corporation that they have not availed and do not intend to avail themselves of the power hereby conferred upon them."

Clause 9: "Save as hereinbefore expressly mentioned nothing in this agreement contained shall affect lessen or take away any rights powers or privileges enjoyed by or conferred upon the corporation and the manufacturers and traders of Warrington under or by virtue of any Acts relating to the company or otherwise and save as aforesaid such rights powers and privileges are hereby reserved accordingly."

Clause 10: "If any difference shall arise between the company and the corporation as to the true intent and meaning of this agreement or as to anything to be done or not to be done thereunder such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed (unlese otherwise agreed on) on the application of the company or the corporation by the president for the time being of the Institution of Civil Engineers whose decision shall be final and binding on both parties and the cost of the reference shall be borne as he shall direct."

Clause 12: "The corporation shall have all rights and privileges under and shall be deemed to be traders within the meaning of this agreement."

The agreement of the 9th of April, 1896, was embodied in the schedule to the Manchester Ship Canal Act, 1896.

The company, it was alleged, made default in making and maintaining the channel of the River Mersey between the points referred to in clause 1 of the agreement of 1896 for the minimum width and depth therein provided, and the navigation of the river was always since the date of the agreement obstructed.

From time to time the surveyor of the corporation served written notices on the company certifying that the channel was obstructed but the company did not dredge or continue to dredge the channel to the reasonable satisfaction of the corporation's surveyor.

The Court of Appeal considered the jurisdiction of the court was ousted, with respect to the corporation, and also as regards the traders until the arbitrator should have given his decision.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., expressed his concurrence with the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, L.J.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—It is no wonder, I think, that the preliminary question as to competency, which was argued fully before your lordships, led to much difference of opinion in the courts below. The provisions in the Manchester Ship Canal Acts, 1885 and 1896, as to arbitration are so various and inconsistent that it is impossible to arrive at a conclusion which can be regarded as satisfactory from every point of view.

The question was raised for the first time when the parties went to trial. It does not seem to have been argued very seriously before Byrne, J., who tried the case. His opinion was that the provision contained in sub-section 22 of section 88 of the Act of 1885 would have been enough to oust the jurisdiction of the court if it had not been for the introductory words of the section, which declare that the provisions that follow shall have effect "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company." He thought that the parties might waive a provision which they were authorised to alter by agreement. I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of that view. But I am not satisfied that mere omission to insist on a statutory provision is equivalent to an agreement that the provision shall not have effect. The enactment at the commencement of section 88 seems to require something more than tacit abandonment

Upon appeal, the decision of Byrne, J., as to competency was reversed by a majority of the court. The action so far as it was brought by the corporation was dismissed; so far as it was brought by the traders it was stayed till further order. For some reason which I do not quite understand, Vaughan Williams, L.J., held that the provision in sub-section 22 of section 88 in the Act of 1885 was not one of the provisions which the corporation and the company were competent to deal with by agreement. He thought that the jurisdiction of the court as between the corporation and the company was ousted by sub-section 22. Without expressing a decided opinion as to whether the traders had independent rights which they could enforce, he came to the conclusion that such rights, if they existed, could not be enforced unless and until the default of the company had been established in an arbitration between the company and the corporation. He did not think it necessary to consider section 202 of the Act of 1885, which enacts that if any question should "arise between the company and any person touching anything to be done, or not to be done, or any money to be paid," under the provisions of the Act, then, unless by the Act otherwise expressly provided, such question should be "determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845." Stirling, L.J., agreed with Vaughan Williams, L.J., in his view of sub-section 22 and in the general result of his opinion, though he thought the traders were entitled to enforce the provisions in their favour contained in section 88. But he relied mainly, if not entirely, on section 202, which Vaughan Williams, L.J., left out of consideration. On the other hand, Cozens-Hardy, L.J., while agreeing that the jurisdiction of the court was ousted as between the corporation and the company, held that the traders had statutory rights which they could enforce independently of the corporation, and that they were not compelled to resort to arbitration or to await the result of arbitration between the corporation and the company. His view was that section 202 did not apply to a refund such as that which the traders claimed. It may have been intended, he said, to apply only to cases specified in the earlier parts of the Act, which provide for arbitration without designating the arbitrator or prescribing the mode of arbitration. At any rate, he thought that section 202 was not so expressed as to exclude the jurisdiction of the court.

On the whole, I am disposed to agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J. I have no doubt that the Manchester Ship Canal Acts do confer upon the traders independent rights which they are entitled to enforce. I do not find in either of those Acts anything which compels the traders to resort to arbitration for the purpose of enforcing their rights unless section 202 of the Act of 1885 be held to have that effect, and on this point I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J. It is an unfortunate result, as Vaughan Williams, L.J., observes, that cases relating to the same alleged obligations of the company should not be disposed of by one and the same tribunal, but I am by no means sure that the result would be more satisfactory if the questions between the company and the corporation under the Act of 1885 were referred to an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade, and those under the statutory agreement confirmed by the Act of 1896 to an arbitrator appointed by the president of the Institution of Civil Engineers, while the very same questions arising between the company and the traders were referred to arbitration in manner provided by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

It seems to me that the corporation should be struck out as co-plaintiffs with the traders, but that the action should proceed as between the traders and the company, and that the company should pay the traders their costs both here and below, except so far as such costs have been increased by making the corporation co-plaintiffs.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—In this case the Corporation of Warrington and certain traders are co-plaintiffs and the Manchester Ship Canal Co. are the defendants. The action is brought principally to recover certain tolls paid to the canal company on the ground that certain dredging operations imposed by statute on that company had not been fulfilled.

Upon the hearing of the cause before Byrne, J., it was submitted that the arbitration provisions contained in the original Ship Canal Act of 1885, and in an agreement affirmed in a subsequent Act, so completely ousted the jurisdiction of the courts that even the assent of the parties could not give power to the court to hear and determine the matters in dispute, and this preliminary objection has now been dealt with. After considerable hesitation I have come to the conclusion that the judgment given by Cozens-Hardy, L.J., is correct, and that it ought to be followed. I agree with the view entertained by the Court of Appeal as between the Corporation of Warrington and the Ship Canal Co. The provisions of the Act of 1885 and the agreement of 1896 (confirmed by the Act of that year) being duly considered, the result is that the provisions of sub-section 22 of section 88 of the Act of 1885 amount to an ouster of the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, and that the tribunal created by that sub-section alone can determine the matters now in difference between the corporation and the canal company.

But I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J., in holding that the case of the traders individually stands upon a different ground. The traders are not mentioned in the provisions I have referred to. But it is argued that section 202 of the Act of 1885 places them in the same position as the Corporation of Warrington, and that therefore, equally in respect to the traders, the jurisdiction of the court is ousted. For the reasons given by the Lord Justice I do not accept this view; and although I think that the corporation may for some purposes represent the traders, I cannot agree that because the corporation must proceed by arbitration, that therefore the traders must do so also. Each of these traders may have an independent claim for damages, yet would not be entitled to appear upon an arbitration between the corporation and the canal company.

I therefore think that the traders are entitled to proceed in the action, and that so far the appeal should succeed, and I agree with Lord Macnaghten's view as to costs.

Appeal of the traders allowed; appeal of the corporation dismissed.

BADISCHE ANILIN UND SODA FABRIK v. HICKSON. (a.)

Patent—"Vend within the realm"—Contract made in England for the sale of patented articles manufactured abroad—Articles to be delivered abroad.

A contract for sale within the realm of patented articles, which are to be delivered abroad, followed by a notification to the purchasers within the realm that the goods abroad are at their disposal, is not a "vending" within the realm of the patented articles so as to infringe the rights of the patentees.

Saccharin Corporation v. Reitmeyer & Co., 49 W. R. 199, [1900] 2 Ch. 659, followed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Buckley, J.

The action was brought to restrain infringment by the defendant Hickson of letters patent granted in 1887 to the plaintiffs for an invention relating to the manufacture of dye stuffs. The patent, which was in the usual form, gave to the patentees the sole privilege "to make, use, exercise, and vend" the subject-matter of the patent within the United Kingdom, and to have and enjoy "the whole profit, benefit, and advantage" accruing from the invention.

The dye stuffs alleged to be infringments were purchased by the defendant Hickson, who resided in England, from a foreign company who manufactured them abroad, and were to be delivered to the defendant or his order at Antwerp. The defendant, by a contract made in England, then resold the dye stuffs to an English firm, to whom they were to be delivered at Antwerp, and by whom they were subsequently imported into England.

The plaintiffs claimed damages or an account of profits against the defendant and delivery up of the dye stuffs imported into England.

Buckley, J., considered that the decision in Saccharin Corporation v. Reitmeyer & Co., 49 W. R. 199, [1900] 2 Ch. 659, governed the present case, and dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

J. C. Graham and Colefax, for the appellants.—By a contract made in England with an English firm the defendant contracted to sell these infringing dye stuffs to an English firm, and although the dyes were to be delivered to the English firm at Antwerp, still the contract amounted to a vending by the defendant of the patented articles within the realm. The defendant knew perfectly well that the English firm buying the article from him intended to import it into England. The decision in Saccharin Corporation v. Reitmeyer & Co. is not consistent with the dicta of Lord Herschell in Badische Anilin Fabrik v. Basle Chemical Works, 46 W. R. 255, [1898] A. C. 200, at p. 207. The defendant by the course of action he adopted in fact deprived the plaintiffs of some of the "profit and advantage" accruing from their invention: Elmslie v. Boursier, 18 W. R. 665, L. R. 9 Eq. 217, at p. 222.

A. J. Walter, for the respondent.—Saccharin Corporation v. Reitmeyer & Co. exactly covers this case; there Cozens-Hardy, J., held that an English merchant who in pursuance of a contract made in England with an English firm delivered a patented article at a foreign port to the English importer, did not thereby "vend" the patented article within the realm. In the earlier case of Badische Anilin Fabrik v. Basle Chemical Works the House of Lords expressly left this particular point open.

Colefax replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a case in which there has been in one sense a sale of a patented article within the realm, because there has been a contract of sale and such subsequent appropriation of goods that property has passed, and that contract of sale is a contract which, on the facts, I take it, took place in England. Then it is suggested that those facts are sufficient to constitute an infringement of the statutory rights of the patentees. Really the whole question is whether there is any infringement of the statutory rights of the patentees unless there has been a sale accompanied by a delivery in England, meaning thereby, of course, a delivery by a person who entered into or was a party to the contract of sale, and who is the defendant in the action. Now, here Mr. Hickson is the defendant in this action; there has been a contract with him under which property has passed, and there has been a delivery by Mr. Hickson. That delivery was not within the realm, but was a delivery on the Continent, and that was a delivery made in pursuance of the contract.

The question here is one which I do not think myself was absolutely decided by the case of Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Basle Chemical Works, Bindschedler, in the House of Lords. I should point out with reference to that case that Lord Davey, who delivered the last judgment, says this (at p. 209 of [1898] A. C.): "Like my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Herschell), I desire to express no opinion upon the nice question which might have arisen under other circumstances, but which in my opinion does not arise in the circumstance of this case." That is what he says, and when we look at the judgments of Lord Halsbury and Lord Herschell we see that they both of them seem to take as a material fact to be considered in the case before them, that the sale in the sense of the contract of sale had not been made within the jurisdiction. I need not read at length again the passage to which I called attention in the course of the argument. It is in Lord Halsbury's judgment at p. 205. But it seems to me that Lord Halsbury and Lord Herschell both expressly refrained from dealing with what might be the result on the question of infringement if the contract had been made, as the contract here was made, in England. I had thought from the reports in the Law Reports that in the case of Saccharin Corporation (Limited) v. Reitmeyer & Co., [1900] 2 Ch. 659, before Cozens-Hardy, J., the contract there was abroad; but Mr. Walter has shown to us the report in the Patent Office Reports, and it appears that the contract in that case, as in this case, was in England. Really, therefore, the decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., in Saccharin Corporation (Limited) v. Reitmeyer & Co. covers the present case. I think that it must have occurred very often in past times that there have been agents and merchants in England who have made it their business to sell English patented productions which have been manufactured abroad. And I have no doubt that of recent years the practice has been to evade the intention of the Statute of Monopolies and the intention of the grant to the patentees by taking care that in form the merchant thus selling the goods is not a party to the delivery in England. Under these circumstances I do not think that we ought to extend the rule that was arrived at in Elmslie v. Boursier beyond the point to which it has already gone. Elmslie v. Boursier was a case where under the contract the goods were delivered in England. The contract was one that was made by an Englishman in France. There have been several attempts to extend the doctrine of that case further, and they have not been successful. It is not for me to offer any opinion as to whether it is desirable, in the interests of English patentees and the promotion of invention in England, that any statutory legislation should be passed for the protection of the privileges with which the Legislature has already thought it right that the inventors of useful inventions should be rewarded. But if it were right to do such a thing I have no doubt that it would be done, because there have been quite sufficient cases in late years to draw the attention of the Legislature and of everybody else to this practice. In fact the practice has now become so prevalent that everyone knows the exact steps that you must take to enable you to get patented articles distributed within the realm, and yet deprive the patentee of the remuneration which he thinks he is entitled to have. I ought to have said one word upon a part of Mr. Graham's argument. He did not put his case entirely upon there having been a sale within the realm. He put it partly upon the words with regard to profits, and said that there had been a depriving of the patentee of the profits that the statute intended him to have. I do not think any one of the decisions ever got within a practical distance of holding such a proposition to be accurate. The result is that this appeal fails, and is dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether in this case the defendant has infringed the plaintiffs' patent. Now, in order that that may be established, I think that it must be made out that the defendant made, used, exercised, or vended the patented invention within the United Kingdom. That is the mode in which the letters patent are expressed, and that is the mode in which law is stated by Lord Herschell at the commencement of his speech when addressing the House of Lords in the case of Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Basle Chemical Works, Bindschedler. What is said here is that the defendant has vended a patented article in this country. What has taken place is this: He entered in this country into a contract with another person in this country for the sale to the purchaser of a certain quantity of the patented article, it being a stipulation of the contract that the article sold should be delivered to the purchaser, not in this country, but abroad. He procured the subject-matter of the contract abroad, and had it delivered to his orders in Antwerp. He then directed the persons in whose custody it was physically at Antwerp to hold it to the order of the purchaser, and then in England he communicated to the purchaser in England the fact that it was at the order of the purchaser at Antwerp, and thus he completed the bargain and sale to the purchaser in England of this article, which was all the time outside the realm. Then the purchaser brought it into England. The purchaser is not before the court, and we have nothing to do with him. The simple question is whether the defendant in these circumstances has infringed the plaintiff's patent. Now the question therefore is, is a sale made in England in circumstances such as would by the law of this country pass the property in the article to the purchaser, a "vending" of the article within the meaning of the letters patent, the article being all the while abroad? I think that it is not.

There is very little precise authority on the question; but as I have pointed out already, it seems to have been the opinion of Lord Herschell in the case to which I have just referred that in order that vending in this country should take place it was necessary that both the sale and delivery should be in this country.

That was also the decision in Saccharin Corporation v. Reitmeyer & Co. by my brother Cozens-Hardy in 1900, and from that decision I am not prepared to depart. I think that the consequences of holding otherwise might be very serious in this country. Articles which are subject to English patents, but which are made and sold in large quantities abroad, may be made the subject of mercantile contracts in this country, the patented article never being brought within this country, but sold and transferred abroad. And under these circumstances with regard to such articles, according to English law, the property might pass from one merchant to another. I think it would be an extremely serious thing to interfere with contracts of that sort. It is true in the present case that the article was intended to be brought within the realm, and probably an infringement was committed when the article was brought within the realm, but I do not see that we can look at that. The intention in other cases might be perfectly harmless, being simply that the property should be dealt with entirely abroad, and never come within the realm at all. For these reasons I think that the decision appealed from is quite right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is really an appeal from my own decision in Saccharin Corporation v. Reitmeyer & Co.; I therefore content myself with saying that the extremely able argument of Mr. Colefax has not satisfied me that the views I expressed five years ago are inaccurate.

MEARS v. WESTERN CANADA PULP AND PAPER CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Minimum subscription—Payment in cash—Allotment—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 4 (1).

Payment in cash of the sum payable on application for the minimum subscription to the shares of a limited company must be paid to and received by the company before allotment. Payment by cheque is permissible, but the cheque must be cleared before allotment.

Motion.

The defendant company had issued a prospectus offering certain shares therein for public subscription, the minimum subscription upon which the directors might proceed to allotment being fixed at 200,000 shares.

The plaintiff had authorized an underwriting company to apply for shares in his name, paid the sum due on application therefor, and the shares were in due course allotted to him.

At the time the allotment was made the defendant company had not cleared several cheques forwarded in payment of the application money, and some of these cheques were not paid on presentation, although they were afterwards made good.

Upon these facts being made known to the plaintiff, he claimed that the allotment was irregular and should be rescinded, that the register should be rectified, and that the money paid by him should be returned, upon the ground that the sum payable on the minimum subscription had not been paid to and received by the company before allotment; and that the defendant company should be restrained from parting or otherwise dealing with such money.

Swinfen Eady, J., held that the Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 4 (1), had not been complied with, because at the date of the allotment the sum payable on application for the minimum subscription had not been paid to and received by the company, and he made the order prayed by the plaintiff.

The defendant company appealed.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Kirby, for the appellants.—Payment had been made before allotment. A cheque dishonoured but afterwards made good is sufficient payment to be within the Act. The allotment was valid.

They cited Glasgow Pavilion (Limited) v. Motherwell, 6 F. 116; Currie v. Misa, (1875) L. R. 10 Ex. 153; Ex parte Matthew, 32 W. R. 813, (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 506.

E. C. Macnaghten, K.C., and Jessel, for the respondent, were not called upon.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This appeal must be dismissed. I approve of Swinfen Eady, J.'s, decision; he says that to be within section 4 of the Companies Act, 1900, "to enable an allotment to be made the sum payable on application must have been paid to and received by the company in cash. Of course payments may be made in the ordinary course by cheques, but then the cheques must be cleared before the date of the allotment." Any cheque forwarded in payment of application money can be cleared before allotment, and then there will be a payment "received by" the company. In Glasgow Pavilion (Limited) v. Motherwell the cheques were met on presentation, and it was properly held that there had been a payment to and receipt by the company prior to allotment.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed. In this case some cheques sent to the company before allotment were not cleared before allotment. When presented they were dishonoured. There was no sum "paid to and received by the company." The giving of a cheque does not extinguish a debt. [He cited Cohen v. Hale, 26 W. R. 680, (1878) 3 Q. B. D. 371.]

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., was of the same opinion. It was not necessary to express any opinion as to the result of the appeal if the cheques had been honoured on presentation. The Legislature intended that no allotment should be valid unless the amount of the minimum subscription had actually been received in cash. No allotment need be made until cheques received have been cleared.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Specific performance—Reservation of minerals—Covenant to erect houses—Particulars of houses specified—Lessee owner of minerals—Compromise of action brought by mortgagor—Damages.

The defendant had, in 1894, taken a lease of a certain piece of land for ninety-nine years, by which he covenanted to erect seven dwelling-houses similar to those already erected in a certain road, and to deliver them up at the end of the term in good and substantial repair. The lease also contained a reservation of the mines and minerals (which did not belong to the lessor) in favour of the person who would, if the lease had not been made, be for the time being entitled thereto, with power to enter upon the demised premises and occupy the surface thereof and to work the minerals under the lands, without leaving any support for the surface or any buildings thereon, and for that purpose to sink pits and to make pit-hills and spoil-banks, paying reasonable compensation to the lessee and his assigns for the damage so caused. The lands the subject of the lease had been assigned by the lessor, and the assignee mortgaged them to the plaintiff. The defendant was also by another lease granted by the owner of the minerals, and prior in date to the present one, entitled to the mines and minerals under the demised land. As the defendant had not complied with his covenant to erect the seven houses, although he had erected other buildings, the mortgagor had brought an action for possession on the ground of the breach, but that action had been compromised. The plaintiff, who was the mortgagee of the demised land, now sued for specific performance of the covenant to build the seven houses.

Held, that the defendant was bound to comply with his covenant to build, notwithstanding that he was entitled under his mining lease to use the whole surface of the land for mining operations; that the particulars of the houses to be erected under the covenant were sufficiently specified so that specific performance could be decreed; that a decree for specific performance was the only remedy available, as the damages for the injury done to the reversion would necessarily be infinitesimal, on account of the length of the lease, and would therefore be no adequate compensation for the depreciation of the reversion; and also that the compromise of the action brought by the mortgagor for possession on the ground of the non-compliance with the covenant to build was no defence to the present action, as the mortgagor's action was not maintainable, and therefore its compromise could not affect the mortgagee.

Witness action.

This action was brought by R. M. Molyneux, as the reversioner of a certain lease, against the lessee, the defendant, P. Richard, for specific performance by the defendant of a covenant to build contained in the said lease, and in the alternative for damages for breach of the covenant.

By a lease dated the 28th of July, 1894, and made between Isaac Colquhoun as lessor of the one part and the defendant of the other part, the lessor demised to the defendant four parcels of land at or near Percy-street, Gorse-road, Swansea, Glamorganshire, except the mines and minerals and the mining rights therein mentioned, for a term of ninety-nine years from the 25th of March, 1894, at the yearly rent of £50; and the defendant covenanted that he would within three years from the said 25th of March, 1894, erect and build seven messuages or dwelling-houses on the demised premises with all suitable outbuildings thereto in a workmanlike manner and under the direction and to the satisfaction of the surveyor or agent for the time being of the lessor, and similar to the messuages or dwelling-houses and premises which were at that time already erected in Percy-street aforesaid, and also would at all times during the said term keep the said dwelling-houses and all other buildings connected therewith erected or to be erected on the demised premises in good and substantial repair and condition, and in such good and substantial repair and condition would deliver up the same to the lessor at the end or sooner determination of the said term. It was thereby further declared that all rights and obligations of the lessor and lessee respectively thereunder should be incident to and devolve with the reversion expectant on the said demise and the leasehold interest thereby created, and should accordingly be enjoyed and observed and performed by the person or persons in whom such reversion and leasehold interest respectively should for the time being be vested. The lease also contained an exception and reservation out of the demise therein contained unto the person or persons who would, if the lease had never been executed, be for the time being entitled thereto of all coal, culm, ironstone, iron ore, quarries, stone, clay, and other mines and minerals lying and being within and under the demised premises, with full power to enter upon and occupy the surface thereof or any part thereof and to search for and work, win, and get the said mines and minerals or any mines and minerals in, under, or upon other lands without leaving any vertical or lateral support for the surface of the said land demised or any buildings then or which thereafter might be erected thereon, and for the purposes aforesaid or any of them to sink pits, erect buildings, furnaces, ovens, machinery and apparatus, and to make and use railroads and other roads, pit-hills, spoil-banks, and generally to do upon, over, and under the surface of the said premises all things which might be found necessary, convenient, or proper for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, making and paying from time to time to the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, reasonable compensation for the damage which might be so done, the amount thereof to be settled by arbitration in manner therein provided.

By an indenture dated the 16th of October, 1894, I. Colquhoun conveyed the lands the subject of the before-mentioned lease to one Albert Mason in fee simple, subject to and with the benefit of the said lease and the covenants and provisions therein contained.

By an indenture dated the 19th of November, 1895, Mason conveyed the said lands and premises to the plaintiff Molyneux and one J. W. Carew as joint tenants in fee simple, subject to, but with the full benefit of the covenants, benefits, and advantages contained in, the said indenture of lease, by way of mortgage to secure a sum of £3,250 and interest, and this mortgage debt was still due and owing.

The defendant entered into possession and occupation of the premises under the lease upon the granting thereof and had since continued to have and enjoy the benefits thereof.

The mines and minerals under the premises comprised in the lease of the 28th of July, 1894, never were vested in I. Colquhoun, but were on the conveyance to him by the trustees of one Calvert Richard Jones excepted and reserved by such trustees, with powers of working the same and entering upon the surface of such lands; and by an indenture dated the 21st of March, 1894, and therefore made prior to the before-mentioned lease of the surface, the trustees had demised to the defendant for the term of forty-two years from the 1st of January, 1894, all the seams of coal beyond the depth of fifty feet below a certain seam of coal lying underneath the lands comprised in the lease of 28th of July, 1894, with full power and liberty for the lessee at all times to enter upon and occupy the surface of the land or any part thereof, and to search for, work, win, and carry away the said minerals and for the purposes aforesaid to sink pits, erect buildings, furnaces, ovens, machinery, and apparatus, and to make and use railroads and other roads, pit-hills and spoil-banks, and to make water-courses, ponds, and reservoirs, and collect water, and generally to do upon, over, and under the surface of the said lands all things which might be found necessary, expedient, or convenient for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them; the lessee so exercising the rights aforesaid or any of them and thereby causing damage to the owners of the surface, their heirs or assigns, or their lessees or tenants, to make and pay from time to time to such owners, lessees, or tenants reasonable compensation for such damage, the amount whereof was to be settled by arbitration in manner therein provided.

The defendant did not build the seven houses upon the demised land as provided by the covenant in the lease of the 28th of July, 1894. In February, 1903, the plaintiff required the defendant to build the said seven houses, and the defendant having neglected to comply with the plaintiff's requirements, the plaintiff by his surveyor prepared and delivered to the defendant plans showing the structure, elevation, and particulars of the houses which he required to be built under the defendant's covenant, such houses being similar in design to the houses already in Percy-street, which were cottages for miners and artizans, and let at rents of not less than 3s. 6d. per week. These houses were all built upon a similar plan with the exception that there were some slight modifications in a few of them.

As the defendant still refused to perform his covenant and build the seven houses, the plaintiff commenced the present action.

The defendant pleaded, as an alternative defence, that on the 25th of October, 1899, an action had been brought in the Queen's Bench Division by the above-mentioned Albert Mason against the defendant. Mason was at that time the mortgagor entitled to the possession of the said premises and to the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, the mortgagees having given no notice of their intention to take possession of the mortgaged property or to enter into possession of the rents and profits. In that action Mason claimed possession of the premises comprised in the lease of the 28th of July, 1894, and damages for the breach of the defendant's covenant to build the seven messuages on the demised premises. The defendant delivered his defence in that action and pleaded (inter alia) a payment into court of £25 in respect of the damages claimed for breach of the covenant, which amount was accepted by the said Mason in satisfaction of his claim; and on the 1st of June, 1901, an order was made that, the plaintiff accepting the amount paid into court, all further proceedings should be stayed, the defendant paying the costs of the plaintiff Mason.

The defendant contended that the compromise in the before-mentioned action constituted a bar to the plaintiff's claim in the present action, and he further said that in 1896 he had erected two houses and partly performed his covenant, but upon the evidence it appeared that these were not dwelling-houses, but were in the nature of offices. The defendant also contended that all the lands comprised in the lease of the 28th of July, 1894, except that part upon which the two houses had been erected had been used and occupied for the purpose of working and getting the mines and minerals demised by the mining lease of the 21st of March, 1894, and under the powers therein contained and for the purpose of performing the lessee's obligations thereunder, and that further dwelling-houses could not now be erected upon such lands, and that if any additional houses had been erected they would have been destroyed or rendered useless in the exercise of the lessee's powers under the mineral lease. The defendant also alleged that in any event the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiff.—The houses to be erected under the covenant are the only real security for the rent reserved in the lease, the rest of the land having been rendered valueless by the pit-hills and spoil-banks. The only real remedy which plaintiffs have is to obtain specific performance of the building covenant, as they have no sufficient remedy in damages. The settlement in the action of Mason v. Richards cannot be set up as an answer to the present action. There would have been a good defence to that action if it had been tried. A mortgagor, although he can receive and sue for rent, cannot sue on covenants so as to affect his mortgagee: Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 5; Matthews v. Usher, 49 W. R. 40, [1900] 2 Q. B. 535. The action which Mason brought for possession was one which he could not properly maintain, and therefore the compromise is not binding on the present plaintiff, who had no knowledge of it. The covenant which has to be performed by the defendant is perfectly clear and explicit, and the buildings which he has erected cannot be held to be a performance of it as alleged. It is no defence in a court of equity for the defendant to say that he was unable to perform his covenant, because it conflicts with the powers granted to him in the earlier mining lease. The defendant cannot be heard to say that he is entitled to go, under his mining lease, upon this land and demolish the buildings and then compensate himself, because that would be to make null and void the covenant to build the seven houses which was the consideration by which the defendant obtained the surface lands, and would be contrary to all the principles of equity. Although the court does not as a rule decree specific performance of a covenant to build, yet there are three exceptions when it will do so, and the present case falls within all three: (a) When the buildings are sufficiently defined; (b) where no adequate compensation can be given by means of pecuniary damages; (c) where the lessee has obtained possession of the land upon the faith of having entered into the covenant to build: Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Wolverhampton v. Emmons, 49 W. R. 553, [1901] 1 K. B. 515. The words in the covenant, "similar to the messuages and dwelling-houses and premises erected in Percy-street," are quite clear and sufficiently definite, and the houses in Percy-street are sufficiently of one type to render compliance with this covenant perfectly simple. The damages which a reversioner of a lease with ninety years to run could obtain for an existing breach would, after deducting discount for payment down at the present time, be very small, and therefore afford no proper compensation for such a breach: Whitham v. Kershaw, 34 W. R. 340, 16 Q. B. D. 613. The enforcement of the covenant to build the houses would be the only adequate compensation for such a breach as in the present case, as the land itself is decreasing in value owing to the tipping on it. The case of Ebbetts v. Conquest [1895] 2 Ch. 377, 43 W. R. Dig. 91, is an authority for the proposition that in ordinary cases the proper measure of damages is the decrease in the value of the reversion occasioned by the failure to perform the covenants, but no case can be found where damages have been granted to the reversioner of a ninety-nine years' lease.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Meager, for the defendant.—The only damages which the plaintiff is entitled to are damages as mortgagee, but as he has not realized his security it is not certain that there ever will be any damages at all. The measure of his damages is his loss on his security, and that can only be ascertained after he has realized his security. Specific performance cannot be decreed, because the buildings to be erected are not described with sufficient definiteness in the covenant to build. Further, specific performance will only be decreed where the damages are substantial, whereas in the present case they are merely nominal. Under the covenant the plans are to be prepared by the lessee, and the only right which the lessor has under the lease is that the buildings were to be built under the direction and to the satisfaction of his surveyor. Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Wolverhampton v. Emmons can be distinguished on the ground that in that case there was a contract outside the covenant which made it more definite, and this is absent in the present case: see also Fairclough v. Marshall, 27 W. R. 145, L. R. 4 Ex. D. 37. The defendant is entitled to tip all over the ground. The reservation in the plaintiff's conveyance is in the same terms as the grant of the surface to the defendant, who has the right to tip anywhere, although it may only be in a certain order as to different parts of the surface.

Lawrence, K.C., was not heard in reply.

KEKEWICH, J.—This case is by no means free from difficulty, and both parties treated the main point as being one of very considerable difficulty in ascertaining the principle of law and how to apply it. But, as I have had the advantage of hearing a full argument, there will be no benefit in postponing giving my decision upon the points which arise.

The defendant is the lessee of certain lands for a term of ninety-nine years at a rent of £50 under a lease of the 28th of July, 1894, by which (inter alia) he covenanted within three years from the 25th of March, 1894 (that is, not later than the 25th of March, 1897), to erect and build seven messuages or dwelling-houses on the premises, with all suitable outbuildings thereto. [After reading the covenant, his lordship continued:] Now, the first question raised is the question of the construction of the lease. The defendant contends that he was not bound by that express covenant to build seven or any other number of messuages or dwelling-houses, and the argument is this: The lease, it is said, contains, and it does contain, very large powers of interfering with the surface, and there is express power to cover the surface with pit-hills and spoil-banks, and there is also power to work the minerals underneath the surface without leaving any vertical or lateral support for the surface or for any buildings which might be erected thereon. It is said that the two provisions of the lease are contradictory, and that the power is inconsistent with the covenant to build. It cannot have been intended, so it is argued, that the lessee should have been bound to erect seven houses when there is an express provision that he should be at liberty to cover all the land with brick-kilns, pit-hills, and spoil-banks. To-day, it is said, he may erect the houses, and to-morrow he may pull them down to put his pit-hills and spoil-banks there; and the evidence goes to show that even now there is not much room for the houses, and by-and-by all the land will be required for the pit-hills and spoil-banks. I use that as a comprehensive term to include every interference with the surface in connection with the working of the minerals. The answer to that argument seems to me to be that he is bound by solemn covenant to erect these houses, and he has further entered into a covenant to maintain and deliver them up at the end of the term. Whether that is consistent or not with the power to cover the surface with pit-hills and spoil-banks it is not for me to say. Some method might possibly be found for reconciling the right to erect pit-hills under the liberty reserved to the lessee, with the obligation to build under the covenant. It is not necessary for me to inquire whether the defendant's claim to pull down the houses if erected and make pit-hills and spoil-banks could be upheld or not. All I do decide is that there is here an express covenant to build seven messuages or dwelling-houses, and that that cannot be said to be extinguished by the liberty, not yet exercised, to cover the land with pit-hills and spoil-banks. Therefore it seems to me that we have here a legal covenant binding on the lessee, by the very terms of which he has bound himself to erect these houses, and it is admitted that he has not fulfilled it. But it is said, when you have got so far, the plaintiff is entitled to no remedy. The defendant does not expressly say that the plaintiff has no remedy, but the argument comes to that, although in form it was that the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance. Now I must take the objections to specific performance seriatim. But first let us see what the tests of the right to specific performance are. It is not necessary nowadays to go back to the old cases, because we have the law laid down in the plainest terms by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Wolverhampton v. Emmons, 49 W. R. 553, [1901] 1 K. B. 515. It was there recognized that the general rule in equity was, that an agreement to erect buildings could not be specifically performed, although Collins, L.J., thought—and if I may respectfully say so, I agree with him—that the courts of equity had not always been consistent in following that rule. But it was also recognized that there had been established certain exceptions to that general rule, and the exceptions are clearly stated by A. L. Smith, M.R., and Romer, L.J., and are referred to also by the present Master of the Rolls, and they may be taken to have stated accurately the extent of the exceptions. A. L. Smith, M.R., said: "The authorities to which reference has been made appear to me to show that where there is a definite contract by which a person who has acquired land, and in consideration thereof has agreed to erect on the land so acquired a building of which the particulars are clearly specified, and the erection of which is of an importance to the other party which cannot adequately be measured by pecuniary damages, that is a case in which, according to the doctrine acted upon by the court of equity in relation to such matters, specific performance ought to be ordered." Romer, L.J., also states the three points, and I will not pause to read his language. The first thing to be considered is whether there is here what A. L. Smith, M.R., calls "a building of which the particulars are clearly specified." In that particular case it was admitted that the particulars of the building had not been in the first instance clearly specified, but after some dispute plans were submitted to the defendant, and there was no question that if the buildings were to be erected they were to be erected according to the plans. So far there is a distinction between that case and this, but the Lords Justices, in laying down that rule, did not rest it upon the particular circumstances in that particular case. They did not define what is meant by clear specification; they only mentioned that where there is a clear specification of particulars, then specific performance may follow. But it is argued that there is no clear specification here. The language of the covenant is this: "to erect and build seven messuages or dwelling-houses on the demised premises with all suitable outbuildings thereto." Then follow words which are not inappropriate where they stand, but which must be treated parenthetically with reference to the question as to what class of buildings are to be erected. These words put there parenthetically, only apply to the buildings to be erected, and are as follows: "in a workmanlike manner and under the direction and to the satisfaction of the surveyor or agent for the time being of the lessor." They do not in the least specify what the buildings are to be; but the words which follow these words do so specify, and must be read as immediately following the words "suitable outbuildings thereto." They are: "and similar to the messuages or dwelling-houses and premises already erected in Percy-street aforesaid." Part of the ground forming the demised premises abutted on Percy-street. Percy-street was known to the parties and there were erected a number of cottages. The lessee is to erect buildings coming within the terms "messuages or dwelling-houses." The covenantor has only to look at the houses in Percy-street to find out what they are, and then he has to erect buildings, not identical with, but similar to, those houses. The only difference between the two words for this purpose being that he would not be liable for breach of covenant if he departed in some non-essential particulars, but not in substance, from the houses in Percy-street. So far there is no difficulty. But then it is said that the houses in Percy-street are not all the same and that there is sufficient variety to make it uncertain which is to be followed. They are all workmen's cottages, and built on similar lines. They vary in form to some extent, and though they were mostly four-roomed cottages, there were some of five rooms, and one of six. They have in some cases been increased by additions to the original erections. I have nothing to show that there was this variety when they were originally built, or what it consisted in, but I will assume that there was some variety then. Still it seems to me that the covenantor is under no difficulty. He is not bound to copy the very best of these houses. He would be complying with his covenant if he copied that which was least onerous to himself and built an ordinary four-roomed house, of which there are several there. It seems to me that the houses to be built are quite sufficiently defined within the meaning of the language of the Court of Appeal. One of the plaintiffs' witnesses had prepared for submission to the defendant, plans on those lines, and there was no difficulty in recognizing the similarity of the houses on his plans to the Percy-street houses, and a builder says he would have no difficulty in constructing houses according to that plan without any further plans. It seems to me that to hold that specific performance is not to be decreed on the ground that the particulars of the buildings are not clearly defined because of the existence of some slight variety in the houses to be copied, even admitting that there was at the date of the lease some slight variety, would be to cut down the language of the Court of Appeal unfairly. It cannot have been intended that the words "clearly specified" should mean "leaving no room for doubt." That gets rid of the first objection.

The second objection is that the plaintiff is only a mortgagee, and it is said as mortgagee he can only recover damages on the footing of his security being in danger or insufficient; and that that cannot be proved until he has attempted to realize, and that in fact it may turn out that he has a wholly sufficient security. No case has been cited in support of this part of the defendant's argument. The argument must go to this, that on that ground no mortgagee where he is without an express grant of the benefit of a covenant in any lease could ever sue. Take the case of the ordinary grant of a mortgage in fee of lands which are leased to farmers. There happens to be a covenant in one of the leases not to erect a public-house on the demised premises. There is evidence that the erection of a public-house would seriously damage the rest of the property. According to the argument put forward on behalf of the defendant, the plaintiff is out of court, because it may be that until he has attempted to realize his security he cannot say whether it is sufficient or not, and therefore cannot sue. In my opinion such an argument goes far to oust the right of any mortgagee to sue on many covenants such as are found in many leases. I do not think that it requires anything further to be said in overruling that objection.

I will leave to the last the most serious point of the case, but will, before dealing with it, touch on another point which has been raised. It is said that the defendant has settled with the mortgagor, and compromised the matter in the action in Mason v. Richard, as he had a right to do. I have the proceedings in that action before me, and they show that ultimately an arrangement was made that the sum of £25 in court should be paid to the plaintiff in satisfaction of the cause of action. What was the cause of action? The indorsement on the writ shows that the action was to recover possession of this very property. The plaintiff asked for possession, and for damages in respect of the breaches in the lease. On account of the defendant's breach of covenant in not building houses on the premises in accordance with his covenant, the plaintiff sued to recover possession. I need not go further. There is distinct authority in the case of Matthews v. Usher that such an action brought by a mortgagor was not maintainable. The point was there thoroughly considered, and the decision is exactly applicable to this case. The Court of Appeal held that the mortgagor had no cause of action; therefore, in Mason v. Richard there was nothing to be settled, and the mortgagor had no power to accept a compromise; and it was impossible that the settlement by way of compromise could in any way prejudice the rights of his mortgagee.

There remains one further point, and that requires separate consideration. In the passage I have quoted from the judgment of A. L. Smith, M.R., in the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Wolverhampton v. Emmons, it is laid down that, beyond the clear specification of the buildings to be erected, you must find, in order that specific performance may be ordered, a definite contract by which a person who has acquired land in consideration thereof, has agreed to erect on the land so acquired buildings of which the particulars are clearly specified, and the erection of which is of an importance to the other party which cannot adequately be measured by pecuniary damages. That there was here such a definite contract, I am perfectly clear. It was part of the bargain by which the defendant obtained possession of this land; therefore we need not pause to inquire how far the acquiring the land entered into the consideration of the contract. But it is said here that the erection of these buildings is not of such importance to the other party to the contract, the plaintiff, that the breach cannot be adequately measured by pecuniary damages; and this is the question which I will now consider. What is the object of inserting such a covenant as this? It was explained by the experts, and it is common ground, and it is so clear that it hardly wants an explanation, that the object of inserting in a lease a covenant to erect houses and maintain them and yield them up at the end of the term, is to secure the rent. If a demise is made with liberty only to build, at a certain rent, the lessor has the advantage of the covenant for payment of rent, and if his lessee is a solvent person he can recover it in that way. But he can in no way protect himself except by recovering possession of the land if the rent is not paid, and upon entering into possession he may find that the land is not so valuable as he supposed, or as it was before the demise. Therefore it is usual where building is contemplated, and especially where it is part of the bargain by which the lessee obtained possession of the land, to insert in the lease an express covenant to build. Thus the lessor gets a security for the performance of the covenant and for the payment of the rent. The building is not erected as yet, but he gets security by the covenant to erect it. The buildings are to be of a certain character, as provided in this case by reference to the Percy-street houses. Money must be spent on them; and not only is the lessor extremely likely to recover his rent if he has to enter into possession, but in the meantime he has a very valuable lever by which he can extract money from the lessee, who, having spent money in erecting buildings, would be unwilling to give up possession and will be more easily persuaded to pay his rent. That doubtless was the reason for inserting this covenant here. It stands to reason that it must have been so. But the buildings have not been erected and the lessor has not got that security for his rent for which he contracted. It may be that he has miscalculated the value of the houses, and that they would not bring him in the whole rent of £50 a year; but even on the defendant's own showing they would bring in one-half of it. The defendant's answer to that is this, as I understand it: That he has erected a large number of other buildings on this land; he is carrying on there a large brick-making business, and in connection with that business and in connection with the colliery he has erected certain buildings—offices, an engine-house, and stabling—all of which cost a considerable sum of money; and if they remain there and are kept up, and the brick-making business and colliery continue, there will at any rate be a considerable security for the rent. An endeavour is made to show that they will be a better security for the rent if they remain there, than the seven houses would be if erected on the property, and therefore there is no reason to suppose that the plaintiff will not be adequately compensated in damages. Now, one has to pause to consider what the damages would be. I understand the rule of the court as to the remedy not being adequately measured by damages, to mean such damages as can be assessed by the court upon well-recognized principles if the action is for damages and not for specific performance. Now what would the damages be here? It is agreed that the damages assessed upon the principle in Ebbetts v. Conquest would be practically nil. It is agreed on both hands that the damages the plaintiff would recover would be the damages to the reversion at the end of the term by the houses not being on the land, less discount for immediate payment; and that on a lease having ninety years to run payment down now of a very small sum would be equivalent to all the damages which the plaintiff could recover. So that the defendant's argument really amounts to this, that the plaintiff is not entitled to any remedy—not to specific performance — because his remedy can be adequately measured in damages; and not to any damages because none could be assessed upon any known principle of law. Why are the damages, if any, which he can recover, the real measure of the importance to him of having the cottages built? It is said for this reason that there are all these other buildings on the land which are an equivalent. To test that, I asked counsel what security the lessor had that these buildings should be yielded up at the expiration of the lease in good condition. I was told that under the building covenant the lessee was bound to maintain them; but I cannot find any such provision. He was bound to build seven dwelling-houses, with suitable outbuildings thereto, and to maintain, not any buildings erected on the land, but the said dwelling-houses and all other buildings connected therewith. Obviously that does not apply to these buildings which he was under no obligation to erect. Therefore he may let them fall into decay or convert them to some other purpose which would be of no use as security for rent. That is no security in the sense in which I have endeavoured to explain the meaning of the term "security for rent." Therefore we are reduced to the plain question whether pecuniary damages will be an adequate remedy for the non-performance of the covenant to build these cottages irrespective of these other buildings on the land. The plaintiff's argument seems to me to dispose of that. Putting it at the lowest, a cost of £120 each for the erection of the seven cottages, there must be some security, and even if they produce £25 a year rental, that would be some security. It seems to me that this case is within the exceptions laid down by the Court of Appeal, and that the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance.

HUTTON v. RAS STEAMSHIP CO. (a.)

Ship—Mercantile law — Naval court — Jurisdiction — Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 225, 480-486.

A naval court summoned in accordance with sections 480-486 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is a court of record, and its orders cannot be impeached providing they are "duly" made—i.e., providing the proceedings are regular and the matter is one within the jurisdiction of the court. The powers given to a naval court by section 483 of the said Act may be exercised in respect to offences under section 225. Hence the court has power to "discharge a seaman from his ship" for an offence under section 225, which provides that the seaman for such offence "shall be liable to be punished" summarily.

Action tried before the Lord Chief Justice of England.

The facts, in so far as they are material, are fully set out in his lordship's judgment.

Lord ALVERSTONE L.C.J., read the following judgment: This was an action in which the plaintiff, formerly employed as a donkey-man on board the steamship Ras Bera, sued to recover wages alleged to be due to him in respect of his employment on board that steamer. The defendants set up as a defence that the plaintiff was dismissed his ship at Yokahama, by the order of a naval court sitting under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The case is of importance inasmuch as there are several other seamen who were dismissed at the same time and who are making similar claims. The facts proved and admitted before me were as follows: The plaintiff shipped at Barry under articles for a voyage for three years for Port Arthur viâ Barry (or) any ports within certain limits, which included Japan, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom. The vessel loaded a cargo of coals at Barry and arrived at Port Arthur on the 18th of January, 1904, during the siege, and the coals were there discharged. The vessel was at Port Arthur during a portion of the bombardment. she got away from Port Arthur on the 11th of February, went in ballast to Moji, a port on the west coast of Japan, from whence she proceeded to Hongkong. At Hongkong The Ras Bera was chartered by the Nippon Tusen Kaisha, the Royal Mail Steamship Co. of Japan, on a voyage to carry passengers to all parts of the world except British North America and Magellan, including Japanese ports. The charter provided that the steamer should fly at the mainmast head during her stay in port any private signal or home flag of the charterers. It was also provided by clause 26 of the charter-party that the charterers should not employ the steamer in carrying of troops or contraband of war. Under this charter she was to proceed to Moji and from Moji to Yokohama. The manifests for the two voyages before her arrival at Yokohama were put in, and it was alleged by the plaintiff that the steamer carried on these two voyages, among other things, rails and other railway materials. By Russian proclamations published in the London Gazette of the 1st and 22nd of March materials for the construction of railways were declared by Russia to be contraband of war. Upon arrival at Yokohama the plaintiff and others of the crew objected to continuing the voyage on the ground that the vessel was carrying contraband of war, and declined to work until some arrangement was made that in the event of capture they should be indemnified and their wives and families compensated and cared for. While the question was under discussion the plaintiff and others who objected declined to do any work, but except in respect of such refusal it was not alleged that they refused to discharge their duty. Upon this question being raised by the men a naval court was held under sections 480 and 486 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which court, after hearing the evidence of the plaintiff, the master, and other witnesses, decided that the plaintiff and others were guilty of continual neglect of duty without good and sufficient cause. The judgment further stated that the sailors' plea that the carrying of contraband vitiated the agreement was without force, the voyage remaining an ordinary commercial venture, any risk or responsibility that might be incurred being borne by the ship. The court further discharged the plaintiff and the other seamen from the steamship Ras Bera and forfeited their wages. Evidence was given before me by the plaintiff that at Yokohama the vessel was both taking in and discharging railway materials, and, if the matter was for me, I should hold upon the evidence that this was the case, as I was not satisfied, from the evidence of the master, that no railway materials were being shipped. Upon the other hand, evidence was also given by the plaintiff that military stores were being shipped and men in uniform carried as passengers; but upon the evidence, as far as it is for me, I do not find that either the vessel was fitted for carrying troops or members of the Japanese Navy, or that any were so carried.

The main question in the case, however, is not what was in fact on board, but whether, having regard to the provisions of section 483 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that they had not dismissed the seamen, that their discharge from the ship was the act of the court, and therefore no question of wages subsequent to the date of discharge could possibly arise. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the order of the naval court was bad and not binding upon the plaintiff, and that inasmuch as he had been only discharged from the ship thereunder, his wages continued to run under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. The main ground of contention of the plaintiff was that the decision and order of the naval court were made without jurisdiction, and that the offence in respect of which the men were charged, being an offence under section 225, having regard to the provisions of that section, the court had no power to discharge the plaintiff from his ship. It was further contended that the passage of the judgment with regard to contraband of war above quoted showed that the judgment was contrary to natural justice, and therefore could not be enforced. In order properly to appreciate these arguments it is, in my opinion, necessary to consider, in the first place, what is the position of a court held under sections 480 and 486 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and on what grounds, if any, the decision of such a court can be impeached. It is, in my opinion, a British court sitting by virtue of the authority of a British statute and administering British law. It summons the parties before it, and has jurisdiction to investigate any charges, made under the sections of the Act, which can be entertained by courts having summary jurisdiction; this is clearly provided by section 483 (1) (b). But in my opinion the powers of the court, so far as punishment is concerned, are not confined to section 225 or earlier sections of the Act; express power is given by section 483 (1) (c) to discharge seamen from the ship, and by section 483 (1) (d) the court has power to forfeit wages. These powers are in excess of those given by section 225. Section 483 (2) provides that all orders duly made by a naval court under the powers of that section shall in subsequent legal proceedings be conclusive of the rights of the parties. In my judgment this provision was required in order to give orders of the court the effect of judgments inter partes; the court was a new court, created by statute, and but for this statute some question might have arisen as to whether its decisions were final and conclusive, as those of a court of record. In my opinion, therefore, unless the plaintiff could have successfully maintained that the order of the court was made without jurisdiction, it is an answer to the plaintiff's claim. It was contended by Mr. Robson that the word "duly" in section 483 (2) implies "correctly made in point of law," and that the statement in the order in question as to the way in which the court dealt with the plea that the carriage of contraband vitiated the agreement showed that the order was not duly pronounced. I cannot accede to this argument as to the meaning of the word "duly." At the outside it seems to me that it enacts that the proceedings must be regular—i.e., the parties summoned on some definite charge, and parties and witnesses heard, and the case determined. I have, however, looked through the evidence which was before the court, and I am not satisfied that the passage which has been so much criticized bears the construction which the plaintiff puts on it. Whatever may have been the true facts there was no substantial evidence before the court that the vessel was carrying contraband of war, and in my opinion it is quite consistent with the above passage that the court rejected the plea upon the ground that they were not satisfied with the allegations made by the witnesses called on behalf of the seamen. In the view I take it is unnecessary to consider what the rights of the plaintiff would have been if the question for decision were the effect upon the contract of service of the carrying of contraband of war. Some claim was made on behalf of the plaintiff in respect of the seamen's effects, but no facts were proved before me to show that the defendants were responsible for the loss of the seamen's effects, and inasmuch as the action was really brought to try the question whether the seamen were entitled to their wages, notwithstanding that they had been dismissed from the ship, I think that this action must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

NORTON AND OTHERS v. YATES. (a.)

Company—Judgment creditor—Garnishee order nisi—Debentures — Floating security — Appointment of receiver and manager—Right to garnished debt as between receiver and garnishor.

A judgment creditor of a company obtained a garnishee order nisi attaching a debt due to the company and served the order nisi upon the debtor of the company. After service of the garnishee order nisi, but before it had been made absolute, an order was made in a debenture-holders' action against the company appointing a receiver and manager. On the day following the appointment of the receiver and manager the garnishee order nisi was made absolute.

Held, that, regard being had to the conditions indorsed upon the debentures, as well as to the general nature of a debenture security, the receiver was entitled to the garnished debt as against the judgment creditor.

The dictum of James, L.J., in Ex parte Joselyne, 26 W. R. 645, 8 Ch. D., at p. 330, to the effect that service of a garnishee order nisi transfers the property in the debt absolutely to the garnishor, disapproved.

Interpleader issue.

The question to be determined in this issue was whether the receiver and manager appointed by the court on behalf of the debenture-holders of a company was entitled to receive certain sums of money paid into court by various debtors of the company to abide the trial of this issue, as against a judgment creditor of the company who had obtained garnishee orders nisi attaching the debts due to the company, and had served the orders nisi upon the debtors of the company prior to the appointment of the receiver.

On the 17th of January, 1905, the defendant Yates (referred to in this report as "the judgment creditor") obtained judgment against Walter Jones & Sons (Limited) (referred to in this report as "the company") for the sum of £520, and upon the same day obtained garnishee orders nisi attaching certain debts due to the company and served the orders nisi upon Henry Tate & Sons (Limited) and other debtors of the company.

On the 19th of January, 1905, an order was made in a debenture-holders' action against the company appointing the plaintiff Norton receiver and manager, and by a letter of even date notice was given by the solicitors for the debenture-holders to the judgment creditor of his (Norton's) appointment as receiver.

On the 20th of January the garnishee order nisi against Tate & Sons were made absolute.

By a letter dated the 23rd of January, notice was given by the solicitors for the debenture-holders to the judgment creditor that the receiver claimed the amount due from Tate & Sons and all other debts due to the company, and in consequence of this claim an order was obtained on the 9th of February directing the payment into court of the moneys due from Tate & Sons. On the 1st of March the judgment creditor applied by summons for payment out to himself of the moneys paid into court, and an order was made directing the trial of this issue and that certain of the debenture-holders should be joined as co-plaintiffs with the receiver.

Certain other judgments were also obtained against the company by the judgment creditor, and in consequence of such judgments garnishee orders nisi were served upon various debtors of the company either on or subsequently to the 19th of January, 1905. The moneys so attached were, in consequence of the claim made by the receiver, directed by various orders to be paid into court to abide the trial of this issue; but only the question with regard to the £434 due from Tate & Sons was argued at the hearing, as being most favourable to the judgment creditor.

The conditions indorsed upon the debentures in so far as material to the present issue were as follows:

By condition 1 the debentures were to be "a specific charge upon the property of the company," and the company was not to be at liberty "to create any mortgage or charge in priority" to the debentures.

By condition 2 the principal moneys secured were immediately to become payable if the company should "assign, charge, or attempt to assign, charge, or otherwise deal with its book debts out of the ordinary course of business," and also if any of the property subject to the security should be "taken in execution or otherwise by operation of law be taken out of the control of the company."

By condition 5 the company was to be at liberty "in the course of its business and for the purpose of carrying on the same to use, employ, sell, lease, exchange, or otherwise deal with all or any part of the said property until one or more of the contingencies specified in condition 2 should have arrived, and from and after the happening of such contingency the liberty and authority hereinbefore given to the company should forthwith cease and determine, and the debenture charge should immediately become payable."

WARRINGTON, J., after stating the facts as set out above and the conditions indorsed upon the debentures, proceeded as follows: One of the questions which arises in this case is as to the effect of a garnishee order. Now it is easier to say what its effect is not than what it is, and that question arose in In re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co., 38 W. R. 67, 43 Ch. D. 99, the point in that case being whether, after the garnishee order had been made absolute, the garnishor became a creditor of the garnishee; that is to say, whether the garnishee order absolute operated as an assignment of debt to the garnishor. The Court of Appeal held that the garnishor did not become a creditor of the garnishee, and that the debt did not pass to the garnishor either absolutely or by way of assignment. Bowen, L.J., says, in the course of his judgment (43 Ch. D., at p. 105): "I cannot see here that this statutory relation which was created originally by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and was perpetuated in the rules under the Judicature Act, is really a relation involving the creation of a fresh debt. There cannot be said to be any equitable debt. There is no assignment in equity, and I cannot see that there is any legal debt. There is an order of a court of common law that a sum equal to the original debt shall be paid by the garnishee to the judgment creditor, or, as an alternative, that execution may issue; but I think that the relation which is created by that section and the orders made under it does not create a debt at all; it creates an attachment of a portion of the debt, and in case of non-payment confers the right of issuing execution, and nothing more." Fry, L.J., in his judgment (43 Ch. D., at p 105), puts the same thing in rather different language: "The question, I take it, is, what is the meaning of the words 'bind the debt in his hands'? Now, it has been argued that it amounts to a transfer of the debt. If that was the meaning, it is remarkable that that word was not used, and that the order does not say 'transfer' the debt; but, further than that, the whole scheme of the order is inconsistent with its being a transfer of the debt. It is plain to my mind that there is no transfer of the debt. It is equally plain to my mind that the garnishee order, therefore, does not make the garnishor a creditor of the garnishee. What the order does is this, it gives the garnishor certain statutory rights; it enables the garnishor to say to the garnishee, 'You shall not pay to your creditor the money which you owe him.' It enables him to give a valid receipt and discharge for the money. It enables him, in the event of the money not being paid, to obtain execution. He has all those rights, but there is no transfer of the debt, and he is not created a creditor." Now it was argued by the defendant that the Court of Appeal had previously given a decision contrary to this in Ex parte Joselyne, 26 W. R. 645, 8 Ch. D. 327, and that James, L.J., in his judgment held that the property in the debt passed to the garnishor. That being so, it is necessary to see what the court actually decided in that case, and how far the dictum of James, L.J., is necessary to the decision. It seems to me that the real question in that case resolves itself under two heads: (1) Whether there is any difference between a garnishee order nisi, and an order absolute; (2) whether the judgment debtor could not still receive payment of the debt although the order nisi had been served. James, L.J., says in his judgment (8 Ch. D., at p. 330), that "this property in the debt . . . was absolutely transferred from the judgment debtor to the judgment creditor. . . . The property in the debt was transferred, and there was a complete and perfect security the moment the order of attachment was served." I do not think that was necessary to establish the decision in that case, and it has been pointed out by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., in Geisse v. Taylor, [1905] 2 K. B., at p. 663, that the dictum of James, L.J., cannot be taken literally. For these reasons I think Ex parte Joselyne does not prevent me from holding that service of the order nisi does not transfer the debt from the judgment debtor to the garnishor. What it does is simply to give the garnishee the right to say, "I will not pay the debt to my original creditor, but to the garnishor." That being so, the debt remains the property of the judgment debtor, and such right as the garnishor has over it is subject to all the rights and equities attaching to it in the judgment debtors' hands. This point has often been decided, and I need only refer to two authorities—namely, Badeley v. Consolidated Bank, 35 W. R. 136, 38 Ch. D. 328, and In re London Pressed Hinge Co., 53 W. R. 407, [1905] 1 Ch. 576.

The right of the garnishor, then, in the present case, being subject to all the rights and equities attaching to the debt in the hands of the company, it remains to consider what the true effect of the debenture security is. It is true that it is a floating security, but that is not all. It is subject to certain terms and conditions, and the real question is, what is the meaning of a floating security, having regard to the terms and conditions embodied in the debenture document itself? In the Government Stock Investment Co. v. The Manila Railway Co., 45 W. R. 353, [1897] A. C. 81, Lord Macnaghten says in his judgment, [1897] A. C., at p. 86: "A floating security is an equitable charge on the assets for the time being of a going concern. It attaches to the subject charged in the varying conditions in which it happens to be from time to time. It is of the essence of such a charge that it remains dormant until the undertaking charged ceases to be a going concern, or until the person in whose favour the charge is created intervenes. His right to intervene may, of course, be suspended by agreement. But if there is no agreement for suspension, he may exercise his right whenever he pleases after default." In In re Yorkshire Woolcombers Association, [1903] 2 Ch. 284, Romer, L.J., referring to the effect of a deed charging the book debts of the company, says in his judgment at p. 296: "Treating this as a commercial document—as it is—what was the meaning of it? Did it not contemplate that until the trustees thought it necessary to intervene . . . that a debtor might go and pay to the company a particular debt, and the company might receive it, and deal with the cash in the ordinary way in which it would be dealt with in the ordinary course of business? I think that certainly is what is contemplated by this deed . . . for if the trustees had been compelled or obliged to give notice to all the debtors of this company so as to perfect their security . . . the business of the company must have been stopped." Both these judgments seem to me to go upon the footing that debentures create a general charge capable of becoming a specific charge on the happening of certain specific events, but a charge existing before the happening of those events. In fact, that is the basis for the orders which are frequently made in the Chancery Division enforcing the debenture security before the happening of the specific events. That being so, the receivership order operates upon all the property of the company, and I have already held that this debt was the property of the company subject to the garnishor's right, and the right of the latter was subject to the debenture-holder's rights. Robson v. Smith, 43 W. R. 632, [1895] 2 Ch. 118, is not really an authority to the contrary, because there the garnishor had actually obtained payment of the debt from the garnishee, and the debenture-holders had not appointed a receiver, but had only given notice to the debtors to pay their debts to them. In my opinion it is not an authority which applies to the present case at all. It has been argued that, even if the garnishor takes the debt subject to such rights as the debenture-holders may have, the company has power to deal with its debts in the ordinary course of business, and that the effect of a garnishee order nisi, being equivalent to an assignment of the debts, amounts to a dealing in the ordinary course of business. I do not think that an attachment of a debt under a garnishee order nisi is a dealing in the ordinary course of business, and to support this view I need only refer to the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., in Davey v. Williamson, 46 W. R. 571, [1898] 2 Q. B. 194. Referring to the effect of an execution under a judgment he says ([1898] 2 Q. B., at p. 194): "We cannot assent to the view of the learned county court judge that a seizure under an execution on a judgment against the company is a dealing by the company in the ordinary course of business within the third condition indorsed on the debentures." The result, then, is that the receiver is entitled to the moneys paid into court by Tate & Sons to abide the trial of this issue, and à fortiori to the moneys paid into court under the other orders.

WORTHINGTON v. KYRNE. (a.)

Adulteration—Food and drugs—Adulterated milk—Inspector of nuisances, power to take proceedings—Local authority—Analyst—Justices—Jurisdiction—Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 20, 26; 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), ss. 3, 25, 28—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 39.

Magistrates have jurisdiction to hear and determine an information preferred under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, by an inspector of nuisances duly appointed by a town council, on behalf of the said council, although the said council be not one of the authorities referred to in section 10 of the said Act, and therefore not authorized to appoint an analyst for the Acts, and consequently not a local authority as defined by section 25 of the Act of 1899. Such a condition of things only affects the question as to the allocation of the fine inflicted by the magistrates, as dealt with in section 25 of the Act of 1875.

Case stated by the justices of peace for the East Riding of the County of York under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

On the 10th of September, 1904, an information was preferred by the appellant, an inspector of nuisances for the borough of Bridlington under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 6, against the respondent for that on the 4th of August, 1904, the said appellant did demand from the respondent as and for a sale to him a certain article of food—to wit, new milk, and that she the respondent then and there did unlawfully and wilfully sell to him and to his prejudice as and for such article of food a certain article of food which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article of food so demanded by the said appellant as such purchaser.

The justices refused to fully hear and determine the said information and dismissed the summons.

The grounds of their decision as set out in the case were as follows:

1. That the said proceedings were taken throughout under the direction and at the cost of the town council of the borough of Bridlington, and that such council was, by the appellant, the prosecutor.

2. That the said council not being one of the authorities referred to in section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and the charter of incorporation of the said borough providing as follows: "The council of the borough shall not exercise any of the powers or duties or be subject to the liabilities of the Acts relating to the police force or other matters mentioned in section 39 of the Local Government Act, 1888, but all the powers, duties, and liabilities in respect of such matters shall be exercised by and attached to the County Council of the Aministrative County of the East Riding of Yorkshire, and the area of the said borough shall for all purposes of the Acts relating to the county police force or other matters mentioned in the said section form part of the county in like manner as if it were not a borough"; such council was not a local authority authorized to appoint an analyst for the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and consequently not a local authority as defined by section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899.

3. That the said town council was not a local authority entrusted with the execution of the laws relating to the sale of food and drugs, and that it was not the duty of the said council to put such Acts into force and to direct its officers to procure samples as provided by section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, and pay the costs thereof and of analysis.

4. That the said town council not being such a local authority as aforesaid, the appellant could not, under the direction and at the cost of the said town council, procure such sample of food and submit the same to be analyzed, and subsequently under such direction and at such cost and on behalf of the said council institute the said proceedings.

The following facts appeared from the case: That the appellant was an inspector of nuisances for the said borough duly appointed by the said council, and that he had, under the direction and at the cost of the said council taken a sample of milk from the respondent; that at such cost aforesaid he had caused such sample to be analyzed by the public analyst appointed by the county council for the administrative county of the East Riding of Yorkshire; that Bridlington is a small incorporated borough not having a separate court of quarter sessions or a separate police establishment; that the town council had not power to appoint an analyst for the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and no such analyst was appointed; that in consequence of the result of the analysis so made as aforesaid the appellant had been instructed by the sanitary committee or town council of the said borough to prosecute the respondent.

The town clerk of the said borough appeared, on behalf of the town council, to conduct the prosecution.

Macmorran, K.C. (Bonsey with him), for the appellant, having stated the facts and read sections 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, of the 1875 Act, and section 25 of the 1899 Act, the court stopped him.

Avory, K.C. (E. W. Walker with him), for the respondents.—The question is not whether the appellant, as an individual, could take proceedings, but whether he could do so as representing the town council. The justices must first determine whether the appellant could prosecute in the capacity in which he did, before they make an order, for this reason: The order when drawn up, in the event of a conviction, must set out where the penalty inflicted, if any, is to go. Section 26 of the 1875 Act deals with the matter, providing that if a private individual prosecutes then the fine is to be allocated as directed in the case of other fines; but if the local authority prosecutes the penalty is to be paid over to it to defray the expenses of the working of the Acts. Hence, to ensure the practicability of drawing up the order, the justices must first determine whether the appellant can sue on behalf of the borough, and the case states that he could not.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I do not quite understand what has induced some ingenious person to take the point, nor how it could appeal to the magistrate. The Acts provide two sets of clauses, one to protect people who are proceeded against, and the other to protect people whose food is adulterated. The seller is protected by such clauses requiring samples to be taken, and by provisions making it compulsory on the local authorities to appoint analysts. The buyer is protected by the taking of samples and, upon the result of the analysis of such samples, being enabled to take proceedings against the seller. It is said that the jurisdiction of the magistrates to hear and determine such a case as this depends upon whether or not the inspector is appointed under such circumstances that the authority for whom he is appointed can itself take proceedings. I believe the only distinction is where the fine is to go in the event of a conviction. If section 26 is relied on, even then the case is covered by the second clause of that section. However, in my view the jurisdiction is imposed upon the magistrates, to hear and determine the case wherever an article of food is sold constituting a breach of the statute, as a result of an analysis taken in due form. I am clear in my own mind that the magistrates ought to have heard the case.

WILLIAMS v. BRITON FERRY BURIAL BOARD. (a.)

Burial Acts—Consecrated and unconsecrated parts of a cemetery—Sanction of Secretary of State—Rights of incumbent—"Services rendered"—Burials by Nonconformist minister—Burial Acts, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85), s. 32; 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134), s. 7; 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 15), s. 3.

A part of a cemetery which has been duly consecrated for the purposes of burials in accordance with the rites of the Church of England is consecrated ground, although the sanction of the Secretary of State, under section 7 of the Act of 1853, has not been obtained. The possible effect of the absence of such sanction may be that the fees could not be enforceable at law.

The incumbent of a parish is not entitled to any fee under section 3, sub-section 4, of the Burial Act, 1900, unless he has rendered services in respect of the burial.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the County Court of Neath.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the judgments of the court.

S. T. Evans, K.C. (John Sankey with him), for the defendants, the present appellants.

Meager, for the plaintiff, the present respondent.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The claim was by an incumbent for fees in respect of the burial of two persons in a cemetery which is under the control of the defendants, the Burial Board of Briton Ferry. The burials took place in a part of the cemetery marked C upon the plan, which was a portion of a large piece of land divided into four plots, and given to the district by Lord Jersey for use as a burial-ground. The plan was submitted in 1879 to the then Home Secretary for his sanction, which was necessary under section 7 of the Burial Act, 1853, of an allotment of the ground partly as consecrated and partly as unconsecrated ground. The sanction was given to the division into consecrated and unconsecrated portions "as marked on this plan," and the plan clearly showed that it was intended that only the green part, marked A, should be consecrated. But it is a curious fact that in 1882 the defendants themselves, by their clerk, presented a petition for consecration to the bishop of the diocese, in which for some reason or other he was requested to consecrate a portion of the cemetery which included plot C as well as plot A; in accordance with the prayer of the petition both plots were consecrated in due form. During the incumbency of the late vicar, who died in 1902, there were thirty-three burials in plot C, all these burials being those of persons who were not members of the Church of England, and who were not buried in accordance with the rites of that Church. The next burial was that of the late vicar himself, who was buried there because it was found impossible to comply with his wish to be buried in the churchyard of his own church. No doubt his relations buried him where they believed he would have desired to be buried—that is to say, in consecrated ground. I have no doubt that the decision of the learned county court judge as to the effect of consecration was correct and that this ground must remain consecrated until, as Lord Coleridge, C.J., said in Wood v. Headingly Burial Board, 40 W. R. 390, [1892] 1 Q B. 713, there has been some act which would have the effect of annulling the consecration that had been duly performed according to law; until this event happens this plot must, from the ecclesiastical point of view, remain consecrated ground. It is none the less consecrated because there has been no compliance with the direction in the proviso to section 7 of the Burial Act, 1853, as to obtaining the sanction of the Secretary of State to the division of the cemetery into consecrated and unconsecrated ground. It is unnecessary for us to decide, and I do not intend to express an opinion whether by reason of the noncompliance with the statutory provision contained in section 7 of the Burial Act, 1853, and the want of the prescribed sanction of the Secretary of State, the rights of parties who would otherwise be entitled, in respect of the consecrated ground, to the payment of burial fees are affected in regard to the power of enforcement at law. The county court judge has not expressed an opinion on this point, and in my view the consideration of it is not necessary to the decision of the case. So far I have dealt with the only point dealt with by the county court judge, and I agree with him it is impossible to treat this ground as anything but consecrated ground, because the ecclesiastical act of consecration was one to which the sanction of the Secretary of State was not necessary, and if a piece of ground is consecrated in accordance with the law of this realm in the Church of England it is equally consecrated whether that sanction has been obtained or not.

But now we come to the consideration which seems to me fatal to the plaintiff's claim. It seems to me to be the contention on behalf of the plaintiff that, assuming this to be consecrated ground, the plaintiff is entitled to recover these fees by reason of the provisions of section 3 of the Burial Act, 1900. I think that that is not so. As I read that section, putting it in its shortest and simplest form, the result is that, subject to certain reservations in favour of vested rights, there is to be no fee except for services rendered. There were matters existing at the passing of that Act in respect of which fees were payable, such as exclusive burial, erection of monuments, &c., and in respect of these, but these only, there is to be a reservation of right for the life of the then incumbent or fifteen years, whichever might be the longer period, but, subject to that only, services rendered are to entitle the incumbent to a fee. The burials in the present case were those of Nonconformists, and were conducted without any service in respect of burial being rendered by the plaintiff. It is clear that they were not burials which would entitle the plaintiff to fees for his services. Nor did they take place under section 5 of 43 & 44 Vict. c. 41, commonly known as Osborne Morgan's Act. There could be no claim to these fees under that Act. There is, I think, a further ground on which our decision might be based, and that is that, even assuming that these two fees might be payable although no services were rendered by the incumbent, the claim for such a fee could not upon the evidence before us properly be made against the burial board, whether it might be made against someone else or not. I think, therefore, for the reasons I have given, that the claim cannot be upheld and that the judgment should be reversed.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that this was without doubt consecrated ground. The ceremony of consecration was performed upon it, and not merely were the words of consecration uttered, but the legal act took place which made it consecrated ground; it must remain so. That is in accordance with the view of Lord Coleridge, C.J., in the case of Wood v. Headingley Burial Board.

If that were the only point for us to decide—and it seems to me to be the only point decided in the court below—there would be an end of the case; but we cannot let it remain there, for the real question is whether certain fees are recoverable from the defendants, the plaintiff's case being that they are recoverable simply because the ground is consecrated ground. I am unable to come to that conclusion. Under the Act of 1852 burial boards had the power of appropriating ground for the purposes of a cemetery and having it consecrated for the use of members of the Church of England. Under section 32 of the Act fees were recoverable by the incumbent or minister, who should "perform the duties and have the same rights and authorities for the performance of the religious service in the burial in such burial ground or in the consecrated portion thereof of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the parish of which he is such incumbent or minister, and shall be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials which he has previously enjoyed and received." It seems obvious that under that section the fees recoverable for burials in such portions of the ground as were alloted were to be earned and paid in the same way as former fees, and paid to the persons who performed the duties. Even before that statute it seems to have been the law that burial fees were only recoverable by those who performed the duties; and that is clearly the meaning of the statutory enactment. In the present case the plaintiff has performed no services, and it is plain to my mind that he does not come under section 32 of the Act of 1852; indeed, I think that this was practically admitted by the plaintiff's counsel. I do not treat as an obstacle in the way of the plaintiff the provisions of section 7 of the Burial Act of 1853, which besides re-enacting the sections I have already mentioned and applying them to the country generally as well as to the metropolis, adds a proviso that the new burial ground is to be divided into consecrated and unconsecrated portions in such proportions as may be sanctioned by one of his Majesty's Secretaries of State. In the present case this sanction was, by mistake or accident, not given to the allotment of this particular plot as part of the consecrated portion of the cemetery, and it may be assumed, though it is unnecessary for us to determine the question, that so far as the recovery of the fees is concerned (but only so far) there is no consecrated part of the cemetery unless the allotment of that consecrated portion has been sanctioned by the Secretary of State. I do not think it necessary to decide that point, because, wholly apart from it, there is obviously no right in the present case to recover these fees.

If the plaintiff cannot recover these fees under section 32 of the Act of 1852—and I have already given my reason for holding that he cannot—neither can he for the same reason recover them under section 5 of Osborne Morgan's Act. I understand it to be admitted by the plaintiff's counsel that these particular burials did not take place under that Act, and upon being asked under what Act the plaintiff was entitled to recover these fees, the answer was that they were claimed under section 3 of the Burials Act, 1900. No doubt if that section gives him the right to these fees, the plaintiff would be in a strong position, for there would then only remain the objection alluded to by my brother Kennedy, that the plaintiff is suing the burial board, who have not received the fees, but I do not think that that section assists the plaintiff's contention. The part of the section which has been quoted to us does not, I think, refer to this class of fees at all; it has, I think, relations to fees which are earned for other matters than services rendered. There may be such fees which an incumbent may be entitled to receive in respect of a burial ground analogous to those which he was formerly entitled, and may still be entitled, to receive in respect of a church or churchyard—that is, fees in respect of rights of exclusive burial or the erection of monuments or other matters covered by the language of section 3 of the Burials Act, 1900—"Any other matter whatsoever except for services rendered by him." It is obvious that section 3, subsection 4, refers to these fees and not to fees earned by services at burials. The proviso upon which the plaintiff's counsel relied turns immediately upon that subsection, and says: "Where at the passing of this Act fees other than for services rendered are payable in respect of any matter arising in any burial ground attached to or used for the purposes of a parish"—then follow words giving the incumbent the right to recover them for fifteen years. I think that the language of the proviso was the same as the language of the section which they follow. They do not refer to services in respect of burials at all, but simply to fees which are outside such services rendered and in respect of other matters, and for that reason I think that the plaintiff cannot rely upon that statute. I agree with what my brother Kennedy has said as to the remaining objection, and I think that, although this is undoubtedly consecrated ground, the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in this action.

RAINFORD v. KEITH & BLACKMAN CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Transfer—Non-production of share certificate on transfer—Inquiry as to non-production—Duty and liability of company—Loan to officer of company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 22.

A company dealing with shares in the company for its own benefit is affected with notice of a third party's interest where the agents, who managed the transaction on its behalf, are aware of the third party's interest. In such case the third party can recover from the company the proceeds of a sale of the shares effected in disregard of that interest of which it had notice.

Appeal from the decision of Farwell, J. (reported [1905] 1 Ch. 296).

The board of directors of the defendant company were empowered by the articles of association to confer on certa n of the officers of the association such powers as the board itself had, and to lend money and undertake other financial operations which might be useful to the general business of the company.

It appeared that a servant of the company and a registered holder of certain of its shares had borrowed from the plaintiff certain money which was secured by a transfer of the shares and the handing over of the share certificate.

After the loan the borrower obtained an advance from the company which was to be repaid partly by a sale of the same shares to a third party, who was to pay the defendant company the price thereof. This was done, and the sale came before the board for registration, and was registered without the production of the share certificate.

Thereafter the plaintiff applied to have the transfer to him registered, and produced the certificate, which bore on it the following memorandum: "Without the production of this certificate no transfer of the shares mentioned therein can be registered."

This registration was refused on the ground of the prior transfer without the production of the certificate, the absence of which had been accounted for by the borrower declaring that it was in the possession of a friend, but that there was no charge thereon. The plaintiff then commenced legal proceedings and claimed damages for the company's refusal to register the shares to him and for wrongfully registering a transfer of the same shares to a transferee without a production of the certificate therefor and without making any proper inquiry as to the non-production or without having any sufficient reason given for its non-production.

At the trial Farwell, J., gave judgment for the defendant company ([1905] 1 Ch. 296), and the plaintiff appealed.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of Stirling, L.J.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and T. Clarkson, for the appellant.—The company had notice of the facts. The certificate should have been produced or accounted for in accordance with the note on the certificate. The company were guilty of a breach of duty.

Upjohn, K.C., and Clauson, for respondents.—Notice to affect the company must be given to an officer qua officer. What was told the officers in question was told them as individuals. The company had no constructive notice of the borrower's circumstances. The director had no power to lend money without express delegation; the loan was ultrà vires.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 6.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., stated the facts as above and said: Now, the judgment of Farwell, J., delivered at the conclusion of the trial deals principally with points of law, and the facts are only stated in so far as is necessary to raise those points; the main facts so stated being that the learned judge finds that the board of directors acted with complete bona fides and believed Casmey's explanation of the absence of the certificate, but that if they did in fact owe a duty to the plaintiff to take reasonable and proper care they did not in fact discharge it. The learned judge then proceeds to discuss whether the defendants, by reason of the note at the foot of the certificate, or otherwise, have a duty to the plaintiff not to register without taking reasonable and proper care to have the non-production of the transferor's share certificate accounted for. He points out that the plaintiff, so far as he relies on the footnote to the certificate, must contend that it amounts to a representation which the defendants are estopped from denying, or that it is a contract with all persons to whose hands the certificate may come. He disposes of the estoppel on the ground that the estoppel is based on a representation (if representation there be), not of fact, but of intention of law, and that, as established by Citizens Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank, 22 W. R. 194, L. R. 6 H. L. 352, 360, no action will lie; and also on the ground that the plaintiff does not allege that he saw the footnote before he made the loan. And as to the suggestion that the footnote amounts to an offer to anyone into whose hands the certificate might pass—accepted and acted on by the plaintiff when he received the certificate as security for his loan, the learned judge holds that the foot-note is a warning only, and not an offer to contract. It is to be observed, however, that Mr. Gore-Browne, in his argument on behalf of the plaintiff, did not rely on the foot-note, but contended that a duty arose independently of the foot-note by reason of the operation of the certificate as a document of title issued by the company for the purpose of enabling persons to whom share certificates might be offered for sale or pledge to act upon the certificate as a document of title, and thus giving to shares a negotiability highly advantageous to the company issuing the certificate, which negotiability would be defeated if companies had no duty to call in one certificate of shares before it issued a s-cond certificate in respect of the same shares, or at least to obtain information reasonably accounting for the non-return of the certificate of the transferor.

I propose, before dealing with any of these questions of law, to state the facts as I understand them, because I think that it may be that the plaintiff has a good cause of action, independently of the question of law dealt with by Farwell, J., by reason that the defendant company may have received the £90, the proceeds of sale, with such notice and under such circumstances that ex æquo et bono they ought to treat the £90 as received to the use of the plaintiff, or because the plaintiff may be entitled to damages by reason that the defendants have by their conduct put it out of their power to exercise their discretion as to whether or not they shall register a transfer to the plaintiff based upon an equitable charge of which the defendant company had notice at the time when, by registering the transfer to Younie, the company did so put it out of their power to exercise such discretion. Now the facts seem to me to be these. The defendant company, by a cheque of the company, signed by the managing director, Keith, and countersigned by the secretary, Shillito, dated the 24th of June, 1903, and receipted on the cheque by Casmey on the 25th of June, and cashed on the 27th of June, made a loan of £180 to their servant Casmey. Such a loan it is now admitted was, having regard to article 116 (e), not ultrà vires of the company in the sense that it could not be ratified by the company; and it follows that the only question of ultrà vires which remains is the question whether the managing director had delegated authority to do that which it is admitted under the articles the board of directors might have done if not ultrà vires of the company. Now, the loan was arranged by Keith, the managing director, and Shillito, and I have not any doubt but that in making the loan Keith and Shillito professed and purported to act on behalf of the company. They submitted the proposed loan to the report of Hampsheir, the trusted accountant of the company, and he made a report which bears the stamp of receipt by the company dated the 26th of June, 1903. This report discloses that the certificate for Casmey's shares had been and was deposited as security for a loan. It follows that Keith, Shillito, and Hampsheir were all aware of the deposit of the share certificate as security for the loan. Farwell, J., rejected this document as not being evidence against the company; but, in my judgment, the report, bearing as it does the stamp of receipt by the company placed on it by an officer of the company whose duty it was to register the receipt, primâ facie is evidence against the company, and I find nothing in the evidence given in this action negativing this presumption of agency which makes this report admissible in evidence against the company. On the contrary, the evidence to which I will presently call attention shows ratification by the defendant company of the loan with reference to the making of which Hampsheir's report is addressed. Of course, if the conclusion is right that the report was received by the officers of the company in the execution of their duties, one must, unless and until the contrary is proved, impute to the board of directors, and through them to the company, notice of the fact that Casmey, to whom the company made the loan of £180, had pledged the share certificate with somebody as security for a loan; but even apart from the report there is written evidence that the company had notice or knowledge that the shares the transfer of which the company registered in the name of Younie were in fact held by a friend of Casmey's, although Casmey says for no consideration. I refer to the receipt and declaration of Casmey bearing date the 25th of June, as to which the solicitors of the defendant company write on the 26th of October the following letter to Mr. Brown, who, as solicitor for the plaintiff, had written on the 24th of October, 1903, threatening to institute proceedings against the defendant company. [His lordship read the letter, which inclosed copies of the receipt and the declaration and refused to recognize any claim by the plaintiff, and continued:] It seems to me impossible not to treat this letter of the 26th of October as conclusive against the company to show that the inclosed documents, both the receipt and the declaration, were received by the company on the 25th of June, and the company must be taken to have had notice of the contents of these two documents at the time when the company received the cheque dated the 27th of June for £90, the consideration for the transfer from Casmey to Younie, which cheque, it is to be noted, is drawn to the order of the company and at the time when the company registered the transfer to Younie. The result is that the company must be taken, at the date of the registration, to have had knowledge of the loan of £180 to Casmey and of the arrangement whereby Casmey was to repay that loan by the sale of 120 shares and by deductions to be made in future from his salary. The cheque for £90, drawn upon the Commercial Bank of Scotland, duly passed to the credit of the defendant company at the Bank of Scotland on the 29th of June. It seems to me not only must, on this evidence, knowledge of the contents of these documents be imputed to the company, but also the knowledge of the agents through whom the transaction thus ratified by the company was carried out. This does not mean that the company are affected with notice of a trust, but it does mean that the company received the £90 under such circumstances and with such knowledge that ex æquo et bono the money must be treated as received to the use of the plaintiff. I will now deal with some of the objections which were urged in argument against the conclusion which I have just mentioned. It was urged that the managing director Keith had no authority to enter upon the loan arrangement with Casmey, or to draw the cheque for £180 for the purpose of making the loan, without a special delegation under article 98 of the articles of association, which runs thus: [His lordship read it, and continued:] The answer to this seems to me to be that even if, generally, it is necessary to prove such special delegation, the receipt of the 25th of June is sufficient ratification of the loan arrangement which Keith purported to make on behalf of the company to render antecedent delegation unnecessary. There is no direct evidence as to whom this receipt was given, but the cheque for £180, and the cheque for £90 in part repayment, were recognized by the company without objection. Next, it is said that this evidence of ratification, or, at all events, the imputation of the knowledge of the loan and its terms, is negatived by the evidence of Mr. Alsop, the chairman. I cannot agree. The evidence of Mr. Alsop goes to his personal knowledge only. The letter of the 26th of October is primâ facie evidence that the loan transaction was brought to the knowledge of the company at or about the date of the inclosed documents. It was for the defendants to displace this primâ facie proof. They do not do this. Not a word is said in explanation of the letter of the 26th of October, or in correction of the facts therein alleged. Of course, if one is to assume that which Farwell, J., seems to find —that the company received the £90 in good faith without the knowledge of facts from which the reasonable inference was that they were receiving moneys which Casmey had no right to deal with as against the plaintiff Rainford—the defendant company have a right to retain that money; but I think that it is impossible to assert this of Keith, the director, or of Hampsheir, the agents who carried through the transaction and whose act in making the loan and receiving part repayment out of the proceeds of the sale of the shares was, if not a transaction within their authority, at least a transaction ratified by the company as a transaction done on behalf of the company: see Thompson v. Clydesdale Bank, [1893] A. C. 282. The result is that I think this appeal must be allowed, and the defendant company ordered to pay to the plaintiff the £90, the proceeds of the sale to Younie of the shares in question; and, as I understand the plaintiff is content with this result, it is unnecessary to deal with the questions of law raised by Mr. Gore-Browne as to whether a company, by issuing a certificate, incur any obligations except to the persons to whom the share certificate is issued.

ROMER, L.J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgments of my learned brethren, and, having carefully considered the facts of the case, will only say that I agree with them.

STIRLING, L.J.—In June, 1903, one William Casmey was in the employment of the defendant company as manager of the company's business at Leeds, and was the registered holder of 120 shares in the company. On the 23rd of June, 1903, he wrote to James Keith, the managing director of the defendant company, a letter in which he stated that he was in financial difficulties and asked for assistance, saying that he would like an advance of £180, which he would return at £25 quarterly and pay 6 per cent. for it. Keith replied by a letter dated the 24th of June to the effect that, having consulted Mr. Shillito, the secretary of the company, he had sent Mr. Hampsheir, the accountant of the company, who would do his best to arrange matters, and to whom he, Casmey, was to be perfectly frank and open and disclose everything, and whatever Hampshier proposed he must agree to in writing. Hampshier made arrangements which, according to documents dated the 25th of June, signed by Casmey, amounted to this, that an advance of £180 should be made to Casmey by the company, and should be repaid, as to £90 by the proceeds of sale at that price of Casmey's 120 shares to one Alexander Younie, and as to the balance by monthly deductions from his salary of not less than £8. Casmey accordingly executed a transfer dated the 25th of June, 1903, of the shares to Younie, who paid the price by giving a cheque dated the 27th of June, 1903, in favour of the defendant company for £90. This cheque was paid into the company's bankers and duly honoured on the last-mentioned date. On the 29th of June, 1903, the transfer by Casmey to Younie came before the board of directors for registration and was passed and registered. During all this time the certificate of the shares was in the hands of the plaintiff, having been deposited with him by Casmey as security for a loan. In October, 1903, the plaintiff discovered that the shares had been transferred and registered in the name of the transferee without any notice to him, and threatened legal proceedings against the company. Thereupon the company's solicitors wrote a letter to the plaintiff's solicitors, dated the 26th of October, 1903, in which they say, "We think it only fair to Mr. Rainford and yourself to forward you a copy of two documents which were signed by Mr. Casmey and given by him to our clients on the 25th of June last, of the existence of which documents we think it clear that both you and Mr. Rainford must have hitherto been ignorant. Under the circumstances our clients cannot, of course, recognize any legal claim by Mr. Rainford in the matter, and of course if he still chooses to institute legal proceedings against our clients they will defend such proceedings, and the result may be somewhat serious to Mr. Casmey." The documents, of which a copy was inclosed, were in the following terms:

"Leeds, June 25, 1903.

"Received of Messrs. James Keith & Blackman Co. (Limited) the sum of £180, which is to be repaid as follows:

(Limited) to retain £90

"W. H. CASMEY.

"Witness—J. W. Hampsheir."

"To the Directors of James Keith & Blackman Co. (Limited).

"I hereby declare that my share certificate No. 50 for 120 ordinary shares in James Keith & Blackman Co. (Limited) is in the possession of a friend of mine; that I have signed no transfer deed in respect of the said shares excepting only that deed in favour of Mr. Alex. Younie, and that the said shares are not held by my friend as a charge against any loan or other consideration. In consideration of your honouring the transfer deed in favour of Mr. Younie and issuing a certificate in his favour, I hereby agree to hold you indemnified against all loss arising from the non-return of my certificate No. 50. "W. H. CASMEY.

"Witness—J. W. Hampsheir."

The plaintiff issued his writ in this action on the 13th of May, 1904, and thereby claimed (1) a declaration that, by virtue of the deposit with him by Casmey of the certificate of the shares for the purpose of securing the repayment of the sum of £100, with interest at 5 per cent., lent to Casmey on the 18th of September, 1901, the plaintiff became entitled to an equitable mortgage on the shares, and on any moneys to arise from the sale thereof, for the amount of the loan, with interest; (2) to recover the sum of £90 paid to the company upon the transfer of the shares to Younie; (3) damages for wrongfully registering the transfer of the shares to Younie. At the trial the only witness called for the plaintiff was the plaintiff himself, who proved the deposit of the certificate with him as security for the loan mentioned. The plaintiff's counsel also put in the correspondence between Casmey and Keith in June, 1903; the cheque of Younie, the purchaser of the shares, dated the 27th of June, 1903, in favour of the defendant company; the letter of the defendant company's solicitors of the 26th of October, 1903, and the two documents there referred to; and also a third document signed by Casmey on the 25th of June, 1903, of which disclosure was made by the company's affidavit of documents. This last document the learned judge refused to admit. For the defendants the only witness called was the chairman of the board of directors of the defendant company, who stated that he was present at the board meeting of the 29th of June, 1903, when the transfer of Casmey's shares was passed and registered; that no certificate was produced to the board, but that they were shown Casmey's declaration of the 25th of June; that Casmey had been a faithful and confidential servant of the company for sixteen years and had always proved trustworthy; and that they believed him. He also said that he had not the remotest idea that Casmey was in financial difficulties, that Keith was present at the meeting, but he (the witness) had no idea why the transfer to Younie was made, and knew nothing of Younie's cheque to the company. On re-examination he said that nothing was said at the board on the 29th of June as to how the £90 was going to be paid or anything about it. Keith, Shillito, and Hampsheir were all present at the trial, but none of them were called. The learned judge held that the plaintiff had failed to make out any case for payment to him of the £90 received from Younie; and as regards the claim for damages, he further held that the plaintiff had failed to establish the evidence of any duty on the part of the defendant company, when considering the propriety of registering a transfer, to take reasonable care in registering the transfer, though, if such a duty did exist, he was of opinion that they had failed to discharge it. The judgment of the learned judge on the second part of the case, as to the liability of the defendants in damages for wrongfully registering the transfer of Casmey's shares, is reported in [1905] 1 Ch. 296; but there is no report of his judgment on the first part of the case, and we are ignorant of the grounds on which he came to the conclusion that that part of the case failed. Upon the appeal the decision of the learned judge was challenged as to both parts of the case. Now, the first of the two documents of the 25th of June, 1903, shows that a transaction was purported to be entered into between the defendant company and Casmey, one of the terms of which was that the repayment of the £90, part of the loan, was to be repaid by a sale of Casmey's shares. This document was certainly an equitable assignment of the proceeds of the sale of the shares to Younie; but, in my opinion, it went beyond this, and if the sale to Younie had gone off would have conferred on the company a right in equity to have the shares sold and the proceeds applied in payment of the advance made to Casmey. The persons who negotiated and carried out this transaction were the managing director and two officers of the defendant company. The loan was made out of the funds of the defendant company, and the cheque of the purchaser of the shares was made out in favour of the defendant company and was paid to the defendant company's account with their bankers. By this transaction the defendant company, primâ facie at all events, acquired for its own benefit an equitable interest in Casmey's shares. The declaration made by Casmey stated that the certificate of the shares was not in his possession, but in that of a friend; and although it was also stated that the shares were not held by the friend "as a charge against any loan or other consideration," it appears to me that any person dealing with Casmey in respect of those shares was thereby affected with notice that the holder of the certificate might have a charge on or other interest in the shares, and could not prudently deal with Casmey without ascertaining what the real interest of the holder of the certificate was. Where a company in which the shares are held sees fit to deal with the shares for its own benefit, then that company is liable to be affected with notice of the interest of a third party, and is affected with such notice if it is brought home to the agents who managed the transaction on its behalf: see Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, 35 W. R. 521, 12 App. Cas. 29. Now, Keith, Shillito, and Hampsheir all had such notice. Further, the two documents of the 25th of June, 1903, passed into the possession of the company and were put forward by the solicitors of the company acting on its behalf in October, 1903, as documents which justified the company in dealing as they did. It seems to me that in these circumstances the plaintiff makes out a primâ facie case entitling him to recover from the defendant company the proceeds of a sale carried into effect in disregard of the rights of the plaintiff of which the defendant company had notice. Now, how is this case met? It is said, in the first place, that the transaction was ultrâ vires of the company. It was pointed out that the memorandum of association of the defendant company does not expressly authorize the lending of money, and this is quite true. But the memorandum does, however, among the objects of the company, include the doing of all such things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the other objects. And by the contemporaneous articles of association the directors are empowered, amongst other things—article 116 (e)—on behalf of the company to lend money and generally undertake such other financial operations as might in their opinion be incidental or useful to the general business of the company. Regard being had to the decisions in Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., L. R. 19 Eq. 358, and In re South Durham Brewery Co., 34 W. R. 126, 31 Ch. D. 261, I think that the lending of £180 to a faithful and confidential servant of the company cannot be held to be beyond the powers of the company. It was said, however, that there was no evidence that the transaction had been sanctioned by the board of directors; but the transaction was carried out with the sanction of the managing director of the company, on whom the board of directors are authorized by article 98 to confer such powers, or any of them, as are possessed by the board themselves. No evidence was given by the defendants as to what limits (if any) had in fact been imposed on the managing director's powers. No evidence was given that the transaction had ever been repudiated by the board, and, on the contrary, the transaction itself is put forward by the company's solicitors on the 26th of October, 1903 (and, it must be assumed, with the sanction of the company), as one which justified the company in resisting the plaintiff's demand. In the total absence of any explanation whatever by the chairman of the board of directors, or any one else on behalf of the company, of what had actually taken place, I think that the transaction ought to be held to bind the company, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendants the £90 received by means of Younie's cheque. Taking this view of this portion of the case, I think it is unnecessary to express any opinion on the important question decided by Farwell, J., as to the duties of a board of directors with reference to the registration of transfers. I cannot part with the case without referring to the third document signed by Casmey on the 29th of June, 1903. With great deference to the learned judge, I think that this document was admissible against the company. It shows that Casmey stated in writing to Hampsheir, contrary to the declaration which I have already read, that he had given his friend his share certificate as security for a debt; and consequently that Keith had actual notice that the certificate was so held. I do not understand how two inconsistent documents came to be executed by Casmey on the same day, and how reliance came to be placed on that one of the two which proves to be inaccurate; and I regret that no explanation as to this was given on behalf of the company. But in the absence of such explanation I have proposed to rest my judgment on the documents put forward by the company's solicitors in their letter of the 26th of October, 1903, without taking the third document into account. I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

GOSSELIN v. GOSSELIN. (a.)

Will—Conditional bequest—Hereditaments—Condition to resettle—Money upon trust for investment in land.

A testator gave a life interest in his estate to his son upon the condition that he should resettle the "hereditaments subject to the limitations" of the will of testator's father within a year of testator's death. The son was tenant in tail of lands under the will of testator's father, part of which had been sold and was represented by money held upon trust for investment in land.

Held, that these moneys were "hereditaments" which must be resettled in order to comply with the directions in the will of the testator.

Basset v. St. Levan, 43 W. R. 165, discussed and followed.

In re Duke of Cleveland's Settled Estates, [1893] 3 Ch. 244, followed.

By his will Sir Martin Gosselin settled his mansion-house at Blakesware and all his real estate upon trusts, under which his widow was entitled to the rents and profits until some child or grandchild of the testator should attain twenty-five, and under which Alwyn Gosselin, his only son, and at the date of this summons in his twenty-third year, would, on attaining twenty-five, be tenant for life in possession. The testator's residuary personal estate was left to trustees upon trust to invest in land to be settled upon the trusts declared of the real estate.

There was, however, a proviso in the will of the testator that the estate for life so limited to A. Gosselin was conditional upon his, within twelve calendar months after (in the events which had happened) the testator's death, resettling the residue of the personal estate of the testator's father, M. H. Gosselin (which the testator by his will, in exercise of a special power of appointment, appointed to him), upon the trusts declared concerning the residuary personalty of the testator. He must also, in order to participate in the testator's estate, "resettle the hereditaments" of which he was tenant in tail under the will of the above-mentioned M. H. Gosselin, his grandfather.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died on the 26th of February, 1905, leaving residuary personalty and real estate estimated at £17,000. The real estate subject to the trusts of the will of the testator's father, M. H. Gosselin, of which A. Gosselin was tenant in tail, was of much greater amount, and the residuary personalty of that estate was worth about £70,000.

A difficulty arose in carrying out the testator's directions because considerable real estate of M. H. Gosselin had been sold during the life of Sir Martin Gosselin, the testator, and was now represented by securities worth £37,263, held upon trust for investment in land upon the trusts of the will of M. H. Gosselin. It was desired to ascertain whether it was necessary to settle these moneys as being "hereditaments subject to the limitations of that will."

The question asked by this summons was "whether in order to perform the condition contained in the said will of the said Sir Martin Gosselin that the plaintiff should within, in the events which have happened, twelve calendar months after the testator's death, both settle the residue of the personal estate of the above-named Martin Hadsley Gosselin, the testator's father, if and so far as the appointment in the testator's will might operate in the plaintiff's favour; and also should enlarge the estate in tail male or in tail to which he was entitled under the will of the said Martin Hadsley Gosselin in all the hereditaments devised by that will or then subject to the limitations thereof to which the plaintiff was entitled for that estate in tail male or in tail; and should resettle those hereditaments to the uses by the said will of Sir M. Gosselin limited of the hereditaments thereby devised; and whether it was necessary or proper that the plaintiff should enlarge the estate in tail male or in tail to which the plaintiff is entitled under the said will of the said M. H. Gosselin in the moneys, stocks, and securities which at the death of the said Sir M. Gosselin had arisen from the sale of hereditaments devised by the last-mentioned will, and were held under the provisions of such will upon trust for reinvestment in lands, and should resettle such moneys, stocks, and securities upon the trusts declared by the said will of Sir M. Gosselin concerning the net moneys to be produced by the sale and conversion of the personal estate of the said Sir M Gosselin or otherwise."

T. T. Methold, for A. Gosselin, the plaintiff in the summons, contended that the reasoning in Chandler v. Pocock, 28 W. R. 806, 15 Ch. D. 491, applied, and that the plaintiff being absolutely possessed of the moneys representing proceeds of real estate, subject to disentailing, they were not "hereditaments" and so not liable to resettlement under the testator's will.

G. W. Brabant, for the defendants other than the trustees of the will.

W. A. Russell, for the trustees.

FARWELL, J., stated the facts and continued: The question is whether the condition for resettlement in the will of Sir Martin Gosselin compels his son to settle moneys representing parts of the real estate sold in the lifetime of his father. That depends upon whether these moneys are properly described as "hereditaments." In my opinion, on the true construction of this will these moneys are properly so described and must be settled in order to comply with the condition in the will. I am bound to take the date of the testator's death and to see how the property then stood. Now the word in the will is "hereditaments," that is something to be inherited, and moneys like these, held in the hands of trustees upon trust to invest in land, are hereditaments, since they can be inherited. In forming this conclusion I am very much assisted by what was said by the Court of Appeal in In re The Duke of Cleveland's Settled Estates, [1893] 3 Ch., at p. 250, "money which a testator has not got into his own hands, and which he has no right to have in his own hands, and which is held upon trust for investment in land, is, in our opinion, to be treated as real estate, although, if he has power to dispose of such money, he can dispose of it either as land or money, as he may think right." That seems to apply to this case, for here the money was not in the hands of the testator, and he had no right to have it in his hands as he had not disentailed. But, besides this, the present case is, in my opinion, not distinguishable from Basset v. St. Levan, 43 W. R. 165. The only doubt in that case arose from the difficulty of construing "hereditaments" in a larger than its supposed technical sense. Stirling, J., thought that in construing a will he was not bound to restrict the meaning of "hereditament" to something that could be inherited, as it was not used as a word of art in a technical sense. Moreover, in the present case the word "hereditament" is enlarged by the addition of the word "estates." But even without this, I am of opinion, as already said, that the word "hereditaments" is sufficiently large, construing it as I have done, to describe money held upon trust for investment in land where the testator, as here, has no power to dispose of it as money.

Case stated by justices of Liverpool.

The respondent Richard Lewis was summoned under section 4 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, for keeping a carriage without a licence.

The vehicle in question was an ordinary governess cart with cushions in it, which was used by the defendant solely for the purposes of his business—that of a general broker and wardrobe dealer. He never used it to solicit orders or for collecting debts, and only drove it to private houses to call for and bring away goods after receiving orders. He had had the governess cart specially strengthened to go long distances, as his business called him to different parts of Lancashire and Cheshire. His name with the word "Liverpool" was painted on the shaft of the carriage in letters over an inch long.

The appellant contended that the vehicle did not come within the exception of "a wagon, cart, or other such vehicle constructed or adapted for use and used solely for the conveyance of any goods or burden in the course of trade or husbandry," and cited Hanworth v. Williams, 67 J. P. 315, 19 Times L. R. 384, in support of his argument. On the other hand the respondent's solicitor contended that such exception protected his client.

The magistrates were of opinion (a) that the vehicle was adapted for use for the conveyance of goods in the course of the respondent's trade; (b) that the vehicle was used solely in connection with the respondent's trade; (c) that the real use of the vehicle under ordinary circumstances was for the conveyance of goods in the course of the respondent's trade; (d) that it would be unduly straining the excepting words of the statute if their meaning precluded the vehicle being used at any time and under any circumstances for any other purpose than the conveyance of goods; (e) that a strictly literal construction of the words in the exception would forbid the vehicle being used at all when empty without a licence; and (f) that it was a question of fact for them to decide whether the vehicle in question came within the exception referred to; and they dismissed the information.

The informant appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the appellant.

No one appeared for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The argument that has just been addressed to the court shows that one cannot be too careful not to express opinions on points which are not absolutely necessary. In Hanworth v. Williams I think I was probably misled by the course of the argument into saying something which was not necessary and which I do not now think was right.

I think that the true construction of the words of the exception in section 4 of the Act is "constructed solely for the conveyance of goods," "fitted for use solely for the conveyance of goods," and "used solely for the conveyance of goods." I do not accept the view that the vehicle must be something ejusden generis with a waggon, meaning thereby a heavy vehicle, as was held in Danby v. Hunter, 28 W. R. 228, 5 Q. B. D. 20, referred to during the argument, because a cart may be either very heavy or very light. Neither do I think the question of taxation or non-taxation ought to depend upon the weight of the vehicle or the character of the vehicle in that sense if the other conditions are fulfilled. I think the Attorney-General is right in saying that the effect of the alteration in section 4 of the Act of 1888 of the words contained in the previous Act (Inland Revenue Act, 1869, s. 19, sub-section 6) is to impose a further limit upon the exemption. Therefore, taking it to be a vehicle which has to be either constructed or adapted and used solely for the conveyance of goods, I am clearly of opinion that on the facts found as to the use of this cart the justices have misdirected themselves on a point of law. In their finding of fact they say in clause (b) that "the vehicle was used solely in connection with the respondent's trade." That is clearly not enough. That would cover the case of a man who went about soliciting orders in his own gig. In clause (c) they say that "the real use of the vehicle under ordinary circumstances was for the conveyance of goods." That again seems to me to overlook the condition of the statute, which only exempts a vehicle which is "constructed or adapted for use and is used solely for." When we look at the statement of the evidence upon which they have expressed their findings, it is obvious it included the case of user by the respondent going to a house and not knowing whether he would find any goods in it to take away. The magistrates therefore have not applied the proper construction of the statute and have not properly directed themselves in order to ascertain the proper question of fact. The argument of the Attorney-General must prevail, and this vehicle under the circumstances ought, upon the findings of fact, if properly directed, to be liable to taxation.

The case must therefore go back to the magistrates to convict.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think the natural grammatical sense of the phraseology which has been used is that the word "solely" attaches itself to the three members of the preceding phrase, to which it can reasonably attach. If it was intended that "solely" should attach only to the part of the phrase which says "is used," I agree with the Attorney-General that the natural way of expressing that would be to say "is solely used," because that would prevent the argument which has been raised, and I think successfully raised, that it ought to apply to the whole three. Now, it is very true that the phraseology of Acts of Parliament is not always accurate, but I do not think that is a reason for construing the language of Parliament in an inaccurate manner; and, I think, unless there is some reason in the nature of things or some reason arising from the fact that to construe it naturally would create something unreasonable, we ought to follow the usual rule and treat Parliament as using grammatical language and as being reasonably correct in style, applying to it the same principle that we should to the use of language by any other intelligent body or person.

For these reasons I think it is quite clear that any expression of opinion which fell from the court in the case of Hanworth v. Williams, which might be deemed to conflict with this view, was an obiter dictum, and not at all necessary for the decision of that case, and therefore we are not bound by it when we come to a case where it is necessary to consider it.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is manifest that the words used in this Act of Parliament are not used very carefully, and that appears by the construction which was put upon it obiter, in one of the cases which the Attorney-General has cited. It seems to me that here upon the facts found it is apparent that this cart, or whatever it was—call it what you please—was not used solely for the conveyance of goods, and I think it appears that really it was not used mainly for the conveyance of goods. It is perfectly plain that this man, who was a wardrobe dealer, drove long distances about the country; he took a buyer with him; he did not know for certain that he was going to buy any goods, because if the price asked was too high it was obvious he would not buy. Therefore when it is said he used to call for and bring away goods after receiving orders, it does not mean orders for goods, but an order to call at a place. He called with the buyer. If the buyer and the seller agreed on the price, he put the goods into his trap and drove away. If there was no sale the goods would be left where they were, and he would go on to some other place for which he had an order. I think that is clear, and I therefore think that this is a kind of cart or trap, or whatever you choose to call it, which the Legislature intended to tax when it passed the Act of Parliament.

BROOKS v. BAKER. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary franchise—County vote—Ownership claim—Qualifying property situate in borough — Servant of owner entered on Division II. of occupiers' list for same property—Representation of the People Act, 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 24—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), s. 3.

Section 24 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832, enacts that no person shall be entitled to a county vote in respect of his estate as a freeholder in any house "occupied" by himself, capable, as regards value, of conferring on him the right to vote in respect thereof for any borough.

Section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, enacts that "where a man inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any service, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such service, he shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act and of the Representation of the People Acts, to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as tenant."

The fact that a servant of the freehold owner of a dwelling-house situate within a Parliamentary borough has been rightly entered in Division II. of the occupiers' list for the borough as an inhabitant occupier of the dwelling-house by virtue of his service, under section 3 of the Act of 1884, does not oust the occupancy in respect of the dwelling-house of his employer the freeholder, and thereby enable the employer in respect of his ownership of the freehold to obtain a county vote to which he would not otherwise have been entitled, having regard to section 24 of the Act of 1832.

Case stated by the Revising Barrister for the Tewkesbury Division of the County of Gloucester.

The case was as follows: "The present respondents duly claimed to have their names entered in the Parliamentary ownership list for the parish of Cheltenham. The qualification of the respondent William Baker, as stated in his claim, was in respect of a freehold house known as Weimar Cottage, Cheltenham, and the qualifications of the other respondents were of the same nature. Due notice of the intention to oppose all the said claims was given by the appellant Brooks. The following were the admitted facts in the case of the respondent, William Baker. The claimant is owner of Weimar House and grounds and of Weimar Cottage referred to in the fourth column of the claim. Weimar House and grounds are occupied by the claimant, and he is on the occupation list of voters for the Parliamentary borough of Cheltenham in respect of such occupation with the description 'dwelling-house' as his qualification. Weimar Cottage stands within the grounds of Weimar House, but apart from it. It is occupied by the claimant's gardener, Joseph Woore, who, by reason of his service, is entitled to occupy it.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Woore is on the occupiers' list, Division II. (Service) of the said list of voters in respect of such occupation, and it is admitted that he is properly so entered. It was contended on behalf of the objector that the occupation of Woore in respect of Weimar Cottage was the occupation of the claimant, and that by reason of section 24 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832, the claimant being so on the Parliamentary list of voters for the borough of Cheltenham, was not entitled to qualify as an ownership voter for the northern or Tewkesbury division of the county of Gloucester in respect of the said cottage. I was of opinion that Woore was an inhabitant occupier as tenant within the meaning of section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, therefore that the claimant was not the occupier of the cottage, and had a good qualification in respect of it as a freeholder, the value not being in question, and I allowed his claim. The other claimants were objected to upon the same grounds. It was admitted that in each of these cases the qualifying property described in the fourth column of the claim was a cottage or tenement in the occupation of the claimants' servant, which he was entitled to occupy by reason of his service; that the servant in each case was properly registered in Division II. in respect of such occupation; that the claimants were owners of the said cottages or tenements as well as of the principal residence in the grounds of which they were situate; and that the claimants were registered in respect of the occupation of their residences in the same manner as the respondent Baker. Upon these admissions and for the same reasons I allowed the claims. Due notice of appeal from my decisions was given by the objector. If the court be of opinion that my decisions were wrong, the register is to be amended by erasing the names of the respondents from the list of Parliamentary ownership voters for the said parish of Cheltenham."

Section 24 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45), enacts as follows: "No person shall be entitled to vote in the election of a knight of the shire . . . in respect of his estate as a freeholder in any house . . . occupied by himself . . . such house being of such value as would confer on him the right of voting for any city or borough, whether he shall or shall not have actually acquired the right to vote for such city or borough in respect thereof."

Section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), enacts as follows: "Where a man inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any . . . service, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such service, he shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act and of the Representation of the People Acts, to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."

R. M. Montgomery, for the appellant, the objector.—Wiemar Cottage being situate within the borough of Cheltenham, if the claimant Baker be the "occupier" of Wiemar Cottage, as well as being the freehold owner of it, he cannot claim to have a Parliamentary vote for the county in respect of his freehold ownership of the cottage, having regard to section 24 of the Act of 1832. The revising barrister held that because under section 3 of the Act of 1884 the servant Woore is to be deemed an inhabitant occupier of the cottage by virtue of his service for the purposes of the franchise, the claimant Baker can no longer be considered to be the occupier of the cottage, and therefore that he is entitled to the county vote in respect of his freehold ownership of the cottage. But that is not the effect of section 3 of the Act of 1884. The object of that section was only to provide for the extension of the household franchise to persons inhabiting dwelling-houses by virtue of service, and the section only enacted that the servant should "be deemed" for the purposes of the franchise "to be an inhabitant occupier as tenant of such dwelling-house." The section does not purport to oust the occupancy of the owner, and was never intended to abrogate the restrictions imposed by section 24 of the Act of 1832, and to thereby confer a county vote on the owner in respect of his ownership of the freehold. Before the Act of 1884 a man inhabiting a dwelling-house by virtue of his service or employment was not entitled to vote, because he did not occupy "as tenant": Dobson v. Jones, 5 Morr. & Gr. 112. Section of the Act of 1884 confers the Parliamentary franchise in such a case, but not the municipal franchise: M'Clean v. Pritchard, 36 W. R. 508, 20 Q. B. D. 285.

W. H. Clay, for the respondents, the claimants.—By section 3 of the Act of 1884 the servant Woore must be deemed to be "the occupier as tenant" of Wiemar Cottage. For the purposes of the Registration Acts, therefore, the effect of that section is to oust the occupancy in fact of Baker in respect of the cottage, although no doubt Baker would still be the occupier in law. But for the purposes of the Registration Acts and for the purposes of section 24 of the Act of 1832 the occupancy of the freeholder must be an occupancy in fact as well as in law, and therefore section 24 no longer applies, and Baker is entitled to claim the county vote in respect of his ownership of the freehold.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion this appeal must be allowed and that the register must be amended by expunging the name of these persons from the Parliamentary ownership list. There is much to be said for the argument on behalf of the appellant, that we must look at the object of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, s. 3, with which we have to deal, a section which comes under the heading "Extension of Household and Lodger Franchise," and which does not purport to deal at all with freehold voters. I think section 3 was simply framed for the purpose of enabling a man who inhabits a dwelling-house by virtue of his service or employment to get his vote as if he were occupying the house as a tenant. The gardener Woore therefore is to be deemed an inhabitant occupier of Weimar Cottage for the purpose of the Representation of the People Acts and gets his vote accordingly. But the question we have to decide is whether his occupation of the cottage puts his employer out of occupation so as to enable the employer to claim a freehold vote for the county in respect of the same cottage. I do not think that there is anything in the Act to say that the gardener is made the inhabitant occupier; he is only to be deemed an inhabitant occupier for the purpose of the Representation of the People Acts. The section seems to me to have been passed with the sole intention of giving a vote to the man who occupies a house by virtue of his service, and we should, I think, be going much too far if we were to say that the occupation of the servant excludes the occupation of the master in such a way as to give the master a freehold vote.

I do not desire to express any opinion as to the right of an employer to claim an occupation qualification in respect of a house also occupied by a person who by virtue of his service has obtained an occupation vote under the service franchise.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The court is sometimes obliged to put an interpretation on a word which it does not ordinarily bear, when, for instance, it has been enacted that something shall be deemed to be something else. Here I do not think there is that difficulty. Section 3 says that a person who inhabits a dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment is to "be deemed" an inhabitant occupier of that dwelling-house for the purpose of the Representation of the People Acts. It does not say that he becomes the only occupier, and I think the section means what it says, and gives such a man a vote as an inhabitant occupier, without excluding the occupation of the house by the employer. If the Legislature had intended to do this and to give the employer a freehold vote in respect of the dwelling-house, I think much stronger and more definite language would have been employed.

GREEN v. WANKLYN. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Mistake—Incorrect entry of voter's name in list—Omission of second Christian name of voter—Objection taken to entry—Absence of declaration—Power of amendment—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), ss. 24, 28 (1).

A voter's name was entered on the overseers' list as Herbert Green, and was duly objected to. The only ground of objection proved was that the right name of the voter was Herbert Ambrose Green. The voter had neither made a claim, nor a declaration under section 24 of the Registration Act, 1878, to correct the misnomer; but upon the hearing of the objection a party agent, on behalf of the voter, requested the barrister to treat the omission of the second Christian name of the voter as a "mistake" and to correct the entry, under section 28 (1) of the Registration Act, 1878. The barrister held that the omission was not a mistake which he was bound to correct after objection had been taken to the entry, and declined to amend and struck the name off the list.

Held, that the omission in the entry on the list of the second Christian name of the voter was a mistake which the barrister was bound to correct, under section 28 (1) of the Registration Act, 1878, even after objection had been taken to the entry, and even although no declaration to correct the entry had been made under section 24 of the Act of 1878.

Case stated by the Revising Barrister for the Borough of Colchester.

"At a court holden for the borough of Colchester on the 11th of September, 1905, objection was duly made to the name of Herbert Green being retained on Division I. of the occupiers' list for the said borough in respect of a dwelling-house, 20, St. Peter's-street.

"The facts were as follows:

"(1) The name of the occupier of the said house appeared in the list as Herbert Green, and it was proved or admitted that the correct name of the occupier of the said house was Herbert Ambrose Green.

"(2) In a considerable number of cases the Christian names of the voters were omitted from, or misstated in, the list, and in many cases the said voters had made either a new claim or a declaration in order to correct such omission or misstatement.

"(3) Herbert Ambrose Green had not made a new claim or a declaration.

"(4) I was asked to treat the omission of the second Christian name as a 'mistake' in the list, within the meaning of section 28 (1) of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, and to correct it.

"(5) I held that the omission was not a 'mistake' which I was bound to correct after objecti n had been made, and I declined to make the correction, and struck the name of Herbert Green out of the list.

"(6) The names of ten other persons . . . were objected to under similar circumstances, and were by me struck out of the list.

"(7) Due notice of appeal from my decision was given in each case, and I directed the appeals to be consolidated."

The Registration Act, 1878, s. 24, enacts that "Any person who is entered on any list of voters . . . and whose name . . . is not correctly stated in such list . . . may, whether he has received a notice of objection or not, if he thinks fit, make and subscribe a declaration . . . " for the purpose of correcting the misdescription. And section 28 of the same Act enacts that "A revising barrister shall . . . perform the duties and have the powers following: (1) He shall correct any mistake which is proved to him to have been made in any list."

C. E. Jones, for the appellant.—The question here is whether the omission of the second Christian name is a "mistake" which the revising barrister should have corrected. There is no reported case in which it has been held that the revising barrister could not treat this as a mistake and put it right. It is submitted that under the express words of section 28, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1878 the revising barrister has here decided wrongly. If this omission is not a mistake it is difficult to see what is. [DARLING, J.—Is not the person whose name is Herbert Ambrose Green the same person as Herbert Green?] Yes; but by a mistake the list abbreviates his name. [He was stopped.]

Lewis Thomas, for the respondent.—The point is concluded by the findings in the revising barrister's case. No evidence was given to identify "Herbert Green" with "Herbert Ambrose Green." The person who was on the list as Herbert Green may have been a different person to Herbert Ambrose Green, and have been put on the list intentionally, although perhaps wrongly, by the overseers. Herbert Green may have been the son or the father of Herbert Ambrose Green. [WILLS, J.—The revising barrister treats this mistake in the name as "an omission," and not as a mistake raising a question of identity at all. If it was an omission something must have been omitted, and we hear that the only omission was the man's second Christian name "Ambrose."] If the mistake or omission can be put right in the way now contended for by the appellant, the object of objecting to a name on the list is rendered nugatory. I submit that a person who wants a mistake corrected, after objection, must either make a declaration under section 24 of the Act of 1878 or make a new claim: Foskett v. Kaufman, 34 W. R. 90, 16 Q. B. D. 279; Hurcum v. Hilleary, 42 W. R. 321, [1894] 1 Q. B. 579. What happened here was, that there being an objection to the name of "Green, Herbert" on the list, someone on behalf of the appellant said that it ought to be "Green, Herbert Ambrose." The appellant himself did not appear before the revising barrister, or offer any evidence of his identity with Herbert Green, the name on the list. The barrister, as the name was objected to, properly struck it out of the list. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Cannot it be put against you that section 24 is only an enabling section, to enable the person interested to make a declaration if he likes?] I submit that the statute would not provide a means of doing something that need not necessarily be done. The man Herbert Ambrose Green may rightfully be the occupier of 20, St. Peter's-street, and if he had duly claimed in respect of this qualification would have been entitled to have his name inserted on the list; but he did not choose either to do that or to make a declaration under section 24, and therefore, the entry on the list of Herbert Green being wrong, and having been objected to, must be struck out. This is not a mere quibble, for the Act of 1878 does not give the revising barrister power to correct a mistake the effect of which correction may be to substitute the name of one person for another upon the list. In Moorhouse v. Linney, 33 W. R. 704, 15 Q. B. D. 273, a nomination paper signed by a voter with his full name, Charles Arthur Burman, was held invalid because his name appeared on the register merely as Charles Burman. The question of power to correct mistakes was considered in Plant v. Potts, [1891] 1 Q. B. 256, 39 W. R. Dig. 142, where it was held that "leasehold" could not be corrected into freehold. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—If the revising barrister had found that this was an erroneous description and that there was no evidence before him beyond the fact that the occupier of these premises was not Herbert Green, but a Herbert Ambrose Green, I think I should have been much impressed by your argument that he could not have treated this as a "mistake" which he had power to correct; but he treats it as an "omission" merely of the second Christian name of the real occupier from the list. That is very different.] In Kitchen v. Johnston, 47 W. R. 110, [1899] 1 Q. B 95, a misdescription of the qualifying premises was corrected as a mistake, although the entry had been objected to, but in that case the barrister had evidence that the correction did not alter the identity of the qualifying premises; but in the present case there is no evidence that Herbert Ambrose Green is the same person as Herbert Green whose name is entered on the list. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In Soutter v. Roderick, Barker's case, (1895) Fox & Smith's Reg. Cases, at p. 36, it was held that an incorrect entry of the voter's place of abode in the list, which had been objected to, was rightly amended by the revising barrister as being a mistake, although no new claim or declaration to correct had been made by the voter; that case seems very much in point.] That case only referred to the place of abode, and even before the Act of 1878 a revising barrister had power under section 40 of the Registration Act, 1843, to correct an incorrect description of the place of abode: Luckett v. Knowles, 2 C. B. 187.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am very glad that Mr. Thomas has argued this case, because if we had come to the conclusion that the meaning of section 24 was that a declaration was the only means or the only method whereby a person could set right a mistake of this kind, unless he came before the court himself, different considerations would have arisen. I quite agree if you look merely at the two sections (section 24 and section 28), without considering what I may call the general law applicable to such a matter, the fact that section 28 provides in a general way for mistakes being corrected, and that section 24 specifies a particular method for having such a misdescription as occurs here rectified, there might be some ground for saying, the particular matter being included in a particular section—namely, section 24—that the omission of part of a name was not a mistake within section 28. But in my judgment that would be too narrow a view. We have to remember here that a formal objection had been taken—that is to say, the person whose name appeared on the list as Herbert Green had been served with notice of objection; and therefore it is not a question of something which is done by the revising barrister of his own motion on some intimation made to him. Mr. Thomas suggested somebody jumped up in court and said: "That man's name is Ambrose." That is not the way in which it arises. There has been formal notice of objection given. Then it has been proved, or admitted, that the correct name of the occupier of the house was Herbert Ambrose Green. That being so, I think that it is, practically speaking, another illustration of the same kind of matter as that which was before the court in Soutter v. Roderick, Barker's case. In the present case there was no dispute as to who was the real occupier, no dispute as to who was the real tenant, but proof, or admission, which is the same as proof, merely that the second Christian name, "Ambrose," of the voter had not been put in the list; and that the revising barrister meant to raise that kind of point is to my mind clear, because he has treated it as one of eleven cases where similar omissions occurred. Therefore it cannot be suggested that he acted as he did because he was not satisfied that the appellant was the right man, or that there was not sufficient evidence that the right person had asked to have his name corrected. Under these circumstances it seems to me we ought not to cut down the power of the revising barrister to correct what is clearly a mistake in the ordinary sense of the word, because there is another section which enables the voter if he thinks fit to get the mistake corrected by another proceeding. Therefore I think we are really following out the line laid down in Soutter v. Roderick, Barker's case. It seems to me also most excellent good sense; and I think the revising barrister had power to make this correction, and ought to have made it. The appeal must be allowed and Herbert Ambrose Green's name will appear on the list and the other eleven names will follow in the same way.

WILLS, J.—I think section 24 applies to a considerable number of cases, in some of which the corrections to be made may be very important and may amount to a new claim, while in others the corrections are trivial or simply of the ordinary class of slips, clerical errors, and so on. If the person whose name is objected to deems it to be of sufficient importance or cares enough about it to take steps himself to have the error corrected, whatever it may be, then it seems perfectly reasonable that he should, if he does not want to attend himself, make a statutory declaration as provided by section 24 of what his qualification and name is, and what correction he desires to have made. If he sets the law in motion, so to speak, in that way, he must make the declaration. That certainly, to my mind, does not deprive the barrister of the power given him under section 28 to correct any mistake, and of course any mistake means anything which is either proved or admitted to be a mere slip and nothing else—which cannot be complicated with the suggestion made by Mr. Lewis Thomas that it might be the cover for a fraudulent claim and so forth. I think the revising barrister took too narrow a view of his powers, and I agree, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think it is quite plain from the case stated that the real qualified occupier was Herbert Ambrose Green, who had been described in the list as "Herbert Green." The amendment desired was merely, therefore to rectify an omission of something from his name. It was not a case where there was any possibility of substituting another person; it is no more to my mind a change of name than the altering of the spelling of the name of the real occupier would have been.

Appeal allowed with costs.

CHICHESTER CORPORATION v. FOSTER. (a)

Highway — Locomotive — Nuisance — Breaking water-mains—Excessive weight—Repair—Standard of maintenance—Locomotives Acts, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70), s. 13; and 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 83), s. 12.

The plaintiffs were the highway authority and the owners of the water system within their district.

Held, that the defendant, who was the owner of a heavy traction-engine, was liable to make good damage to a water-main laid under a road and broken by the weight of the engine passing over it, as there was no evidence that the water-main, which had been put down some years before, was not sufficiently strong and well laid to withstand the pressure of the ordinary traffic of the district; or of any negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, in reference to their duty to repair and maintain the road, that contributed to the fracture.

Appeal by the defendant from the judge of the Chichester County Court.

The plaintiff corporation were the owners of the waterworks at Chichester, and as such owned the water-mains under a road the subject of the action.

The facts found by the county court judge were substantially these: The mains were laid down some thirty years ago, and judged by the standard of to-day were not of the best construction, they were not laid on a cement bed and were only at a depth below the surface that left about twenty inches between the crown of the main and the crown of the road. The pipes, although they had been so long in the ground, were not corroded or decayed and were substantial, still fit to withstand pressure from ordinary traffic passing along the road. The mains in question were broken by the weight of a traction-engine belonging to and being at the time used by the defendant passing over the main at a spot where a supply pipe was connected with the main by a union —screwed into the main on its top side—the probable immediate cause of fracture being that the union became deflected under the pressure and so exerted a leverage on the pipe greater than the pipe could stand. There was no negligence or want of reasonable skill or care on the part of the owner of the engine or his servants as regards either the construction or the user of the engine, the mains being broken solely by its weight, which exceeded ten tons. Evidence was given to show that the mains were at the date when they were broken sufficiently strong and well laid to withstand the ordinary traffic of the district and that there was no negligence by the plaintiffs in their duty as the road authority.

On these facts the county court judge was of opinion that the defendant was primâ facie liable for the damage done by the engine to the pipes, on the principle that the engine was, under the circumstances, a dangerous thing, and that the defendant was liable for damage caused to the plaintiffs' property by the use of that dangerous thing upon the highway. The question whether a given machine when used on a highway was dangerous or not had to be considered in relation to the actual condition of things on or under or adjacent to the highway existing at the time of user, assuming that there was nothing in the condition of things of an unusual or exceptional character or arising from the illegal or negligent conduct of persons other than the person using the dangerous machine. If the water-pipes had been constructed of such strength or laid at such a depth or in such a protective bed of concrete or otherwise so as to withstand the pressure of ten or more tons passing over them, the defendant's engine would not have been dangerous in relation to those pipes, but under the existing circumstances the learned judge found that it was dangerous. He also found that the pipes were sufficient in strength and sufficiently well laid in relation to the ordinary and lawful traffic existing at the time when they were laid, and he did not think that there was any duty on those who laid the pipes, or on the plaintiff corporation, to take into account or to reconstruct their water system so as to withstand exceptional pressure arising from the use of these ponderous modern road engines which had only within recent years become at all common, and could not even now be considered ordinary traffic of the county. There was no default on the part of the plaintiffs contributing to the damage as there existed no duty, so far as he knew, on a local authority to strengthen or re-lay their pipes so as to enable them to withstand the increased pressure arising from the use of heavy traction-engines. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the damages claimed.

The defendant appealed.

E. B. Charles, for the defendant.—The Locomotives Acts of 1861 and 1865 legalize and regulate the use of locomotives on ordinary highways, and the defendant has in every way conformed to the requirements of those Acts. A locomotive must therefore be regarded as falling within the ordinary traffic of the district. Therefore no such considerations as arose in Rylands v. Fletcher, 3 H. L. 330, 17 W. R. Dig. 17, have to be considered here, because it cannot be said that an engine is a dangerous thing within the principle there laid down. The plaintiffs as the road authority are bound to keep the road up to the standard required for the ordinary traffic of the neigbourhood: Attorney-General v. Scott, [1905] 2 K. B. 160, 53 W. R. Dig. 63. The case of Gas Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry, 33 W. R. 892, 15 Q. B. D. 1, relied on by the plaintiffs and followed by the learned county court judge does not apply to the present case, because here there is an express finding by the judge that the defendant had not been guilty of negligence, and in the St. Mary Abbotts case there was a finding that there was negligence in the use of the steam-roller which caused the damage.

Hohler, for the plaintiffs.—The finding that the pipes were sufficiently strong and well laid to withstand pressure caused by the ordinary traffic of the district decides the question conclusively in favour of the plaintiffs. The damage was solely due to the excessive weight of the engine. The Locomotives Acts, 1861 and 1865, while imposing certain conditions and restrictions as to the tare, number of wagons, and so forth, which may be taken along the road, clearly show that every one using a locomotive on the road does so at his own risk if injury is thereby caused to others by such user where at common law he would be liable under the same circumstances. Gas Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry and Jones v. Festiniog Railway Co., 3 Q. B. 733, 16 W. R. Dig. 75, lay down the principle that should govern the present case.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It seems to me that the judgment of the county court judge in this case was perfectly right. Some stress was put on the fact that there was only one breakage, and it was attempted to show from this that but for some inherent defect in the pipe at this point no damage would have been done. That was only an incident in the case, and I do not think that a traction-engine is entitled to break a first pipe, as a dog is commonly said to be entitled to his first bite. It would have been perfectly open for the county court judge to have found that, notwithstanding the weight of the engine, the damage was caused by the pipe in its then position not being reasonably fit to bear what might be expected as the ordinary loads on the road, including traction-engines. If it could have been shown that the damage was occasioned by a breach of the plaintiffs' duty as the road authority to maintain the road up to the requisite standard, no doubt that would have been a defence to the action. This is not a case under the statutes, of extraordinary traffic. Therefore no such question as that raised in Attorney-General v. Scott has here to be considered. The fair result of that decision seems to be that a road authority, in the exercise of its duty, must keep the road up to date. But what are the facts here? The judge has found that the plaintiffs had not been negligent in their capacity of road authority, and that they were under no duty to provide against the excessive pressure of the defendant's engine. I think the principle of the decision in Gas Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbotts Vestry applies. No doubt it was convenient for the defendant to haul three trucks at a time and to use this heavy engine in doing so, but there was no suggestion put forward by his counsel that there was any necessity to use such a heavy engine. It is well established law that a person who exercises a right in a particular way in which damage might be caused to other people's property must show that the exercising of the right in the particular way was necessary to enable him to enjoy the right at all. There is no such evidence here. The defendant did not attempt to prove that he was compelled to use such a heavy engine as the one that caused the damage.

For these reasons I think the decision of the county court judge was right and that this appeal fails.

WILLS, J.—I have also come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. If it could have been shown that the damage they suffered was due to a failure of duty on their part in their capacity of road authority I agree that such a finding would have been an answer to the action. But the county court judge's findings disposes of any such contention that Mr. Charles could put forward for the defendant; and in view of those findings of fact which, in my opinion, conclude the case, we cannot interfere.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion, but as I do not altogether agree with the reasoning of the county court judge I prefer to express my view in my own way. Now the plaintiffs had the right and duty of maintaining the highway and the water-mains beneath. All persons, including the defendant, had the right to use the highway in the ordinary manner having regard to the kind of traffic which would usually pass along the roads in that district. Such a right of user must involve a duty on the plaintiffs as the highway authority to vary the construction of the road from time to time so as to adapt it to the traffic of locomotives which has become in course of time ordinary traffic of the district. That would be a duty no doubt the discharge of which might become more or less burdensome on the highway authority of a district according to the special circumstances of each case. The county court judge here has found that the defendant's engine was not of the sort to be considered on that road as part of the ordinary traffic. That alone would be sufficient, in my opinion, to make the defendant liable for the damage it did to the mains. It was not necessary to find, as the county court judge had done, that the engine was in itself a dangerous thing. Indeed, I very much doubt whether any thing could be called dangerous in itself, because whether a thing is dangerous depends on its environment. Water, which was the causa causans of the injury in Rylands v. Fletcher, could not be called in itself a dangerous thing; it only became dangerous under certain conditions. The expression "in itself dangerous" appears in the head-note to the report of that case in the Law Reports, but I have carefully looked through the judgments, and I do not find it so applied there. I do not myself consider it an appropriate expression except when used by Pope in regard to "a little learning." I, however, agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

REX v. PAYNE. (a.)

Criminal law—Wife stealing from husband—Receiving from wife—Felony—Misdemeanour—Sufficiency of averments in indictment—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 91—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 12, 16.

An indictment will lie for a common law misdemeanour in respect to the receiving of property stolen by a wife from her husband. It is not necessary (although better, per Channell, J.) in such an indictment to aver that the property was received from the wife.

Rex v. James [1902] 1 K. B. 540, discussed.

Case for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

William Payne was charged before the Common Serjeant at the November sessions of the Central Criminal Court on an indictment of which the following is a copy: "Central Criminal Court to wit: The jurors for our Lord the King upon their oath present that William Payne on the 6th day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and five at the parish of All Saints', Poplar, in the county of London and within the jurisdiction of the said court, certain money—to wit eighty-six pounds of the moneys of John William Price before then feloniously stolen and taken and carried away—unlawfully did receive and have, he the said William Payne then well knowing the said moneys to have been feloniously stolen taken and carried away against the peace of our Lord the King his crown and dignity."

It was proved that the money was stolen by Caroline Price, and that she was the wife of John William Price. There was evidence that William Payne received the money so stolen knowing both that Caroline Price was the wife of John William Price and that she had stolen the money from him.

Before the trial of William Payne, Caroline Price pleaded guilty to stealing the money from her husband.

It was contended by counsel for the prisoner: (1) That the indictment was bad in law as alleging the receipt of money stolen by a common law larceny, which is by statute a felony, and charging such receiving as a misdemeanour; (2) that the facts proved did not support the indictment, as it did not state that the goods were stolen by a wife from her husband; (3) that the receipt of goods with knowledge that were stolen by a wife from her husband was not a misdemeanour.

The prisoner was found guilty.

The following questions were reserved for the consideration of the court: (1) Was the indictment bad after verdict? (2) did the facts support the indictment? (3) was the receipt of goods with knowledge that they had been stolen by the wife from her husband a misdemeanour?

Jenkins, for the prisoner.—In Reg. v. Streeter, [1900] 2 Q. B. 601, it was held that under section 91 of the Larceny Act, 1861, a person could not be indicted for a felony in respect to receiving goods stolen by a wife from her husband, inasmuch as section 91 says that the stealing must amount to a felony at common law or by virtue of that Act, whereas stealing by a wife from her husband was not a felony at all until the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, made it so. Wright, J., in his judgment in the case cited, said: "In future cases there might be an indictment for receiving at common law." Acting upon this suggestion this indictment was preferred for a common law misdemeanour. But although receiving was at common law a misdemeanour, still by an Act of William and Mary, which is now consolidated in the Larceny Act, 1861, a receiver was made an accessory after the fact in respect to the principal stealing, i.e., receiving was henceforth a felony: vide Russell on Crimes, Bk. III., c. 28, p. 438 (6th ed.), and Chitty 951 (1816 ed.). Having been made a felony by statute, the common law offence of misdemeanour was gone: Rex v. Cross, 1 Raym. 711.

The prosecution was not represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my judgment this conviction must be affirmed. It has been contended that the offence which has been committed amounted to a felony, and that the prisoner could not therefore be indicted for a misdemeanour. If he could establish that under section 91 or any other section of the Larceny Act, or any other statute, the offence was made a felony, then it would be a good point. We cannot hold it to be a felony if our decision is to be consistent with the decisions of this court in Reg. v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 266, and Reg. v. Streeter. In Reg. v. Smith, which was an indictment under section 91, it was held that it was not an offence under section 91 to receive stolen goods, if the stealing is not an offence at common law or under the Larceny Act, 1861. The considered judgment of the court, which is given at length, decides that there must be, in order to support an indictment, a stealing at common law or under the Larceny Act, 1861, the words of section 91 being "whosoever shall receive . . . property . . . the stealing . . . whereof shall amount to a felony either at common law or by virtue of this Act . . . shall be guilty of a felony." That being a decision of the year 1870, in the later case of Reg. v. Streeter a point involving the same considerations arose. There the property had been stolen, and there the fact that the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, had extended the law of larceny was the ground for contending that there was not a felony under section 91. There Mathew, J., referring to the case of Reg. v. Smith says: "Reg. v. Smith was a case in which partnership property had been stolen by a partner and received by the prisoner, the stealing being a criminal offence by virtue of the Larceny Act, 1868, and it was held that the prisoner could not be convicted of receiving under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 91. Our decision must be to the same effect, that is, that the prisoner cannot be convicted of receiving property stolen by a wife from her husband." Wright, J., said: "But in future cases it seems to me that there might be an indictment for receiving at common law." Wright, J., seems to have intended an indictment for a misdemeanour at common law. It seems to me that, considering these two decisions which are based upon the express words of the section, we cannot give effect to the argument on behalf of the prisoner, unless we overrule these decisions, which decided that a charge of felony could not be maintained. If Mr. Jenkins could have pointed out any section which made the offence a felony, then the principle of Rex v. Cross would apply, which decided that when an offence by statute has been made a felony there can be no longer any offence of misdemeanour.

As for the second point, that the indictment only states that the money has been feloniously stolen from Price and received by Payne, it seems to me only another illustration of the same principle which we applied in Rex v. James, [1902] 1 K. B. 540, where we decided that it was not necessary to aver that the prisoner is the wife of the prosecutor. The contention is that in order to maintain the indictment it must appear on the face of the indictment that the stealing was not an offence at common law or under the Larceny Act, but by the Married Women's Property Act. It seems to me only repeating the argument to which we refused to give effect in Rex v. James. I think, therefore, on both grounds, the argument fails.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

CHANNELL, J.—I think there is some little doubt about the second question as to whether the indictment should show that the principal stealing was otherwise felonious than by the Larceny Act, 1861, or common law, but I think the case of Rex v. James covers the point. I think it would be safer in the future to put the averment in the indictment.

WALTON and SUTTON, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Bankruptcy — Property of bankrupt — Bill of sale— Apparent possession—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 8.

The bankrupt being indebted to a friend, and having no property but her furniture, transferred the furniture in satisfaction of the loan, and carried out the transaction by documents which were found in fact to constitute an absolute bill of sale. Subsequently the sheriff seized the goods in execution, and was actually in possession when the bankrupt filed her own petition. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed the furniture, and sought to set aside the bill of sale as void for want of registration.

Held, following Ex parte Saffery, In re Bremner, 29 W. R. 749, 16 Ch. D. 669, that the bill of sale could not be avoided, because at the date when the bankrupt filed her petition the goods were not in her possession or apparent possession, but in the possession of the sheriff.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Ellicott in the county court of Gloucestershire, holden at Cheltenham.

The bankrupt was a lady who had carried on for many years a boarding-house attached to a ladies' college at Cheltenham.

The respondent to the appeal was a lady who had formerly been a pupil at the college and a boarder in the bankrupt's house. She had lent the bankrupt £563 in 1901 and £275 in 1903.

In February, 1904, the respondent, being about to marry, wanted to get her money back, but the bankrupt was heavily in debt to others, and had no property but the furniture in her house. They appear to have agreed the total amount of the loan and interest at £900, but no definite arrangement was come to between them until the 26th of February, when the bankrupt met the respondent and the respondent's solicitor in London, and the four following documents were executed:

1. A receipt with inventory attached, wherein the bankrupt acknowledged the receipt of £900, agreed purchase price of the furniture and effects set forth in the schedule attached thereto.

2. An agreement whereby the respondent purported to let, and the bankrupt to hire, the same furniture at a rental of £40 per annum, with a proviso that the respondent might at any time, upon giving six months' notice, put an end to the hiring and enter and remove the furniture. There was no proviso giving the bankrupt any power to determine the agreement.

3. An agreement releasing the previous loans, which recited that the loans and interest had been agreed at £900, recited the agreement for the sale of the bankrupt's furniture to the respondent for £900, and that the £900 loan had been set off against the purchase price, and also recited that the furniture had been delivered to the respondent.

4. The respondent signed a letter addressed to the bankrupt which referred to the hire agreement and went on to state that it was understood that the bankrupt was to have the right to repurchase the furniture at any time upon payment of £900.

On the same day (the 26th of February, 1904) the respondent wrote to the bankrupt's housekeeper at Cheltenham authorizing her to take possession of the furniture on her (the respondent's) behalf.

On the 29th of February the bankrupt handed the housekeeper a chair in the name of the whole of the furniture, and later in the day the housekeeper redelivered the chair to the bankrupt under the terms of the hiring agreement.

In March, 1905, the sheriff went into possession of the bankrupt's house, and was still in possession on the 17th of April, when she filed her own petition.

The trustee in bankruptcy claimed the furniture as property of the bankrupt divisible among her creditors, and moved in the county court for an order accordingly, seeking to set aside the four documents executed on the 26th of February, 1904, as void under the Statute of Elizabeth, or as forming a conditional bill of sale void for non-registration.

The county court judge found as a fact that there had been an oral sale of the furniture, and an oral hiring prior to the execution of the four documents, and that they were consequently not necessary to complete the title of the respondent, which was good apart from them.

The trustee appealed.

H. Maddocks, for the appellant.—There was no evidence before the county court on which the judge could find that there had been an oral sale or hiring of the furniture. [He was stopped by the court.]

Hansell, for the respondent.—The judge heard the evidence of the bankrupt, and was entitled to come to the conclusion which he did upon it. Apart, however, from the finding of fact, the documents in the case constituted not a conditional but an absolute bill of sale, for they entirely do away with the debt. The furniture is taken in satisfaction for the debt, not as a security for it. Being an absolute bill of sale, it could only be avoided for want of registration if the goods comprised therein were in the possession or apparent possession of the bankrupt at the date when she filed her petition: Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 8. At that date, however, the sheriff was in possession of the goods, and they were neither in the possession, nor the apparent possession, of the bankrupt: Ex parte Saffery, In re Bremner, 29 W. R. 749, 16 Ch. D. 669.

THE COURT (BIGHAM and WALTON, JJ.) intimated that they did not agree with the finding of fact, but considered the point as to the sheriff's possession a good one.

Maddocks.—If the bill of sale was absolute then the sheriff was wrongfully in possession, and wrongful possession by the sheriff does not take the goods out of the reputed ownership of the bankrupt: Ex parte Cuthbertson, In re Edey, 23 W. R. 519, L. R. 19 Eq. 264.

Hansell.—There can be no question of reputed ownership here, because the well-established custom of boarding-house keepers to hire furniture includes the reputation of ownership: In re Chapman, Whiteley v. Haydon, 1 Mans. 415.

BIGHAM, J.—In this case the learned county court judge has found as a fact that there was a complete sale effected before the execution of the documents, and that the latter do not constitute a bill of sale. I do not agree with this finding, and I think that the probabilities are all to the contrary. I think that the transactions all took place at the same time, when the solicitor was present, and I think that the parties consulted the solicitor in order that the whole transaction might be carried into effect by proper documents. The transaction was carried out by what amounted to a bill of sale, and would require registration under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. That Act, however, only avoids the bill of sale when the goods in question are still in the possession or apparent possession of the grantor at the time of filing the petition. In this case the goods were not in the possession or apparent possession of the grantor on the 17th of April, 1905, the date of the filing of the petition, because the sheriff had gone in and seized them on the 22nd of March, and was in fact in possession at the date of the receiving order, and only retired in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy. That act of the sheriff took the goods out of the apparent possession of the grantor, as is clear from the decision in Ex parte Saffery, In re Bremner, and therefore the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, does not assist the trustee.

We must, however, consider whether the transaction was merely intended to give security for a debt which continued to exist, as in that case the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, would apply. That is a question of fact, and was found against the trustee by the county court judge, who considered that there had been an out-and-out sale. There are circumstances which might lead to a contrary view, but I do not disagree with the finding.

It has also been urged that apart from the Bills of Sale Acts the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, but that point is not good because of the recognized custom of boarding-house keepers to hire furniture.

WALTON, J.—I agree. The furniture in this case was not taken as security for the loan, but in payment off the loan, and the documents by which the transaction was carried out put an end to the debt altogether.

Bankruptcy—Practice—Pledge of share certificates with bankrupt—Disappearance of pledgor—Power of sale by trustee in bankruptcy—Directions as to advertisement.

Where certain share certificates had been pledged with a firm which afterwards became bankrupt, and the pledgor had disappeared without repaying the loan, the trustee in bankruptcy was given permission to sell the shares after advertising for the pledgor as directed by the court.

Application for directions by the trustee in the bankruptcy.

In 1874 a Mlle. Ninet had pledged with the bankrupt firm three bonds of 400 francs each in the Turkish Lottery Loan and six Ottoman Railway shares of £20 each as security for a loan of £85.

In 1883 the pledgor returned to France without having repaid the loan. On the subsequent bankruptcy of the firm, the loan being still unpaid, the bonds and shares came into the possession of the trustee in the bankruptcy. The amount of the loan with interest came to more than the value of the bonds and shares. The shares were saleable in London, but the bonds being lottery bonds were only saleable on the continent. The trustee had made inquiries, but had not succeeded in finding the address of the pledgor, and was consequently unable to serve her with a notice to pay off as was required in the case of Deverges v. Sandeman, Clarke, & Co., 50 W. R. 404, [1902] 1 Ch. 579, so as to put himself in a position to sell the bonds and shares. Under these circumstances the trustee applied to the court for directions.

BIGHAM, J., directed the trustee to advertise in one French and one English newspaper that the shares would be sold unless the pledgor redeemed them within one month, and ordered that after the expiration of that month, if no claim to redeem was made by the pledgor, the trustee should sell the shares and apply the proceeds to the payment of the loan and interest, the costs of the advertisement and of the application to the court. No order was made as to the lottery bonds.

"THE ASSAYE." (a.)

Ship — Compulsory pilotage — Collision — Southampton Water—57 & 58 Vict. c. 60, s. 605 — "District," meaning of.

For the purposes of compulsory pilotage, the waterway between Southampton and the sea by way of the Solent is one "district" only within the meaning of section 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship New York and the defendants the owners of the steamship Assaye.

A collision occurred between the plaintiffs' and the defendants' vessels on the 20th of March, 1904, in the Solent.

The court found that the collision was caused by the negligence of the pilots in charge of the vessels and also found that both vessels were at the time of the collision under compulsory pilotage.

The main question for the court's consideration turned on the meaning of the word district as used in section 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

Pickford, K.C., Butler Aspinall, K.C., and Glynn, for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C., and Lauriston Batten, for the defendants.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J., in giving judgment, said: This is a question of considerable importance, as to whether at the time of the collision which occurred between these two large steamers in the Solent, off Sconce Point, at about 1.30 on the 20th of March in last year, either or both ships were subject to compulsory pilotage. The New York, a steamship of 10,799 tons gross, was on a voyage from Cherbourg, in France, to Southampton, and was in charge of a Trinity House pilot. The Assaye, a steamship of 7,377 tons gross, was on a voyage from Southampton to Queenstown, in Ireland. She also was in charge of a Trinity House pilot. The collision action for damage was tried before the late President some time ago, and he found both vessels to blame, the blame in each case being attachable to the pilot in charge of each ship. The question now raised is whether the pilotage was in either case compulsory pilotage, so as to absolve the owners of the ship from liability for the damage which has been found to be caused to both ships.

It is necessary that I should go back some little way into the history of compulsory pilotage as far as it concerns this case. The first Act of Parliament referred to was the Act of 1808, 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, by section 20 of which the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, known as the Trinity House, had power given it to appoint sub-commissioners to examine and report to the Trinity House as to the capacity of certain people who sought pilotage licences. That Act, it was provided by section 77, was only to be in force for four years. One of the difficulties in this case arises from the use of the word "district" in the various Acts of Parliament. Section 20 of the Act of 1808 says that it shall be lawful for the said corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond to appoint from time to time at such ports or places in England as they may think requisite (except within certain other districts which are excepted) proper and competent persons, not to exceed five or be less than three, at each port or place for which any such appointment shall be made, the persons so to be appointed to be called sub-commissioners of pilotage. The words there are "ports or places." The Act goes no further. Upon that the authorities of the Trinity House did appoint a certain number of persons, and in 1809 published in the London Gazette, on the 19th of January of that year, the following notice: "Pursuant to the directions of an Act passed in the forty-eighth year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled 'An Act for the better regulation of pilots and of the pilotage of ships and vessels navigating the British seas,' the corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Strond have appointed and licensed pilots at Portsmouth and Cowes, and the Isle of Wight, for the harbours, channels, and coasts within that district." The word is singular, "district," and therefore the original district which was made at the time by the Trinity House authorities was the district of "Portsmouth and Cowes in the Isle of Wight, and for the harbours, channels, and coasts within that district." Then, in the Gazette, they also published the names of the pilots appointed at Portsmouth, and the notice says they are "licensed to take charge of ships to and from the Owers, eastward, without the Isle of Wight, to Peverell, westward, to and from those limits to all places and ports within the Isle of Wight and in and out of St. Helen's, Spithead, Portsmouth Harbour, Stokes Bay, Motherbank, Southampton Water, Cowes Roads and Harbour, Yarmouth, Lymington, the Needles and Christchurch, and to and from each of these ports and places." So that you there have a district created known as the Portsmouth and Isle of Wight district, which includes all the ports and harbours, for the purpose of this case, between Peverell, westward, and the Owers Lightship, eastward. I need not trouble to read the specific licences granted to other persons of less jurisdiction than that which I have read. They are appointed for limited districts within that one big district. That was the state of things in 1809, but it is also right that I should read the notice as it refers to Cowes. The notice says: "The names of the pilots appointed at Cowes are as follows." Then follow the names of the pilots, and they are "licensed to take charge of ships to and from the Owers, eastward, without the Isle of Wight, to Peverell, westward, to and from those limits to all places and ports within the Isle of Wight and in and out of St. Helen's, Spithead, Portsmouth Harbour, Stokes Bay, Motherbank, Southampton Water, Cowes Road and Harbour, Yarmouth, Lymington, the Needles and Christchurch." So that you here have a district created with two sets, apparently, of sub-commissioners, who shall examine and issue certificates to pilots for the purpose of their being licensed by the Trinity House within that big district; and it is important to see that although sub-commissioners are appointed at two places—namely, at Portsmouth and Cowes—the district is one, with two divisions in which sub-commissioners are appointed for the purpose only of the examination of pilots.

The next point which I have to make is this, that at that time, apparently, a book was started by the Trinity House authorities, which has been put in, and which is of use. On p. 5 of the book there are the names of the sub-commissioners appointed for Cowes, and at the top is put "Definition of limits"; that is to say, the definition within which the examination by the sub-commissioners is to be limited. That is practically in the same words as I have just read from the notice in the Gazette. I ought to say that on p. 5 the appointments filling up vacancies go down to September, 1860. It may be important to notice that. Then on pp. 53 and 54 you get a similar entry under the head of "Portsmouth: Definition of limits." The limits are exactly the same as the Cowes limits. Then you get the names of fifteen gentlemen appointed, and of those appointed subsequently, and the record goes down to the 24th of May, 1866. Those are the last dates on which appointments were made. I shall have to refer to this book later, but apparently there were consecutive appointments to those two places, Cowes and Portsmouth, down to 1860 in the one case and 1866 in the other. Therefore you have in the Trinity House records continuous appointments of sub-commissioners at those two places for the purpose of the examination of persons who wished to be licensed as pilots by the Trinity House.

In 1812 the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c 39, by section 20 re-enacted section 20 of the original Act which I have just read, in identical words. Section 23 of that Act makes pilotage compulsory within those limits, and section 32 introduced for the first time the word "districts" into the Act of Parliament. Section 32 says: "Nothing in this Act shall extend or be construed to extend to the taking away, abridging, defeating, impeaching, or interrupting of any grants, liberties, franchises, or privileges heretofore granted by any charters or Acts of Parliament to the pilots of the Trinity House of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, or the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or to give any authority to the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, within any ports or districts having separate jurisdiction in matters of pilotage." One of the difficulties in this case, as I have said, is the use of the word "districts." I think, in that particular section, the word "districts" applies not to the district within which pilotage is made compulsory, or is in operation, but to the districts of those three sets of persons—the Trinity House of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and the Trinity House of Deptford Strond. It seems to me that the word districts there is not the same as the district which we are inquiring into. I think district means in that section the district of the pilotage authority; that is to say, in this case the Trinity House, and not the port for which sub-commissioners are appointed, under the Act. Then comes the Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125). It repeals and re-enacts portions of the Act 52 Geo. 3. Section 5 of the Act repeats in identical words section 20 of the previous Act, to which I have referred. So things went on down to 1843, and on the 5th of December, 1843, apparently the people of Southampton, which was a growing port, thought that it was advisable that their young men should be able to be examined before sub-commissioners at Southampton for the purpose of obtaining pilotage licences. Accordingly a visit was paid to Southampton by a committee of the Trinity House, and this is the document which has been put in with reference to that: "Extract from report of visit to Portsmouth, Cowes and Southampton, dated the 5th of December, 1843." The committee proceeded to visit Portsmouth, Cowes and Southampton on business connected with the pilotage establishments at those ports. "The committee were here (Southampton) waited upon by the Sub-Commissioners of Pilotage, namely, Mr. Estwick, Captain Harington, and Mr. Spain, with whom the subject of a separate sub-commission for the port of Southampton was discussed at considerable length." Then the report speaks of the complaints that had been made, and the committee considered that the rare occurrence of complaints was "attributable rather to the inconvenience to which parties having cause for dissatisfaction are at present subject from the absence of all proximate authority, than to the uniform good conduct of the pilots." The report concluded: "Your committee are induced to recommend to the court that a sub-commission of pilotage should be established at Southampton, and such regulations framed for the conduct of the service thereat as may be deemed necessary." Accordingly, we find that on the 23rd of April, 1844, there is published in the London Gazette by the authorities of the Trinity House in London a notice similar to that which I have already read as having been published in 1809. It was in these terms: "Pursuant to Act of Parliament passed in the 48th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., intituled 'An Act for the better regulation of pilots, and of the pilotage of ships and vessels navigating the British seas,' the Corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Strond, shortly after the passing of the said Act, licensed pilots for Portsmouth, and for Cowes in the Isle of Wight, and the harbours, channels, and coasts within the district called 'the Portsmouth and Cowes district,' the limits of which were described and the names of the pilots so licensed were set forth in the notice of such licences thereupon published as directed by the said Act; and other pilots having been licensed by the said corporation for the said district, as vacancies have occurred or occasion required'—the word district' is singular throughout—the names of the pilots now licensed for such district, and the limits within which they are respectively licensed to act, are hereinafter set forth; and pursuant to an Act passed in the 6th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George IV., intituled 'An Act for the amendment of the law respecting pilots and pilotage and also for the better preservation of floating lights, buoys and beacons,' the said Corporation of Trinity House have lately licensed pilots for the port of Southampton and the coasts near thereto." Then it goes on to give the names of the Portsmouth pilots and their district, and the word "limits" is used—"limits of their licences." The limits are "to and from the Owers, eastward, without the Isle of Wight, to Peverell, westward, to and from those limits to all places and ports within the Isle of Wight (excepting the harbours of Chichester and Langstone) and into and out of St. Helen's, Spithead, Portsmouth Harbour, Stokes Bay, the Motherbank, the Southampton Water (subject to the regulations hereinafter mentioned), Cowes Road and Harbour, Yarmouth, Lymington, and the Needles, and to and from each of those ports and places." Then there are other people mentioned whose jurisdiction is more limited, and the notice proceeds: "The names of the Cowes pilots and the limit of their licences are as follows . . . to and from the Owers, eastward, without the Isle of Wight, to Peverell, westward, to and from those limits to all places and ports within the Isle of Wight, and into and out of St. Helen's, Spithead, Portsmouth Harbour, Stokes Bay, the Motherbank, the Southampton Water (subject to regulations hereinafter mentioned), Cowes Road and Harbour, Yarmouth, Lymington, the Needles, Christchurch, and to and from each of those ports and places." Then comes "the names of the Southampton pilots and the limits of their licences are as follows . . . from Cowes Road, Stokes Bay, Motherbank or St. Helen's to Southampton, and from Southampton through the several channels and passages to sea." Then come the regulations to which I have referred: "Portsmouth and Cowes pilots respectively are not to take charge of any vessels from Southampton, or any port of the Southampton Water to sea unless there shall not be any Southampton pilots ready to take charge of her. Southampton pilots may supersede in the charge of any vessel bound to Southampton any Portsmouth pilot or Cowes pilot, when such vessel shall arrive at a line to be drawn from Eaglehurst to the North-West Bramble Buoy, but after she has passed such line the Portsmouth or Cowes pilot having her in charge shall not be supersedable but may conduct her to her moorings." That shows that it was thought advisable that this district should have a third set of sub-commissioners at Southampton, and that the persons examined by the sub-commissioners at Southampton and to whom licences were granted by the Trinity House had a privilege. They had this privilege, that they might conduct any vessel from Southampton to sea, but they might not conduct any vessel into Southampton except from a line drawn from Eaglehurst to the North-West Bramble Buoy; but if there was not a Southampton pilot available at the line drawn between those two points, then the pilot who had brought her up to that point was at liberty to conduct her into Southampton Water. That was the state of things in 1844. In May, 1853, there was in contemplation a new Merchant Shipping Act—the Act of 1854—and with a view to the preparation of that Act a return was called for from the Trinity House by the House of Commons. A return was made on the 9th of May, 1853, by the Trinity House to the House of Commons. On p. 14 of that return, at the bottom of the page, you will find "Cowes and Portsmouth districts"—in the plural—"Definition of limits: From the Owers, within and without the Isle of Wight, to Peverell, and vice versâ, and to and from, and into and out of, all ports and places within those limits." Then follows a note which is not important. On p. 16, under the same heading, there appears this: "Portsmouth and Cowes pilots respectively are not to take charge of any vessel from Southampton or any part of the Southampton Water, to sea, unless there shall not be any Southampton pilot ready to take charge of her. Southampton pilots may supersede in the charge of any vessel bound to Southampton any Portsmouth pilot or Cowes pilot when such vessel shall arrive at a line to be drawn from Eaglehurst to the North-West Bramble Buoy, but after she has passed that line the Portsmouth or Cowes pilot having her in charge shall not be supersedable, but may conduct her to her moorings." Therefore a Cowes or Portsmouth pilot may take a vessel into Southampton if there is no Southampton pilot at the line from Eaglehurst to the North-West Bramble Buoy. Then there is this further provision: "Any Portsmouth or Cowes pilot who shall take charge of a vessel at any of the anchorages within the Isle of Wight, for the purpose of conducting her to Southampton, such pilot not having brought her in from sea, shall be entitled to one-third of the Southampton rate of pilotage if superseded by a Southampton pilot." Then I also find for the first time, on p. 38, "Southampton district: Definition of limits: From Cowes Roads, Stokes Bay, the Motherbank, and Spithead, to all ports and places within the Southampton Water and from all ports and places within the Southampton Water to sea." Then, again, follow the regulations I have already read. That was the state of things in 1853, before the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 was passed. Now we come to the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, which is 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. Section 331 says: "Every pilotage authority"—in this case the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond—"shall retain all powers and jurisdiction which it now lawfully possesses, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act." Section 337 says: "Every pilotage authority shall deliver periodically to the Board of Trade, in such form and at such times as such board requires, returns of the following particulars with regard to pilotage within the port or district under the jurisdiction of such authority." That word "district" clearly applies in that section to the whole district under the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond. The particulars to be given are as to the regulations in force, the names and ages of all pilots or apprentices, the service for which each pilot, &c., is licensed, the rates of pilotage, the total amount received for pilotage, and the receipts and expenditure. Section 340 gives power to the Corporation of Trinity House to issue pilotage certificates to masters and mates within their district. Section 349 is of importance because it uses the word "limits" as apart from "district." It reads: "Every qualified pilot shall receive on his appointment a licence containing his name and usual place of abode, together with a description of his person, and a specification of the limits within which he is qualified to act," &c. Section 353 reads: "Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force." The section simply continues compulsory pilotage. Section 368 says: "The Trinity House may, in exercise of the general power hereinbefore given to all pilotage authorities, of doing certain things in relation to pilotage matters, alter such of the provisions hereinafter contained as are expressed to be subject to alteration by them in the same manner and to the same extent as they might have altered the same if such provisions had been contained in any previous Act of Parliament instead of in this Act." Section 369 says: "The Trinity House shall continue to appoint sub-commissioners, not being more than five nor less than three in number, for the purpose of examining pilots in all districts in which they have been used to make such appointments"—that must refer to the smaller districts—the special district in which they are dealing in respect of this particular provision — "and may, with the consent of Her Majesty in Council, but not otherwise, appoint like sub-commissioners for any other district in which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter for the appointment of pilots; but no pilotage district already under the authority of any sub-commissioners appointed by the Trinity House shall be extended, except with such consent as aforesaid, and no sub-commissioners so appointed shall be deemed to be pilotage authorities within the meaning of this Act." That is a very complicated section, because you find in it the word "district" used in two senses. "District" in one part of the section refers to the whole district of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, and the other is the district of the sub-commissioners. The district of the sub-commissioners, as we know, has nothing to do with licences, but only with examination; and therefore, as far as I am able to read that section, it does not affect the question of the pilotage district. It only has to deal with sub-commissioners' districts for the purpose of examination. Section 370 speaks of what the pilotage authority's districts are. It speaks of the Trinity House having outport districts. That with which we are dealing is one, or more, as the case may be. Section 376 is the compulsory pilotage section: "Subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, and to the exemptions hereinafter contained, the pilotage districts of the Trinity House within which the employment of pilots is compulsory are the London district and the Trinity House outport districts," &c. Section 379, sub-section 6, is as follows: "Ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages between two places both situate out of such limits, and not being bound to any place within such limits nor anchoring therein," shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the Trinity House outport districts That is the first instance of this provision of exemption that I have been able to discover, but which is very strongly relied upon by those who suggest that in the case of The New York there was no compulsory pilotage. On the 11th of August, 1855, a return was made pursuant to the Act of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129. That return, at pp. 30-32, under the heading of "Cowes and Portsmouth districts"—the word is plural—repeats the regulations I have already read, and gives the names of a long list of pilots and also the limits of their licences. The words are not "limits of district" but "limits of licence." Then, on p. 73 of the same return, you have got "Southampton district: Definition of limits," and the same particulars and regulations. So you get here, after the Act of 1854, a return showing that the same regulations were applicable as had been applicable before that Act was passed. On the 21st of April, 1868, I find this: "Extract from the Warden's (of the Trinity House) minutes.—A reference from the board was considered upon the subject of the proposed consolidation of the pilotage districts of Cowes, Portsmouth, and Southampton into one district. It was, after deliberation, resolved to recommend to the court that the sub-commissioners at Cowes and Portsmouth be abolished, and that one sub-commission of five members be formed at Southampton, of which the collectors at Cowes, Portsmouth, and Southampton shall be members for the management of the three districts, with the ultimate view of amalgamating the whole into one district." That was confirmed on the 5th of May, 1868. Therefore you see that the Trinity House at that time, having started with a district at Cowes and Portsmouth, and having subsequently made a sub-division of that one district and Southampton, found it advisable that that should be altered, and that there should be only one district, which we find was called the Isle of Wight district. That was carried out by the Trinity House by having a fresh page in their sub-commissioners' book, to which I have already referred. On p. 27 of that book you get a new entry, "Isle of Wight district." That page begins with the 23rd of July, 1868, and goes down to the 13th of June, 1873. So that the regulation of 1868 was carried into effect and the pilots had jurisdiction apparently over the whole of that district as one district. On the 12th of February, 1875, a further alteration was made: "Extract from the Warden's minutes, dated the 12th of February, 1875. The report of the Visiting Committee to the Isle of Wight district was read and the recommendation therein having been discussed, it was agreed to recommend to the board: That the Isle of Wight district be for the future divided into two—one to be called the 'Southampton' and the other the 'Isle of Wight' district; that the limits of Southampton district be from a line drawn from the Lepe Buoy to Lee Point into Southampton, and from Southampton to the sea; that the limits of Isle of Wight district be from Peverell to the Owers, excepting within the Poole and Southampton districts." That was confirmed by a minute of the 2nd of March, 1875; and we find a new page entered in the sub-commissioners' book. On p. 11 we find "Isle of Wight district, Cowes and Portsmouth: Definition of limits: From Peverell to the Owers (excepting within the Poole and Southampton districts)." The last entry is in 1903. On p. 12 we have: "Southampton: Definition of limits: From a line drawn from Lepe Buoy to Lee Point, in to Southampton, and from Southampton to sea." The first entry is on the 24th of February, 1875, and the last on the 27th of June, 1904. So things have continued with that alteration from that date, and the question that is raised before me is this: The Assaye, the outward bound vessel, started from Southampton, and she was bound out to sea, and therefore undoubtedly she was in charge of a pilot who had a licence to take that vessel from Southampton to sea, and she was under compulsory pilotage. The New York was a vessel which had come in from America, touching at Cherbourg, and was on her way from that port to Southampton. She was boarded by a pilot who was licensed to take charge of vessels from Peverell to the Owers, excepting within the Poole and Southampton districts. He was licensed for the spot at which the collision took place. Therefore the position was this: That the pilot was licensed to take that vessel as far as where the Southampton district begins—that is, to a line drawn from Lepe Buoy to Lee Point. That was within the original district of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, from the original date I have given, 1809 Now, the question is whether The New York comes within the words of section 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The words of that section are as follows: "The master and owner of any ship passing through any pilotage district in the United Kingdom on a voyage between two places both situate out of that district shall be exempted from any obligation to employ a pilot in that district or to pay pilotage rates when not employing a pilot within that district." Now the word "district" is the whole point. Has that district which was originally started in 1809 ceased to be the district within the meaning of this section? As I read the sections and the regulations and the various reports, the Trinity House have never altered the district—this district from Peverell to the Owers. What they have altered is the limits of the pilots' licences. They have varied from time to time the limits within which various pilots shall have power to navigate ships under their compulsory power, and there is a section in one of the Acts—I think it is section 369 of the Act of 1854—which says that so far as the sub-commissioners are concerned they shall not be given extended jurisdiction except by Order in Council. It is very puzzling to know exactly what that means, but my view is this, that the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, having originally got this one district, the Cowes and Portsmouth district, which included Southampton Water, have never altered that district. They have made sub-districts in it, but the one district has never been altered; that is, the district from the Owers Lightship, eastward, to Peverell, westward. Although for convenience they have made regulations from time to time varying the jurisdiction of the sub-commissioners who are to examine pilots, and although they have made different arrangements for the licences, that is to say, the extent to which any particular person may hold a licence, still one district remains as the pilotage district in that particular part of England under the authority of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond. Therefore I do not think that this particular exemption section renders a vessel free from compulsory pilotage if she is coming from a port outside that district into Southampton. I think she is still within the district of the Isle of Wight, as originally constituted, and she was under compulsory pilotage in the Solent, as being part of the original district which has never really been altered. For these reasons I think The New York was also subject to the law of compulsory pilotage, and the judgment of the President saying that these two pilots were the people who were to blame is to be read as meaning that the vessels were exempted in consequence of their being under compulsory pilotage.

No costs on either side.

From K. B. D. (Collins, M.R., and Barnes, P.) — Dec. 18.

MUTZENBECHER v. LA ASEGURADORA ESPANOLA. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract to be performed within the jurisdiction—Breach within the jurisdiction—Contract of agency for England—Wrongful termination of agency—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

By a contract made abroad the defendants, a foreign insurance company, appointed the plaintiffs, a firm carrying on business in London, to be their agents for the United Kingdom and certain other countries for a period of five years. Before the expiration of the term the plaintiffs received a letter from a representative of the defendants, written in London, putting an end to the agency. The plaintiffs obtained leave under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), to serve on the defendants out of the jurisdiction a writ of summons in an action for breach of the contract of agency.

Held, that the order for service out of the jurisdiction was rightly made; for the breach alleged by the plaintiffs was a breach within the jurisdiction of a contract to be performed by the defendants within the jurisdiction.

Appeal by the defendants from the refusal of Phillimore, J., to set aside an order for service of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs, Franz Ferdinand Mutzenbecher, Carl Christien Stahl, Claus Heinrich Ernst Sonksen, and James Gold, carried on business together as insurance agents in the City of London under a firm name.

The defendants were a Spanish insurance company domiciled in Santa Cruz de Teneriffe, in the Canary Islands.

On the 7th of October, 1903, an agreement of agency in writing in the Spanish language was entered into at Teneriffe between the defendants and the plaintiffs.

By the agreement the parties were thus described: "La Aseguradora Espanola, a Spanish insurance company domiciled in Santa Cruz de Teneriffe, represented by its general manager, Mr. Candido Alarco, and hereinafter called 'the company,' of the one part, and Messrs. F. Mutzenbecher, Stahl Sonksen, and Gold, residing in the City of London, No. 13 and 14, Cornhill, represented by Mr. C. H. E. Sonksen and Mr. James Gold, hereinafter called 'the agents,' of the other part.

The agreement contained, inter alia, the following clauses:

Clause 1.—"The company appoints the agents their exclusive representatives for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and her colonies and dominions across the seas, for the Continent of Europe with the exception of Spain, Portugal, and Turkey, and for the United States of North America."

Clause 2.—"The business which the agents have to transact for the company consists of the following: Reinsurances against fire and maritime insurances and (or) maritime reinsurances, and in the United States of North America insurance against fire generally known under the designation of 'surplus' or 'affidavit' business."

Clause 3.—"The company binds itself not to undertake any business which comes within the jurisdiction of this agreement without the intervention of the agents, but may accept any business offered by Spanish companies. Of all contracts offered by the intermediation of any other party or person a copy shall be given to the agents in order that the same may decide on its acceptance or rejection."

Clause 4 provided for the giving by the company to the agents of a power of attorney.

Clauses 5 and 6 dealt with the duties of the agents.

Clause 7 dealt with the remuneration of the agents.

Clause 8 dealt with weekly reports to be made by the agents of the company.

Clause 9.—"The agents shall render accounts to the company in the following manner—namely: (a) Fire and maritime reinsurance business under convention and optional fire insurance business. The agents shall send accounts to the company as soon as they receive such after having examined the same and found them correct. (b) Maritime insurance optional maritime reinsurance business and surplus business of the United States. Within three weeks from the end of every three months the agents shall render account to the company, crediting same with the gross premiums of all the policies issued during the three months, less the returns and the money received from the company or drawn against the banking account of the company in London for the payment of losses, &c., and debiting the company with all the losses settled and paid during the said period and with the money paid to the company or into the banking account of the company in London for premiums received during the said three months. It is understood that all the balances of account shall be debited to the company only after they have been actually received by the agents."

Clauses 10 and 11 dealt with the form of the accounts.

Clause 12.—"The accounts current which are to be rendered by the agents in virtue of clause 10 of this agreement must, besides, be accompanied by a banking account showing the receipts and payments of the company in London during the three months, and also by the vouchers for the items to the debit or to the credit of the company."

Clause 15.—"As a guarantee for the fulfilment of their obligations and in the interest of a continuous development of their business, the company undertakes to open at a bank or a banking firm in London, for the exclusive use of the business obtained by the agents, banking credits up to the amount of £10,000 in the following manner: (a) A banking credit of £5,000 for the maritime sections. . . . (b) A banking credit of £5,000 for the fire section. . . . The company moreover undertakes to deposit in account current in the name of the agents in a bank or a banking firm in London the sum of £1,500, which shall be placed entirely or in partial sums in deposit account or shall remain in the current account as the agents may think advisable, but always in accordance with the requirements of the business."

By clause 19 the agreement was made for a period of five years from the 7th of October, 1903.

The business of the agency, as contemplated by the agreement, was carried on at the plaintiffs' offices for a little more than a year.

On the 27th of October, 1904, the plaintiffs received a letter from Mr. Zacario Alarco, the agent-general of the defendant company, who was then in London, declaring the agreement of agency void from that date. The plaintiffs were subsequently served with a copy of a deed of revocation of the agreement by the company, ratifying what had been done by their agent-general.

The plaintiffs applied for and obtained an order, under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), giving them leave to serve out of the jurisdiction a writ of summons in an action against defendants to recover damages for breach of the agreement of agency. That rule is as follows: "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever . . . the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract, wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland."

The defendants took out a summons to have the order giving leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction set aside. Phillimore, J., dismissed the summons, and the defendants appealed.

Emery, for the defendants.—This case does not come within ord. 11, r. 1 (e). In order that a plaintiff may be entitled to leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction under that rule, he must show two things—first, a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction; and secondly, a breach within the jurisdiction. But with regard to the first of those conditions, it is not enough for the plaintiff to show that some part of the contract was to be performed within the jurisdiction; he must show that that part of the contract which he alleges to have been broken was to be performed within the jurisdiction. In Rein v. Stein, [1892] 1 Q. B. 753, 40 W. R. Dig. 192, Lindley, L.J., said: "I do not understand that it is the whole of the contract that has to be performed within the jurisdiction. It is sufficient if some part of it is to be performed within the jurisdiction, and if there is a breach of that part of it within the jurisdiction": see Comber v. Leyland, [1898] A. C. 524, 47 W. R. Dig. 159. Here the plaintiffs do not allege a breach by the defendants of anything which, according to the terms of the contract, was to be performed by them within the jurisdiction. The only alleged breach for which the plaintiffs claim damages is in substance a dismissal, a termination of the contract of agency before the term had expired. The defendants are an insurance company domiciled in the island of Teneriffe, and they have no office outside the dominions of Spain. All that had to be performed by them under the contract had to be performed by them where they reside—viz., outside the jurisdiction. The mere fact that the plaintiffs had under the contract to do certain things in this country does not make the contract, as against the defendants, one which had to be performed here within the meaning of the rule. Further, the alleged breach itself did not take place within the jurisdiction. The actual notice of dismissal was written by another agent in this country. But he acted on instructions given by the defendants in Teneriffe: see Holland v. Bennett, 50 W. R. 401, [1902] 1 K. B. 867; Cherry v. Thompson, 20 W. R. 1029, L. R. 7 Q. B. 573.

Scrutton, K.C., and Arthur Pritchard, for the plaintiffs.—The case comes within the rule. From the terms of the agreement it is manifest that the contract is one which was to be performed in this country. The obligation imposed by the contract on the defendants, of which the plaintiffs allege that there has been a breach, is an obligation arising from two implied covenants. These covenants are—first, a negative covenant, not to do anything which would interfere with the carrying on by the plaintiffs of the business of the agency for five years; and, second, a positive covenant, to do whatever might be necessary to assist the plaintiffs in carrying on the business of the agency for five years. The obligation, whether it arose from the negative covenant or the positive covenant, was equally an obligation which was to be performed in this country. The breach also took place in this country. This case is outside the decision in Holland v. Bennett. There the court thought that the breach occurred out of the jurisdiction. Here the dismissal of the plaintiffs by the agent-general of the defendants clearly took place in England.

They also cited Duval & Co. (Limited) v. Gans, 53 W. R. 106, [1904] 2 K. B. 685.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case undoubtedly raises a nice question. The application which originated the discussion was one for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction in an action by a firm of London agents, against a Spanish company by whom the firm had been employed to act as their agents of England upon the terms of an agreement to which I will refer. The plaintiff firm were summarily dismissed from the agency, after acting for about a year, by a representative of the Spanish company, who came to England charged, as we are given to understand, with the duty of considering the position of the agents and having full discretion to determine what steps should be taken in regard to them. The representative exercised his discretion by writing in London a letter of summary dismissal to the agents. The agents thereupon applied for leave to serve a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction, and the rule under which they applied is ord. 11, r. 1 (e). That rule allows service out of the jurisdiction whenever "the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract, wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction." Undoubtedly this contract, so far as the agents were concerned, was to be performed within the jurisdiction, but the question is whether equally, within the words of the rule, the contract was not one which ought to be performed by the defendants, the principals, within the jurisdiction. First of all, with regard to the nature of this contract of agency, the material words of the agreement are these: [His lordship read clause 2 of the agreement.] Clause 1 defines the extent of the agency. [His lordship read clause 1.] It is perfectly clear that the contract does embrace the United Kingdom, and apparently makes it the principal place where the work was to be carried on by the agents. That is shown by the reference in the contract to the parties, who were described as being the company domiciled in Teneriffe represented by its general manager of the one part and the plaintiffs residing in the City of London of the other part. Then follow a number of clauses defining the course of business, the duties of the agents, and their remuneration, and further what things were to be done by the employers, which include their putting the agents in credit at a particular bank up to a certain amount.

The point taken before us is that the contract, to be brought within ord. 11, r. 1 (e), must be one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and that the breach must also be within the jurisdiction. I do not think there is any doubt but that the breach was within the jurisdiction. No difficulty arises in the present case of the kind which arose in Cherry v. Thompson, where a letter was sent from abroad. Here, if there was a breach, it was committed in England by a representative who came to this country from Spanish territory. The agency could not be determined till that representative had inquired into the agency. The breaking of the contract was an act of that representative acting for his principals; therefore it was a breach by the principals committed in England.

Then comes the point, which undoubtedly raises a question of more difficulty, whether the contract is one of which it can be said that it ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. So far as concerns that part of the contract which had to be performed by the agents, it appears to be a contract which comes within the words of the rule; because, though it involves the doing by the agents of things elsewhere, it certainly involves, I think, that the principal part of their duties was to be performed in this country. But it is contended that that is not enough, that it is necessary to show that the contract is one which had to be performed within the jurisdiction by the person who is sought to be sued. That may be true, and I will try this case by that test. Is this a contract which, according to its terms, ought to be performed by the defendants within the jurisdiction? I think it is. There are in the contract reciprocal obligations, one on the principals to employ the agents in England, the other on the agents to carry on in England a part of the principals' business. If any person unvexed by the study of decisions were asked where this contract was to be performed by the defendants, he would probably answer, Where the work of the agency was to be done—that is to say, in London. The defendants were under a double obligation — they were bound both to refrain from interfering with the agents in the fulfilment of their duties, and also to assist them in the fulfilment of those duties by doing in this country anything that might be necessary for that purpose. In my opinion, there was an obligation on them fettering their acts so as to make it just as much a breach in this country if they did an act which they were bound to refrain from doing, as if they made default in doing anything that they were under an active obligation to do. There was an obligation equally in either case; only in the one case it was to be performed by abstention, and in the other case by execution. It seems to me that the breach alleged in this case is a breach of the obligation on the defendants to abstain from doing in England that which they did in England. I therefore think that the plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a breach by the defendants within the jurisdiction of a contract to be performed by them within the jurisdiction.

Phillimore, J., was, in my opinion, right in refusing to set aside the order, and the appeal must be dismissed.

In re GEORGE PARDOE, DECEASED.
MACLAUGHLIN v. PENNY. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Share of an intestate's estate—Administration—Law of Property Amendment Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), s. 13.

Under a power of appointment conferred by a marriage settlement M. C. appointed a sum of £5,000, which her father had covenanted to bring into the settlement, to her son, J. F. C. He died a bachelor and intestate, whereupon his mother, M. C., and sister, E. M. P., became entitled to his estate in equal shares. The mother died in 1862, having appointed her daughter, E. M. P., her son-in-law, G. P., and J. C. C. to be her executors, and she gave to her daughter, E. M. P., a life interest in her share of J. F. C.'s estate. The sum of £5,000 was paid to E. M. P. and G. P. in 1864, and was treated by G. P. as his absolute property. G. P. died in 1884, and gave his wife, E. M. P., a life interest in his property, and appointed F. P. to be his residuary legatee. E. M. P. died in 1903. In an action brought by the administrator of J. F. C. against the executors of G. P. and legal personal representatives of F. P.,

Held, that the estate of G. P. was liable to the estate of M. C. for a moiety of the sum of £5,000, and that the Statute of Limitations did not run, because there had not been anyone in existence with a present right of receiving the share of the intestate's estate and capable of giving a discharge for the same, inasmuch as J. C. C., the co-executor with G. P. and E. M. P., although capable of giving a good discharge for the share, could not have recovered M. C.'s share in any proceedings which he might have taken against G. P. and E. M. P.

This was an administration action in which the plaintiff asked for a declaration that the deceased's estate was liable to replace certain trust moneys which the deceased had received and treated as his own.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 4th of March, 1825, and made in contemplation of the marriage of James Fielder Croome the elder and Mary Byrch, John Maisey Byrch, the father of Mary Byrch, covenanted with the trustees that his executors should pay, within one calendar month next after the death of the survivor of himself and Mary his wife, to the trustees or to the trustees for the time being of another sum of £3,000 (which he had also covenanted to pay), the sum of £5,000 with interest, and it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the said sum of £5,000 upon the like trusts, and subject to the like powers, provisions, and declarations as were in and by the said indenture of settlement declared or expressed of and concerning the said sum of £3,000. And it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the said sum of £3,000 upon trust to pay the income to J. F. Croome the elder during his life, and after his death to Mary Byrch his wife during her life, and from and after the death of such survivor upon trust to pay the said sum of £3,000 unto the only child of the intended marriage if there should be but one, but if there should be more than one then unto and amongst all and every or any one or more of the children of the intended marriage in such shares as J. F. Croome the elder and Mary his wife should by deed jointly appoint or in default of and subject to every such joint appointment as the survivor of them should by deed or will appoint and in default of any and subject to every such appointment unto and amongst the children equally, to sons upon attaining the age of twenty-one, to daughters upon attaining that age or marriage.

J. F. Croome the elder died on the 2nd of July, 1836, leaving his wife Mary Croome and two children, James Fielder Croome the younger and Elizabeth Mary Croome, surviving, and without having exercised the power of appointment.

John Maisey Byrch died on the 5th of January, 1845.

Elizabeth Mary Croome married George Pardoe on the 22nd of January, 1850.

By deed-poll dated the 25th of January, 1850, Mary Croome appointed the sums of £3,000 and £5,000 settled by the marriage settlement of the 4th of March 1825, unto her son J. F. Croome the younger, subject to the interest for life which she had therein.

J. F. Croome the younger attained the age of twenty-one and died on the 3rd of February, 1852, a bachelor and intestate, leaving his mother Mary Croome and his sister Elizabeth Mary Pardoe the only persons entitled to his personal estate according to the Statutes of Distributions.

Letters of administration to his personal estate were granted to his mother Mary Croome on the 6th of February, 1854, but the residuary accounts did not include the reversionary interests to which he was entitled.

Mary Byrch, the wife of John Maisey Byrch, died on the 29th of March, 1856, whereupon the sum of £5,000 became payable within one calendar month from the estate of John Maisey Byrch to the trustees of the marriage settlement of the 4th of March, 1825.

Mary Croome died on the 11th of November, 1862, having by her will appointed her daughter Elizabeth Mary Pardoe, her daughter's husband George Pardoe, and James Capel Croome to be her executors. She bequeathed the share to which she was entitled according to the Statute of Distributions in the personal estate of James Fielder Croome the younger, to her executors upon trust to pay her debts and the legacies thereby bequeathed, and to invest the residue and to pay the income thereof to Elizabeth Mary Pardoe during her life without power of anticipation, and after her death upon certain trusts.

James Capel Croome died on the 12th of February, 1886.

On the 28th of December, 1863, letters of administration de bonis non of the personal estate of J. F. Croome the younger were granted to Elizabeth Mary Pardoe.

In 1864 two sums of £2,000 and £3,000, making together the £5,000 covenanted to be paid by J. M. Byrch to the trustees of the marriage settlement were paid by the trustees of the settlement to Elizabeth Mary Pardoe as administratrix of the personal estate of J. F. Croome, the younger. These sums were paid into the private account of George Pardoe, the husband of Elizabeth Mary Pardoe, and the subsequent investment of the money was made by George Pardoe in his own name.

George Pardoe died on the 29th of November, 1884, having by his will appointed his wife Elizabeth Mary Pardoe to be the sole executrix. He gave all his real and personal estate to his wife Elizabeth Mary Pardoe for her life and after her death to his brother Frederick Pardoe.

Frederick Pardoe died on the 20th of December, 1892, having by his will appointed two executors, of whom the defendant Arthur Penny is the survivor.

Elizabeth Mary Pardoe died on the 15th of July, 1903, and her will dated the 11th of May, 1901, was duly proved by the plaintiff and the defendant James Samuel Penny, the executors therein named, who thereupon became executors by representation of George Pardoe.

On the 24th of October, 1904, letters of administration de bonis non of the personal estate of J. F. Croome the younger were granted to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff brought this action as administrator de bonis non of J. F. Croome the younger, and alleged that the two sums of £2,000 and £3,000 were received by George Pardoe with the knowledge that they formed part of the estate of J. F. Croome the younger, and that he was a trustee thereof for the estate, and he asked for a declaration that the estate of George Pardoe was liable to repay to the estate of James Fielder Croome the younger the two sums of £2,000 and £3,000 which were received by George Pardoe in 1864 from the trustees of the marriage settlement dated the 4th of March, 1825, together with interest as from the death of Elizabeth Mary Pardoe.

The defendant Arthur Penny, who was the executor of Frederick Pardoe, the residuary legatee of George Pardoe, pleaded that Elizabeth Mary Pardoe appropriated the two sums of £2,000 and £3,000, less certain sums paid on account of the estate of James Fielder Croome the younger, towards satisfaction of her moiety of the personal estate of James Fielder Croome the younger. And the sums so appropriated were paid by Elizabeth Mary Pardoe to her husband George Pardoe and became his absolute property.

The Statute of Limitations was also relied upon as a defence to the plaintiff's claim.

KEKEWICH, J., held on the facts that there had been no appropriation of the two sums of £2,000 and £3,000 by Elizabeth Mary Pardoe, but that they were received by her husband George Pardoe as representing his wife in the character of administrator of James Fielder Croome the younger, inasmuch as according to the law as it then was he was entitled to administer. As his wife was entitled to one half of the fund, he must be held to have reduced that moiety into possession, and therefore that George Pardoe's estate was liable to J. F. Croome's estate for the other half.

The question arising on the Statute of Limitations was then argued.

23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s 13, provides "That after the 31st of December, 1860, no suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover the personal estate or any share of the personal estate of any person dying intestate possessed by the legal personal representative of such intestate, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of such estate or share or some interest in respect thereof shall have been accounted for or paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person accountable for the same or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit shall be brought but within twenty years after such accounting, payment, or acknowledgment, or the last of such accountings, payments, or acknowledgments if more than one was made or given."

Ingpen, K.C., and P. M. Walters, for the defendant Arthur Penny.—The present case fell exactly within the words of the statute. In 1864 there were persons who had a present right to receive the £5,000, and who were also capable of giving a discharge for the same—viz., the three executors of Mrs. Croome. It had been held that this section applied to debts contracted before the Act was passed and also to estates that had fallen in. But it did not apply to a debt until it was got in, because until then there was no person capable of giving a discharge. It applied to any part of an estate as and when it falls in. The husband was not in the same position as regards discharging himself as his wife, and for this purpose he must plead the statute.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and W. M. Cann, for the plaintiff.—There never was anyone in existence who could give a discharge except the executors of Mrs. Croome, and they could not have maintained an action at law. The Pardoes occupied the position of being entitled to receive the legacy besides being liable to pay it, and therefore the case was governed by the decision in Binns v. Nichols, 14 W. R. 727, L. R. 2 Eq. 256, where Sir W. Page Wood, V.C., held that where the person liable for the payment of a legacy was the same as the person who was entitled to receive it, no question of limitation under the statute could arise, because he could not have sued himself. [KEKEWICH, J.—There was no independent executor in that case, which somewhat distinguishes it from the present one.] The point was that J. Capel Croome, the independent executor, could not have maintained an action at law without joining the Pardoes, and he could not have joined them in an action at law because they were proper defendants.

Lawrence, K.C., and E. A. Jennings, for other parties interested, adopted this argument.

Cruickshank, for the other defendant, J. S. Penny, took no part in the argument.

Ingpen, K.C., in reply.—The executors, after the debts were paid, were bound to distribute the assets among the next-of-kin, who could bring an action for their distributive shares. The argument that Mr. and Mrs. Pardoe were entitled to retain the sums in their hands from 1864 down to the present time was absurd. It was the duty of J. Capel Croome to see that his co-executors not only did not retain this money in their hands, but also that they secured it. Mr. and Mrs. Pardoe could not have the right to retain this money in their hands for an indefinite period as against J. Capel Croome. The case fell exactly within the words of the statute. Binns v. Nichols did not apply, because in that case there was only one person who was entitled to maintain the action for the legacy, and he was the same person as was liable for the payment of the legacy, whereas in the present case there was an independent executor who could have maintained an action.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a small but interesting point, and it is strange that counsel have not been able to find any decision directly bearing upon it. The statute begins to run from the moment when a present right to receive a legacy, which, of course, includes a share of residue, shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same. One has to ascertain that moment. It is not suggested that any moment can be substituted for the actual day in 1864 when the sum of £5,000 was paid over to Mr. and Mrs. Pardoe in their character of representatives of James Fielder Croome. I do not forget that Mr. Pardoe was one of the executors of Mrs. Croome. I do not forget that he was the husband of Elizabeth Mary Croome, and that according to the law as it was then he had rights by virtue of that relationship; but to avoid complication I will drop her out altogether and consider him as being the administrator of James Fielder Croome, and also one of the executors of Mrs. Mary Croome. It will not make the slightest difference. All I have to say will be equally sound or unsound when Mrs. Pardoe is added to her husband. The money, therefore, was paid to him in 1864. Part of that money in due course of administration, or a share of it, belonged to Mrs. Croome's estate, and the executors of Mrs. Croome were then entitled to sue for it if they could. Now how was that to be? Mrs. Croome's executors were Mr. Pardoe and James Capel Croome. Mr. Pardoe himself was the administrator of James Fielder Croome, out of whose estate the money was to come. James Capel Croome and Mr. Pardoe of course could not sue Mr. Pardoe at law, but it would have been easy to have framed a suit in equity, with James Capel Croome as plaintiff suing Mr. Pardoe as the administrator of James Fielder Croome. It could have asked for administration of James Fielder Croome's estate and that the money due to Mrs. Croome's estate might be secured. There would be no difficulty about that. Does that carry us far enough? What is said is that the twenty years run after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge. Now, James Capel Croome, one of the executors of Mrs. Croome, could have given a discharge for a share of the residue—a legal discharge to any person who paid it over to one executor. Therefore so far James Capel Croome is a person within the section, but the section is not limited to the capability of giving a discharge, but it extends to the right to receive the same. It seems that the right to receive the same means a right to recover by legal proceedings. A right to receive the same does not mean this, that if the receipt is given it will hold good against all the world. It means that the person who is to give the receipt can maintain legal proceedings in order to establish the right. I cannot conceive that the words can mean anything different from that myself; and that is supported by Binns v. Nichols. Mr. Ingpen suggests that Binns v. Nichols is not law now, but I venture to think that in the absence of anything said to the contrary it would be rather strengthened than weakened by subsequent cases. The head-note to Binns v. Nichols says this: "Where the person liable for the payment of a legacy and the person entitled to receive it are the same no question of limitation under the statute can arise." "Entitled to receive the same" is what the statute calls "the present right to receive the same"—a right, I repeat, which could be established by proceedings at law. Now, James Capel Croome could do what I have said in equity, but when he had recovered judgment, or a decree we should call it in those days, and worked out in the administration the accounts and inquiries, and ascertained what Mrs. Croome's share in James Fielder Croome's estate was, the case would come on for further consideration, and what would have happened? James Capel Croome would have asked for payment to him, and of course Mr. Pardoe would have resisted that, and it would have been such a plain case that it would not have been arguable. James Capel Croome would have no right to recover that as against Mr. Pardoe. They were both executors of Mrs. Croome. James Capel Croome could not have insisted on receiving it himself as against his co-executor; therefore at that time, though he could have done a good deal in the way I have pointed out, he had no present right to receive the legacy in the sense of having a right to recover it by action at law into his own hands. It seems to me, therefore, that the statute did not begin to run in 1864. It is not suggested that it began to run at any other time, and therefore it does not run now.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company — Amalgamation of undertaking — Water supply—Ultrà vires—North-Eastern Railway (Hull Docks) Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. cxcviii.).

A railway company, its undertaking having been amalgamated with that of a dock company, supplied water to a dock, formerly the property of the dock company, from land acquired by the railway company in respect of its railway undertaking. The amalgamating Act provided that none of the powers relating exclusively to the dock company should apply to any part of the amalgamated undertaking other than the docks, and that none of the powers relating exclusively to the railway company should apply to the dock or to the company in respect thereof.

Held, that the company's action in so supplying water was intrà vires.

This was an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Mayor and Corporation of Kingston-upon-Hull, asking for a declaration that it was ultrà vires for the defendant company to supply a certain dock at Kingston-upon-Hull with water pumped or otherwise obtained from their land at Hessle, forming part of their railway undertaking, for any purpose connected with the dock, or to sell or supply water so obtained to any tenant of the defendants occupying premises within the dock, or to any ship using the dock, or otherwise to carry on the business of a water company.

Prior to the year 1893 the corporation of Kingston-upon-Hull, who were the owners of waterworks, supplied water to the Hull Docks Co., and in particular to the dock in question, St. Andrew's Dock.

In the year 1893, under the provisions of the North-Eastern Railway (Hull Docks) Act, 1893, the undertaking of the dock company was amalgamated with the defendants' railway undertaking. The defendants thereupon discontinued the supply of water from the corporation waterworks to St. Andrew's Dock and supplied the dock from their pumping station at Hessle.

The facts are fully stated in the considered judgment.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Parker, for the plaintiff.—The railway company acquired the land at Hessle for a pumping station to be used for railway purposes. It cannot use it for any other purpose without statutory authority, and there is no such authority. By the amalgamating Act the undertakings of the dock company and the railway company are both kept separate. They are in separate compartments and there is no intercommunication so far as powers are concerned: Attorney-General v. Pontypridd Urban District Council, ante, p. 61, [1905] 2 Ch. 441. The supplying of water to the dock is not incidental to or consequent upon the railway undertaking and is ultrà vires: Mulliner v. Midland Railway, 27 W. R. 330, 11 Ch. D. 611; Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway, 28 W. R. 769, 5 A. C. 473; Attorney-General v. London County Council, [1902] A. C. 165.

Neville, K.C., Hughes, K.C., and Gutch, for the defendant company.—A company has power to do whatever is incidental to or consequent upon its undertaking: Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway. Here the powers have been enlarged because the undertaking has been enlarged. What has been done may reasonably be regarded as incidental to or consequent upon the undertaking of the company as it has been enlarged. After amalgamation there is only one undertaking; it is now impossible to treat the undertakings of the dock company and the railway as being separate undertakings.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J., read the following judgment: The defendants, the North-Eastern Railway Co., work and maintain lines of railway running from the east along the north bank of the River Humber into the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, where they have stations for passengers and goods respectively. They also own and work various docks, in particular St. Andrew's Dock, which is adjacent to these lines of railway, lying between them and the river. By the side of their lines of railway at Hessle, about a mile to the east of this dock, the defendants have wells and a pumping station, from which they or the railway companies to which they have succeeded have for many years past obtained water for the various purposes of and connected with their railway undertaking. There are and were before the year 1893, the date of the amalgamation Act, to the provisions of which I shall have more particularly to refer hereafter, certain lines of railway within the docks running along the quays and joining the defendant company's railway just outside the dock. Thus the goods (principally fish) landed at the dock, and there loaded upon railway trucks or vans, were carried direct by railway to the various stations more or less distant for which they were destined. The docks before the amalgamation Act were a separate undertaking and belonged to a separate company—namely, the Hull Docks Co. Before the amalgamation the carriage and haulage of goods within the docks, under some arrangement with the docks company, were performed by the railway company in its own trucks by its own locomotives, and it has never been suggested, nor do I think it could be made out, that there was anything ultrà vires or improper in this. By the North-Eastern Railway (Hull Docks) Act, 1893, the undertaking of the dock company was amalgamated with the undertaking of the railway company, and it was provided that thenceforward the two undertakings so amalgamated should constitute one undertaking, which should be the undertaking of the North-Eastern Railway Co.—that is, of the defendants—and both undertakings, therefore, subject to the provisions of the Act, may be, and they in fact are, worked as one undertaking. The defendants by means of a pipe or main underneath or along their lines of railway take and convey water from their wells at Hessle to their stations in Hull, and also by a branch pipe from their main, into the dock for all necessary purposes there in connection with the working both of the railway and the dock. A considerable quantity of fresh water is required in the dock for the supply of the hydraulic power for working the dock gates, working the dock bridges, the capstans, and the cranes. It is also used for supplying the boilers operating the steam engines which produce the hydraulic power, and also for the steam cranes, and for the locomotives on the docks, and for heating the fish stage, stores, and offices; there is also a very large quantity of water required for washing down the fish stage and the fish boxes after they are returned, these all being washed before fresh fish is put into them to be sent away, and it is also mentioned that with regard to extinguishing fires they must always be supplied for that purpose and at sufficient pressure.

Now, this is an information by the Attorney-General at and by the relation of the Corporation of Kingston-upon-Hull, who are thereby seeking to compel the defendants to buy from them all the water required at the docks, although the relators are not bound and would not undertake to supply such water, and, indeed, could not be absolutely depended upon to supply as much as may be necessary. The statement of claim asks for "(1) A declaration that it is ultrà vires and illegal for the defendants to supply the said dock with water pumped or otherwise obtained from the said land at Hessle forming part of their railway undertaking or to sell or supply water pumped or obtained as aforesaid to any tenants of the defendants occupying premises within the said dock or to any ship using the said dock or otherwise to carry on the business of a water company." As to what I call the second part of the declaration claimed—namely, all included within the words "to carry on the business of a water company"—without going into details, I have come to the conclusion upon the evidence that the defendants are not carrying on the business of a water company or supplying water to any person or for any purpose to or for which the dock company would not, if it still existed, be legally entitled to supply water as the defendant company is now doing. In other words, the claim to what I have called the second part of the declaration asked for cannot, in my opinion, be sustained.

The real question in the action is whether the defendants are entitled to supply their dock with water obtained from their wells at Hessle, which were the property of the North-Eastern Railway Co. before the acquisition by them of the docks and the amalgamation of the two undertakings. But of the water used in the dock some, as I have already mentioned, is required for railway purposes strictly so-called, and obviously, in a sense, all the water that is there supplied and used is required and used at least indirectly for the benefit and increase of the railway traffic and for the public convenience in connection with such traffic, so far at all events as such traffic is from or to the docks—in other words, the fish traffic on the defendants' railway. But on behalf of the Attorney-General it is contended that, although the defendant company may be entitled to purchase from the corporation—or indeed, I suppose, from any other person who has it to sell—all such water as may be required for use in the dock, the defendants are not entitled and it is ultrà vires for them to take water from properties originally acquired for their railway and to convey such water by a pipe, or, I suppose, in any other manner, into the dock for use there. The defendants, says the Attorney-General, are not entitled to use any part of their railway property in any manner whatsoever for any purpose of the docks, such user being altogether ultrà vires and illegal. If this be correct, it would logically follow that, if the defendants were to purchase water or electric energy from anyone who might be able and willing to supply it to them at Hessle or anywhere else on their line of railway, it would be illegal and ultrà vires to convey or transmit the water or electric energy so purchased by any pipe or wire along or even across their railways into the dock for use there, inasmuch as thereby the defendants would be using for dock purposes a portion of the site of the railway, which no doubt was originally acquired for the purpose of the railway undertaking. This appears to me a somewhat startling contention, having regard to the fact of the amalgamation of the two undertakings. Primâ facie I should have thought that the defendants, at their engineering works and at the expense of their united undertaking, might manufacture and repair all machinery and other appliances requisite for the working of the docks, as well as the locomotives and other things used for their railway, and might get electric light for the dock as well as their railway from the same generating station, even though it be the fact that such engineering works or generating station stand upon ground which was formerly the property of the railway company before the amalgamation. Might not the defendants light their railway as well as the dock from the generating station situate together upon land which before the amalgamation was the property of the dock company? Must there now and always be separate sets of engineering works and two generating stations—one to be used exclusively for the railway and the other exclusively for the dock? The dock company, being authorized to make and maintain the dock, might before the amalgamation have used any surface or underground water supply on its property for the necessary purposes of the docks. It might have purchased water anywhere from anyone having it for sale, and had such water conveyed by the railway company to the dock for whatever use a supply of water might be required in the working of the dock undertaking. For whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to or consequential upon those things which the Legislature has authorized ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be ultrà vires. Moreover, any mode of enjoying a company's own land is impliedly permitted if it be not inconsistent with the provisions of the company's Acts and is not an infringement of the rights of other persons. There is no suggestion that the defendants are by what they are doing infringing the rights of anyone. Are they transgressing any statutory prohibition? If they are it is some prohibition contained in the North-Eastern Railway (Hull Docks) Act, 1893. That is an Act whereby, after reciting that the dock company are the owners of an extensive system of docks, basins, wharves, sheds, railways or tramways, warehouses, offices and other buildings, works, and appliances, and of a considerable quantity of land and other property at and near to Hull, and whereas the North-Eastern Railway Co.—that is, the defendants—are owners of the railway by means whereof railway access is afforded to and from the estate of the dock company, and whereas it is expedient—which I understand to mean expedient in the public interest—that the undertakings of the railway company and the dock company should be united and that those companies should be amalgamated upon the terms and conditions in this Act contained, then section 4 provides: "As on and from the 1st of July, 1893, and subject to the provisions of this Act, the dock company shall be and is hereby dissolved, and the undertaking of the dock company is hereby as from the date of the amalgamation amalgamated with the undertaking of the railway company, and thenceforward all undertakings so amalgamated shall constitute one undertaking, which shall be the undertaking of the company." In my opinion, it follows that the one undertaking may and shall be worked as such, subject, of course, to the provisions of the Act. But counsel for the Attorney-General rely upon the seventh section of this Act and the first and fourth sub-sections of such section, which provide as follows: "(i.) Notwithstanding the amalgamation, none of the provisions of the Acts relating to the dock company which, if the amalgamation had not taken place, would have applied exclusively to the undertaking of the dock company or to the dock company in respect thereof shall apply to any portion of the undertaking of the railway company other than the dock undertaking or to the railway company in respect thereof"; and "(iv.) None of the provisions relating to the railway company which, if the amalgamation had not taken place, would have applied exclusively to the railway undertaking shall apply to the dock or the company in respect thereof."

Now in the case of each of these companies there is a very large volume of Acts of Parliament, and I do not pretend to be able to explain and define completely the meaning of these sub-sections 1 and 4 of section 7, but at all events it has not been pointed out to me, and I have not been able to discover, how the defendants are precluded from doing what they are doing by reason of the non-application to any portion of the amalgamated undertaking other than the dock of any of the provisions of the dock Acts, which, before the amalgamation, applied exclusively to the dock undertaking, or the defendant company in respect thereof. Similarly it has not been pointed out to me, and I have not been able to discover, how the defendants are precluded from doing what they are doing by reason of the non-application to the dock undertaking or the defendant company in respect thereof of the provisions of the railway Acts which, before the amalgamation, applied exclusively to the railway and the traffic thereon. The defendants might and must have fresh water at the dock not only for strictly railway purposes, but for the working of the dock. The defendants might undoubtedly purchase water at Hessle or anywhere else on their line of railway from any adjoining landowner, or other person, or company, that had water to sell, and might then convey such water in tanks upon railway trucks down into the dock for consumption there. If they might convey such water in tanks, why not more conveniently and at less expense by a pipe or pipes into the dock? If at Hessle or any other place the defendants have a supply of water of their own, either upon the surface or underground, amply sufficient both for strictly railway purposes and for the dock, why may they not convey such water either by tanks carried on wheels or by pipes on their own property into the dock for all necessary purposes there? They have such a supply at Hessle, and I fail to see how what they are doing is ultrà vires or illegal. Consequently, in my opinion, this action fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

GEISSE v. TAYLOR & HARTLAND.
TAYLOR & HARTLAND (LIMITED), Garnishees.
WESTON, Claimant. (a.)

Practice—Attachment of debts—Garnishee order—Execution—Rights of garnishor—Garnishee company—Debenture-holder—Priorities—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 45; Part I., App. K., Form 39.

On an interpleader issue to try the right to the goods seized as between the garnishor and a debenture-holder, Held, that a garnishee order did not give the garnishor any legal or equitable right in the property of a company in priority to a debenture-holder, who had given valuable consideration for the debenture, where the inference to be drawn from the facts was that the claimant had obtained the debenture simply to secure the amount of his loan without any intention to benefit the garnishees or to collude with them in any way, and therefore that the debenture-holder was entitled to succeed in the issue.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Bristol County Court in an interpleader issue remitted from the High Court for trial.

On the 13th of July, 1904, the plaintiff Geisse obtained judgment in an action in the High Court against the defendants, Taylor & Hartland, for a sum of money and costs.

In January, 1905, a limited company, Taylor & Hartland (Limited), owed the defendants a sum of money, and on the 16th of January the plaintiff obtained, under ord. 45, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, a garnishee order nisi against the company attaching debts due from the company to the defendants' firm.

This order followed Form No. 39 in Appendix K, Part I., of the Appendices to the Rules of the Supreme Court, and ordered that all debts owing or accruing due from the garnishees to the judgment debtors be attached to answer the judgment recovered against the judgment debtors by the judgment creditor in the High Court action.

The order nisi was duly served on the company, and on the 2nd of February was made absolute, and the order absolute was sent to the company.

On the 3rd of February the company borrowed from the claimant Weston the sum of £250, and on the same day a debenture was issued by the company to Weston covering all the property and assets of the company. When the debenture was given both Weston and the company knew that the garnishee order absolute had been obtained, and that an execution would be put in forthwith to enforce it.

On the 8th of February execution was levied at the business premises of the company, and thereupon Weston claimed the goods taken by the sheriff, and appointed a receiver under powers conferred on him by the debenture. Subsequently Weston, under an order of the court, paid £38 to the sheriff, the value of the goods seized.

The sheriff then withdrew and paid the £38 into court, and this issue was directed to try the right to the sum paid in as between the judgment creditor and the claimant.

The county court judge held that the debenture was not void within the meaning of 13 Eliz. c. 5, and that the effect of the garnishee order absolute was not to give something in the nature of a charge on the property of the garnishees which prevented them from disposing of their goods, and that the garnishees had power to mortgage their goods by means of the debenture notwithstanding that at the time when they gave it a garnishee order absolute had been made against them.

He therefore gave judgment for the claimant.

The judgment creditor appealed.

R. V. Bankes, for the judgment creditor.—It is submitted first that the debenture is void under the statute of Elizabeth as being a fraudulent arrangement whereby the company were enabled to hinder, defeat, delay, or defraud their judgment creditor Geisse. Secondly, a garnishee order must be a charge of some kind, legal or equitable, upon the property of the garnishee. Equitable rights are clearly recognized in interpleader proceedings: Jennings v. Mather, 49 W. R. 495, [1901] 1 K. B. 108. A garnishee order obtained under ord. 45, r. 1, effects a charge upon the company's property that takes priority to the debenture: Emanuel v. Bridger, 22 W. R. 404, (1874) L. R. 9 Q. B. 286; Ex parte Joselyne, 26 W. R. 645, (1878) 8 Ch. D. 327. The learned judge in the court below thought that those two decisions no longer applied because of section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which puts an end to questions which formerly arose under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, as to the right of an execution creditor to prove as a secured creditor, but Wright, J., held otherwise in In re National United Corporation, [1901] 1 Ch. 950, 49 W. R. Dig. 36. In the case of In re Stanhope Silkstone Collieries Co., (1879) 27 W. R. 561, 11 Ch. D. 160, the Court of Appeal held that the creditor was not a secured creditor at the commencement of the winding up, but they intimated that if the garnishee order nisi had been served before the winding up, his debt would have been secured.

He also cited In re General Horticultural Co., Ex parte Whitehouse, 34 W. R. 681, (1886) 32 Ch. D. 512; Robson v. Smith, 43 W. R. 632, [1895] 2 Ch. 118; and In re Roundwood Colliery Co., Lee v. Roundwood Colliery Co., 45 W. R. 324, [1897] 1 Ch. 373.

Roskill, K.C. (F. E. Weatherly and E. Layman with him), for the claimant.—On the first point the county court judge found that there was no fraud or collusion to bring the case within the statute of Elizabeth, and there being evidence on which he could arrive of that conclusion of fact, his decision cannot be reviewed. As to the second point, a garnishee order creates no charge upon the goods or property of the garnishee. It does not place him in so high a position as a judgment creditor. For instance, it gives him no right to petition for the winding up of a company who are garnishees: In re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co., 38 W. R. 67, (1889) 43 Ch. D. 99. [Per KENNEDY, J.—That decision appears to have been doubted by Romer, L.J., in Pritchett v. English and Colonial Syndicate, 47 W. R. 577, [1899] 2 Q. B. 428.] It is not a final order within section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the judgment creditor who has obtained the order cannot issue a bankruptcy notice on it and make the garnishee a bankrupt. Ex parte Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 342. The county court judge was right in holding that the cases of Emanuel v. Bridger, 22 W. R. 404, L. R. 9 Q. B. 286, and Ex parte Joselyne, 26 W. R. 645, 8 Ch. D. 327, have no application here, for the question there was only whether the garnishee orders affected a "charge" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts so as to make the garnishors secured creditors.

R. V. Bankes replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., after stating the facts, said: I accept Mr. Bankes' argument that upon the garnishee order being made absolute and served upon the company, the garnishees, they were bound to respect that order, and possibly might have been guilty of contempt of court if they did not. That is the result of Rogers v. Whiteley, [1892] A. C. 118, 40 W. R. Dig. 184. Mr. Bankes' first point was that the debenture was void as being a fraudulent arrangement to hinder or defraud their judgment creditor Geisse. But the county court judge has found as a fact, that was not the case, and we must take it that a sum of money was advanced to the company by the claimant by way of loan secured by the debenture without any fraud or collusion on either side. Therefore the garnishees were entitled to issue the debenture without committing any breach of their duty under the garnishee order.

The second point taken for the garnishor was that the garnishee order absolute served upon the company gave him some kind of legal or equitable charge upon the property of the company which prevented the claimant from exercising his rights under the debenture. But it cannot reasonably be contended that a person who issues execution under rule 3 of order 45 can thereby place himself in any higher position than any other execution creditor of the garnishee who has issued execution either before or after the garnishor. It cannot be said that the position of a person who has obtained a garnishee order is analogous to that of an ordinary creditor or judgment creditor. The Court of Appeal in In re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co. decided that a garnishee order cannot be made the ground for a petition to wind up a company, and it was held in Ex parte Chinery that a bankruptcy notice could not be founded upon it. It is true that in Ex parte Joselyne James, L.J., said: "The moment the order of attachment was served on the garnishee the property in the debt due from him was absolutely transferred from the judgment debtor to the judgment creditor"; but that must be taken in conjunction with what Cotton, L.J., said in the same case—that as against the judgment debtor the garnishee order nisi was a final and complete order transferring at once "the right to receive the money which might be due" from the garnishee to the judgment debtor. In Rogers v. Whiteley Lord Halsbury, L.C., said: "The order attaches all debts—that is to say, all the money which Mr. Whiteley could be called upon to pay away, although more than the amount sufficient to satisfy the particular debt in question." The position of the garnishor in respect of the garnishee is different from that of an ordinary creditor or judgment creditor. The provisions of ord. 45, r. 3, enable him to obtain the issue of execution in aid of his rights under the garnishee order; execution is only a mode of enforcing the duty which the garnishee owes to the garnishor under the order. If I am right the act of the garnishees here in obtaining, in their own interest and bonâ fide, an advance upon the debenture was valid and effectual, and the garnishor could not give himself priority by the issue of his writ of fi. fa. Unless the decisions establish that a garnishor is in a better position than an ordinary creditor, I cannot say that the garnishee's hands are so tied that he cannot deal with the assets, even though those assets might in certain events be made available for the payment of the garnished debt. Mr. Bankes' argument seems to concede that in order to succeed he must put the garnishor in a better position. In my opinion it is impossible to put the claim of the garnishor in a higher position than the debt of an ordinary judgment creditor, and that, I think, was the ground of the learned county court judge's judgment.

I desire to add that, in my opinion, Mr. Bankes was right in his criticism of that part of the judgment dealing with the effect of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

My judgment is therefore for the claimant.

KENNEDY, J.—I have nothing to add to what my lord has said with respect to the point taken under the statute of Elizabeth. On the other point I have felt during the argument a doubt, and it is this: whatever may be the correct legal phrase to describe the position of a person who is a garnishor under the code relating to these proceedings, and accepting the decisions that he cannot properly found a bankruptcy notice upon the garnishee order or present a petition to wind up a garnishee company upon it, whether, having proceeded under the code and got a garnishee order absolute and served it upon the garnishee, he is after all in no better position, inasmuch as the garnishee may divest himself of the whole of the property which would enable him to obey the order of the court and so make that order wholly ineffective. I am not prepared to differ from the county court judge, because in the authorities cited to us it has been said that the only effect of a garnishee order is to attach the debt. But it is the fact that a debenture was here given to the claimant, who had full notice of the garnishee order, which purported to be a charge upon all the property of the garnishees available for paying the debt due to the garnishor. When the execution was put in and the sheriff levied, the garnishor was met with this debenture for £250. If this debenture has priority admittedly nothing would be left with which to pay the debt. I have hesitated as to whether some equitable right at least had not been gained by the garnishor under his order entitling him to say that in determining priorities he ought to come in first. It is not disputed that equitable rights are to be recognized in interpleader proceedings. I am not, however, prepared to say that the county court judge was wrong, having regard to the language of the House of Lords in Rogers v. Whiteley and of the Court of Appeal in In re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co., citing Chatterton v. Watney, and the strong opinion of my lord upon the question before us.

JELF, J.—I agree with the judgment of my lord for the reasons which he has given.

GRUNNELL v. WELCH. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Illegal distress—Trespass ab initio —Right of landlord to make fresh levy.

A landlord levied a distress for rent. The bailiff illegally entered the house by breaking the chain of the front door and seized furniture belonging to the plaintiff. After remaining in possession some days he went out, was refused re-admission, and made no attempt to re-enter. Subsequently the landlord levied a fresh distress for the same rent, whereupon the plaintiff brought an action for replevin against him.

Held, following Attack v. Bramwell, 3 B. & S. 220, that the second distress was justified, as the first distress was wholly void and a trespass ab initio.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a judgment of the judge of the Waltham County Court.

The plaintiff was the wife of a tenant of a house which had been let to her husband by the defendant.

At Midsummer, 1904, two quarters' rent were in arrears, and on the 19th of July the landlord put in a distress.

The bailiff entered the house by forcibly breaking the chain of the front door, and seized furniture which admittedly belonged to the plaintiff.

The bailiff remained in possession eleven days, on which day he left the house for two hours, was refused re-admission, and made no attempt to return.

On the 5th of August a fresh distress for the same rent was levied by a different bailiff under a fresh warrant, and goods were seized which were to some extent different from those seized on the previous occasion.

The goods were removed and advertised for sale, whereupon the plaintiff took the necessary steps to replevy her goods, and in due course brought the present action of replevin in the county court.

Before the replevin became effectual the plaintiff and her husband had brought an action in the High Court against the defendant, in which they claimed damages in respect of the illegal entry on the 19th of July, and the plaintiff had brought a further action in the High Court in which she claimed the restoration of the goods seized on the 5th of August, together with an injunction against the defendant selling or dealing with them. These actions, however, were abandoned after the present action of replevin had been brought.

The county court judge held that the first proceeding was, upon the authority of Attack v. Bramwell, 3 B. & S. 220, a trespass ab initio and void as a distress, and that the subsequent distress for the same rent was lawful.

The plaintiff appealed.

Foà, for the plaintiff.—The learned judge has misapplied Attack v. Bramwell. Cockburn, C.J., held in that case that the illegal entry of the bailiff constituted a trespass ab initio, and that defendant's right in distress was beside the question as he had not availed himself of it. He held that the distress was no justification for the seizure, not that the distress was wholly void. In the present case the plaintiff's goods were taken out of the possession of the plaintiff, and there was a fully completed distress, after which the plaintiff could not retake the goods without being guilty of pound breach: 3 Black. Com., p. 12; Gilbert on Distress, p. 61. Secondly, if the first distress were void the defendant is here seeking to take advantage of his own wrong: see In re Hallett's Estate, 13 Ch. D. 696.

Morton Smith, for the defendant.—The case is covered by Attack v. Bramwell. The real question is, had the landlord a fair opportunity of working out the first distress, and it is submitted that the illegal seizure was not such an opportunity: Dawson v. Cropp, 1 C. B. 961, and Bagge v. Mawby, 8 Ex. 641.

Foà replied.

KENNEDY, J.—In my opinion the decision of the county court judge was right and must be affirmed. It is contended by the plaintiff that there ought not to have been what may be styled a second distress upon her goods because one had already been levied. The question is a short one: Was the first proceeding a distress? In my opinion it was not. The county court judge relied upon Attack v. Bramwell as showing that the first distress was wholly void; and even looking at the question wholly apart from authority, I cannot see why there should not be what I call for brevity a second distress in the present case. Distress is a special remedy for the protection of landlords, and clearly a landlord cannot levy twice for the same rent. If he levies for too small a sum it is his own fault, and he cannot repair it by a second levy. And if anything is done by the landlord after levying by which, when he has the opportunity of rendering the distress fruitful, he surrenders or forbears to exercise his power of doing so, he cannot distrain a second time. What happened in the present case was that the first proceeding was simply a trespass, an illegality, and void ab initio; it was an actionable trespass, and an action of trespass has in fact been brought in respect of the act of the bailiff in wrongfully breaking into the house under colour of the distress warrant. The question really is, Was the first proceeding a distress? That is, was it a proceeding in which the landlord would have got what he got by the second proceeding? That is the way in which the pleader puts it in Dawson v. Cropp. In that case there had been a levy which was not carried through, but was abandoned by the landlord for reasons which the court held not to be good, and the court had to consider whether the proceeding on the part of the landlord amounted to a voluntary surrender of his rights under the levy. The pleadings are given in the judgment of Tindal, C.J., upon which it appears that the replication of the plaintiff was (omitting immaterial portions) that the "defendant took and distrained various goods and chattels of the plaintiffs other than those in the last count mentioned as a distress for the said arrears of rent, and of sufficient value to satisfy the said arrears of rent, and the defendant then could and might and ought to have fully satisfied and paid the said arrears of rent and the costs, &c., out of and with the said goods and chattels; yet the defendant wrongfully and vexatiously, and without any cause or excuse refused and neglected to do so. . . ." Could such a plea have been pleaded in the present case? I am clearly of opinion it could not. When the landlord became aware that the bailiff was a trespasser it was clearly his duty to put an end to the situation, and it was also to his interest to do so, for by continuing the trespass he was rendering himself liable for damages; but as it turned out the tenant prevented the landlord from acting by shutting out the bailiff and refusing to re-admit him to the premises. It is quite clear that the landlord could not have satisfied the arrears of rent out of the property seized under the proceedings which had been called a distress. The whole foundation of a plea that there has been a prior distress lies in the fact that the landlord has already exercised his rights by taking proceedings which might and would have given him all that he was vexatiously seeking to get by the second proceedings. But there is nothing in the present case which could be successfully pleaded as a voluntary act on the part of the landlord amounting to a withdrawal from the completion of a distress which would, if persisted in, have given him all that he sought to obtain by means of the second proceeding.

Then it was contended for the plaintiff that, assuming that the first proceeding was a trespass and was void within the principle of the decision in Attack v. Bramwell, the defendant was estopped from setting up such a defence, and thereby taking advantage of his own wrong, and a passage as to the doctrine of estoppel was cited from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in In re Hallett's Estate. But in my opinion the defence of estoppel has no foundation in the facts of the present case upon which it can properly be based. Rent was admittedly due from the plaintiff, and the defendant levied a distress for that rent. It is contended that he had no right to do so because he had previously distrained in respect of it. It is the tenant who is setting up the previous proceeding, and I do not see how any principle of estoppel can be invoked to prevent the landlord from saying that the illegal act of his bailiff cannot be set up as a prior distress, and that the plaintiff's right was to treat it, as in fact it was treated by the plaintiff, as a trespass. I think that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The principles upon which a second distress is not allowed are fully discussed in Bagge v. Mawby and Dawson v. Cropp. In the former case Parke, B., said: "There is nothing more clear than this, that a person cannot distrain twice for the same rent, for if he has the opportunity of levying the amount of the first distress it is vexatious in him to levy the second, unless there be some legal ground for his adopting such a course, as, for example, in the instance put by Lord Mansfield, C.J., in the case referred to in the argument, Hutchins v. Chambers, 1 Burr. 789. But if there is a fair opportunity, and there is no lawful or legal cause why he should not work out the payment of the rent by reason of the first distress, his duty is to work it out by the first distress, and he cannot distrain again." How is the principle there enunciated to be applied to the facts of this case. The first distress was illegal because it was a trespass, and it follows from the decision in Attack v. Bramwell that, being a trespass, it was void ab initio. It is impossible to treat the language used in the judgment in that case as amounting merely to a dictum; there is the most definite statement in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., that the distress was altogether void and the entry on the plaintiff's premises and seizure of his goods a trespass ab initio. If that is the true doctrine, how does it apply to a case where the first so-called distress is altogether void and the landlord seeks to confirm his rights by distraining again. I think it clear that in the present case the landlord had no opportunity of making the first distress effective; he had no means of doing that which in Bagge v. Mawby it was said to be his duty to do—that is, to work out the payment of the rent by the first distress; he could not do so legally, for he was not in the position of a distrainer at all. It has been contended that he had had the opportunity because he employed a bailiff; but that is not the sense in which the expression has been used. It may be true in a sense that an opportunity once presented itself to the landlord, by which one phrase in the judgment of Parke, B., might be satisfied; but if we take the concluding words of the same sentence it is perfectly obvious that the defendant could not have worked out the payment of the rent by reason of the original distress. When Parke, B., used the expression "if there is a fair opportunity," he obviously meant to refer to a state of circumstances in which, during the distress, the landlord has an opportunity of working out the amount of the rent by the machinery of the distress. Here the landlord had no such opportunity. For these reasons I think the decision in Attack v. Bramwell really governs this case. Then it is contended for the plaintiff that there was an impounding of the goods by the broker as the landlord's agent, and that during the continuance of that impounding the plaintiff could not take his goods out of the custody of the law. But the doctrine there invoked had its origin in the prevention of a breach of the peace, and it cannot compel us to hold that the first proceeding, which was a trespass ab inito, was equivalent to an actual distress. And it is further said that the defendant is estopped from taking advantage of his own wrong; but I agree with my brother Kennedy that that principle has no application to the case.

REX v. VASEY AND LALLY. (a.)

Criminal law—Fisheries—Construction of statutes—Malicious Injuries to Property Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), s. 32—Salmon Fishery Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71), s. 13.

By section 32 of the Malicious Injuries to Property Act, 1861, as amended by section 13 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, it is an offence to unlawfully and maliciously put lime or any other noxious substance into a salmon river with the intention of destroying fish, notwithstanding that the language of the section of the amending Act cannot be read grammatically with that of the principal Act; the duty of the court, in such cases, being to give effect to the intention of the Legislature.

Case stated for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved by Grantham, J.:

"John Thomas Vasey and Joseph Lally were convicted before me at the Midsummer Assizes, 1905, for the county of Durham, upon an indictment under 24 & 25 Vict c. 97, s. 32, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 71, s. 13, charging them with having, on the 18th of June, 1905, at the parish of Walsingham, in the county of Durham, unlawfully and maliciously put a quantity of lime into Bradley Burn, a tributary of a certain salmon river called the River Wear there situate, with intent thereby to destoy the fish then being in the said tributary of the said salmon river.

"Judgment was postponed, and the prisoners were discharged upon their own recognizances of bail to appear and receive judgment when called upon.

"All the facts necessary to support this indictment were proved, but a question was raised as to the effect of the sections under which the indictment was laid.

"Those sections are in the terms following—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97 (Malicious Injury to Property Act, 1861), s. 32: 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously cut through, break down, or otherwise destroy the dam, floodgate, or sluice of any fish-pond or of any water which shall be private property or in which there shall be any private right of fishery, with intent thereby to take or destroy any of the fish in such pond or water or so as thereby to cause the loss or destruction of any of the fish, or shall unlawfully or maliciously put any lime or other noxious material in any such pond or water with intent thereby to destroy any of the fish that may then or that may thereafter be put therein, or shall unlawfully or maliciously cut through, break down, or otherwise destroy the dam or floodgate of any mill-pond, reservoir, or pool shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour and with or without solitary confinement, and if a male under the age of sixteen years with or without whipping.' 36 & 37 Vict. c. 71, s. 13: 'The provisions of the 32nd section of the Malicious Injuries to Property Act so far as they relate to poisoning any water with intent to kill or destroy fish shall be extended and apply to salmon rivers as if the words 'or in any salmon river' were inserted in the section in lieu of the words 'private rights of fishery,' after the words 'noxious material in any such pond or water.'

"The question for the decision of the court is whether having regard to the apparent inconsistency of its language the later section is effective to extend the provisions of the former section to salmon rivers, for although there is no doubt as to the object of the section, it seems impossible to make the section of the amended Act read grammatically when altered as directed by the amended section."

Mitchell-Innes, for the prosecution.—This section cannot obviously be read literally, and it is suggested that the simplest course is to construe section 13 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, as if did not contain the words "in lieu of the words 'private rights of fishery.'" It is submitted that where the intention of the Act is clear, effect should be given to that intention by the court. Here the draftsman has made nonsense of the section, and the section should be so construed as to give effect to the manifest intention of the Legislature: Salmon v. Duncombe, 11 App. Cas. 627; Curtis v. Stovin, 22 Q. B. D. 613; Stone v. Corporation of Yeovil, 25 W. R. 240, 1 C. P. D. 673.

No counsel appeared on behalf of the prisoner.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—After the clear argument on behalf of the prosecution I have no doubt that effect ought to be given to the principle which he has referred to, and which is to be found in the authorities he has cited to us. If, however, the effect of strictly following the words of the statute were that a limited application would be given to section 32 of the Act of 1861, we should be bound to apply the Act in its strict meaning. But Mr. Mitchell-Innes has called our attention to a passage in Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes (3rd ed., p. 319), which has been referred to. The language is: "Where the language of a statute in its ordinary meaning and grammatical construction leads to a manifest contradiction of the apparent purpose of the enactment or to some inconvenience or absurdity, hardship, or injustice, presumably not intended, a construction may be put upon it which modifies the meaning of the words and even the construction of the sentence," and in support of that statement a series of authorities are given extending over a period of fifty or sixty years. Further, in Salmon v. Duncombe Lord Hobhouse after referring to the general proposition that when the object of a statute is clear it is not to be reduced to a nullity by the draftsman's unskilfulness or ignorance of law, says: "If such a construction left a substantial operative effect to the enactment it might be necessary to answer that question in the affirmative, but as it destroys the expressed objects altogether unless the word 'resident' be construed to mean 'domiciled,' and in that case destroys the expressed objects so far as regards real property, their lordships answer it in the negative." In the present case we have to see whether or not section 13 of the Act of 1873 requires to be modified in consequence of its effect being reduced to a nullity if what I call the literal directions are followed. Now, the object of the section is abundantly plain. The provisions of section 32 of the Act of 1861 so far as they relate to the poisoning of any water with intent to kill or destroy the fish are intended to be extended and applied to salmon rivers and therefore it is quite plain that the object of the Act of 1873 is stated on the face of section 13 of that Act, and it was to prevent the destruction of property in salmon rivers by the very grave and serious act of putting poison in the water. Then in order to mark it out the draftsman has added the words "as if the words 'or in any salmon river' were inserted in the said section in lieu of the words 'private rights of fishery.'" I think that in all probability the language of the amending section was adopted in consequence of the draftsman forgetting that "private rights of fishery" was not the description of the class or the ambit of the property to which the previous section applied, but was only the end of a sentence which begins with the words "destroy the dam, floodgate, or sluice of any fish-pond or of any water which shall be private property or in which there shall be any private right of fishery with intent thereby to take or destroy any of the fish in such pond or water, or so as thereby to cause the loss or destruction of any of the fish, or shall unlawfully and maliciously put any lime or other noxious material in any such pond or water." The draftsman has obviously forgotten that the words "private rights of fishery" were not words of description of the property which was protected by section 32 of the Act of 1861, and I have no doubt that the words "in lieu of the words 'private rights of fishery'" are merely meant to indicate salmon rivers in the place of the property which comes within the ambit of that previous section. That intention is made abundantly clear because the place in which the words "salmon rivers" are to be added is to be after the words "noxious material in any such pond or water," and if regard is had to the intention of the direction as to the words "or any salmon river" being inserted in lieu of the words "private rights of fishery," and the words "or in any salmon river" are inserted after the words "any such pond or water," section 32 of the Act of 1861 so amended reads perfectly well. I therefore think that this case is an instance involving the principle recognized in those authorities where it has been held that the manifest intention of a statute must not be defeated by a too literal construction of its precise terms. Whether the words "in lieu of the words 'private rights of fishery'" are to be disregarded as merely indicating that the salmon river is to take the place of the other rights of property that were protected; or whether the word "such" is to be taken to import the previous description, "fish-pond or of any water which shall be private property or in which there shall be any private right of fishery," so that in one sense there may be a substitution of a salmon river for a property so described under the words "such pond," the same result is arrived at.

In my opinion, the intention of the statute being that which I have alluded to, it would reduce the effect of a very important amendment for the protection of property to nothing, if we were to hold that there could be no conviction in consequence of this special provision; and I think, therefore, this conviction must be affirmed.

Divorce—Adultery of petitioner—Discretion of court—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 31.

The petitioner was an actress, and was at the time of her marriage sixteen years old and an orphan. The respondent seduced her and afterwards married her; he took her to various places and compelled her to obtain money by prostitution, he taking the money and ill-treating her. After about two years she ran away, and while away occasionally obtained money by prostitution, as she was destitute.

The Court held that the facts of the case justified it in pronouncing a decree in the petitioner's favour, notwithstanding her adultery.

Maria Kate Dodson prayed for a dissolution of her marriage with Christopher George Frederick Dodson under the following circumstances. The case was undefended.

The petitioner was married to the respondent on the 4th of April, 1899, at the district registry, Southwark, and there were no children of the marriage. The petitioner was about seventeen years old at the time of her marriage and was an orphan, her father having died when she was twelve and her mother when she (the petitioner) was fifteen. She was left practically unprovided for and was without friends and endeavoured to support herself by the stage. After her mother's death the petitioner was adopted by a friend, a Miss Murray, who was also an actress, and she lived with her until April, 1899. The two were residing in a lodging-house, but during Miss Murray's absence on tour for a few days the son of the lodging-house keeper (the respondent) seduced the petitioner and afterwards married her.

He then took her to live at an immoral house, took her to the Royal Aquarium, and told her she must earn money by prostitution, while he passed himself off as her brother. He gave up his work and compelled her to hand over the money she obtained by prostitution. He ill-treated, thrashed, and bullied her and terrorized her into the life that she led.

In 1901 she ran away from her husband, and occasionally earned money by prostitution from sheer destitution.

She had no relations of her own, but again came across Miss Murray, who again befriended her, and with whom she had since been living a perfectly respectable life.

She had ascertained that the respondent was committing adultery with a girl named Lilly Coombs, and the petitioner asked that the court should exercise its discretion in her favour and grant a decree on the ground of the respondent's cruelty and adultery.

Barnard, K.C., and Randolph, for the petitioner.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J.—His lordship said he was satisfied that the case of adultery and cruelty had been made out against the respondent. It was a horrible story, but it was clear to him that the petitioner's adultery was the direct result of the respondent's gross and depraved conduct. With regard to the wife's acts of prostitution after she had left her husband, she said it was the result of destitution. He (the learned judge) thought that that also was attributable to the husband's own conduct, and he should grant the petitioner a decree nisi.

SMITH v. SMITH. (a.)

Divorce—Desertion—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 27.

The Court held that the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, with regard to desertion do not oust the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court with regard to desertion, and hence the matrimonial offence of desertion under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, may be committed notwithstanding the existence of a separation order made under section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

On the 25th of November, 1896, the parties were married, and in January, 1899, the husband refused to cohabit with his wife.

On the 5th of March of that year the wife obtained a separation order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

In February, 1905, the husband wrote to his wife saying that for some years past he had been "walking out" with a girl and that she was about to be confined. The wife then petitioned for a dissolution of her marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion, and the question raised for the consideration of the court was whether the respondent had been guilty of desertion within the meaning of section 27 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, inasmuch as the wife had obtained a separation order which was subsisting.

Bayford, for the petitioner, referred to Kay v. Kay, [1904] P. 382, 53 W. R. Dig. 49.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J., in delivering judgment, said that the point to be decided was a very important one. The original order of the magistrates—and this was material to the case—did not find, in terms, that the husband had deserted the wife, although they had ordered him to pay her an allowance, having found that he neglected to provide for her. The order had been made under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and had the effect of a judicial separation granted, not on the ground of desertion, but on that of neglect to maintain. Since the 5th of March, 1897, the date of that order, the respondent had occasionally neglected to pay the allowance, and on one occasion had gone to prison for omitting to do so, the petitioner being all the time ready and willing to resume cohabitation while the order remained in force. The respondent, however, simply kept aloof until 1901, when he took up with another woman, so that between March, 1897, and the latter date the petitioner had no ground of complaint outside the matters that had been dealt with on the magistrates' order. A judicial separation could not be granted for neglect to maintain in this court, but could for desertion, but that desertion must continue for two years. What, therefore, was the position? Could it be said that the Act of 1895 conferred upon the magistrates the power to grant a judicial separation for a desertion of two months? He did not think it possible that the jurisdiction of this court had been extended in that direction by the Act. He had therefore decided to take no cognizance of the desertion complained of by the petitioner in March, 1897. The order made said that it had the effect of a judicial separation. The Act of 1895 had not referred to this court, nor did it say that it extended its powers. The present petitioner had been deserted in 1897, and the case could only be dealt with in that way. Her husband had never approached her since then, and desertion continued, and four years ago he had taken up and lived with another woman. The decision of the magistrates, so far as this court was concerned, was a nullity. It had been meant only as a protection for the woman, and could have been set aside at any time. He therefore found as a fact that desertion and adultery had taken place, and he granted the petitioner a decree nisi, with costs.

BAINBRIDGE v. THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL AND CRANE. (a.)

Crown—Postmaster-General—Liability to be sued in official capacity—Action for negligence of subordinate—Immunity of head of Government department—Telegraph Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 112), s. 42—Telegraph Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 110), s. 2.

The Postmaster-General is not liable to be sued in his official capacity for the negligence of a person employed in the telegraph service; his immunity from liability to an action for the default of a subordinate official in the Post Office not being affected by anything contained in the Telegraph Acts, 1863, 1868, and 1878.

Appeal by the Postmaster-General from the refusal of Walton, J., to order the name of the Postmaster-General, as a defendant to the action, to be struck out.

The plaintiffs were Elizabeth Lawson Bainbridge and her father John Bainbridge. The indorsement on the writ, as amended, was as follows: "The plaintiff Elizabeth Lawson Bainbridge's claim is for damages for personal injuries to the said plaintiff sustained through the negligence of the defendants or their servants. The plaintiff John Bainbridge's claim is for damages for loss of services and wages owing to the said personal injuries. The plaintiffs' claim against the defendant, the Postmaster-General, is in his corporate capacity under statutes 26 & 27 Vict. c. 112, ss. 18 and 42, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 110."

The action was based on alleged negligence in the reinstatement of a footway at Wigan, which had been taken up for the purpose of repairing a telegraph cable. The defendant Crane was the Post Office sectional engineer of the district.

The action was originally brought by the female plaintiff alone against the defendant Crane alone, but the plaintiff subsequently obtained leave from the registrar of the Liverpool District Registry of the High Court of Justice, out of which the writ issued, to add the name of John Bainbridge as plaintiff, and the name of the Postmaster-General in his corporate capacity as defendant.

After the writ had been amended, a summons was taken out on behalf of the Postmaster-General asking for an order that his name should be struck out. The district registrar referred the summons to the judge. Walton, J., declined to make an order, but gave leave to appeal.

The Postmaster-General appealed accordingly.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and A. H. Maxwell, for the Postmaster-General.—This case raises the question whether the Postmaster-General can be sued in tort in his corporate capacity. He cannot be so sued either at common law or by virtue of any statute. Walton, J., expressed the opinion that this question ought not to be decided in an interlocutory proceeding. But the matter must be dealt with at this stage. The Postmaster-General cannot appear to this action brought against him in his corporate capacity, his contention being that he is not a corporation. The position of the Postmaster-General at common law is clear. He is the head of a Government department. Neither he nor the head of any other Government department is liable, in the absence of some special statutory provision, to be sued for the default of a subordinate. The principle of the non-liability of the head of a department of State for the negligence of persons working under the department in a subordinate capacity was laid down in the case of Lane v. Cotton, 1 Ld. Raym. 646, where it was held by the Court of King's Bench, Lord Holt dissenting, that the Postmaster-General was not liable for the loss of certain Exchequer bills sent by post. The question was again considered, and the same principle was laid down, by Romer, J., in the case of Raleigh v. Goschen, 46 W. R. 90, [1898] 1 Ch. 73. That was an action of trespass brought against the Lords of the Admiralty, and the decision was that the head of a Government department was not liable for the neglect or torts of subordinate officials in the department unless it can be shown that the act complained of was substantially the act of the head of the department himself. Graham v. Public Works Commissioners, 50 W. R. 122, [1901] 2 K. B. 781, was an action for breach of a contract entered into by the commissioners of works with a firm of builders for the erection of a public building. Ridley, J., and Phillimore, J., held on different grounds that the commissioners were liable, but the general principle previously laid down was admitted. There is therefore no liability at common law. But the plaintiff relies on certain statutes which he says render the Postmaster-General liable to be sued in such circumstances as the present—viz., the Telegraph Acts, 1863, 1868, and 1878. The Post Office Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 33), by section 2 enacted that her Majesty's present Postmaster-General, and the person or persons to be from time to time thereafter appointed by the Queen's Majesty by letters patent under the Great Seal, should be the master of the Post Office by the style of her Majesty's Postmaster-General, and conferred on the Postmaster-General the exclusive privilege of conveying from one place to another all letters, with certain exceptions. By section 11, the letters patent granted to the then Postmaster-General, the Earl of Lichfield, were to continue in force. The Post Office Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 96), by section 67 enables the Postmaster-General to hold and take conveyances and leases of messuages, tenements, lands, and hereditaments for the service of the Post Office, and makes him and his successors a body corporate for that purpose. The Telegraph Act, 1863, is a sort of Telegraph Companies Clauses Act. Section 3 gives a definition of "company." Section 4 incorporates the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, with respect to the recovery of damages not specially provided for, and of penalties (section 6). Sections 17 and 18 impose certain restrictions on the right of telegraph companies to open streets and public roads, by providing that they shall only be opened after notice and under superintendence, and that they shall be restored and kept in repair for six months. Section 42 enacts that every telegraph company should be answerable for all accidents, damages, and injuries happening through the act or default of the company or of any person in their employment by reason or in consequence of any of the company's works. The Telegraph Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 110), is an "Act to enable her Majesty's Postmaster-General to acquire, work, and maintain electric telegraphs." The preamble states that it is expedient that her Majesty's Postmaster-General be empowered to work telegraphs in connection with the administration of the Post Office. Section 2 is as follows: "The Telegraph Act, 1863, shall be incorporated with this Act, except so far as the same, or any part thereof, may be expressly varied, altered, or be inconsistent with this Act; and the term 'the company,' in the Telegraph Act, 1863, shall, in addition to the meaning assigned to it in that Act, mean the Postmaster-General." Section 4 empowers the Postmaster-General to purchase the undertakings of telegraph companies. Section 5 contains provisions with regard to the sale by the companies of their undertakings to the Postmaster-General, and section 6 provides that all Acts, charters, and grants, and all valid deeds and agreements of companies selling their undertakings shall remain in full force, and all the powers thereof shall be exercised by the Postmaster-General. The Telegraph Act, 1878, by section 11, provides as follows: "Any legal proceedings may be instituted by the Postmaster-General for any of the purposes of any of the Telegraph Acts in the name of her Majesty's Postmaster-General for the time being, and shall not abate or be discontinued by reason of any change in the person who is Postmaster-General, but may be carried on as if her Majesty's Postmaster-General for the time being were a body corporate." The result of all these statutory provisions is that the Postmaster-General is not under any greater liability with regard to the working of the telegraphs than he previously was with regard to the service of letters. The legislation is inconsistent with the idea that he is a body corporate. He is made a body corporate for one purpose, and one purpose only—viz., the holding of property—and proceedings instituted by him are to be carried on as if he were a body corporate. That implies that he is not a body corporate in any general sense. It follows that he cannot be held liable in tort for the default of a subordinate on the ground of being a body corporate, neither do the statutes impose that liability on him in any other way. The only case in which the liability of the Postmaster-General has been considered since the Telegraph Act, 1868, is the Irish case of Jones v. Monsell, Ir. Rep. 6 C. L. 155. That was a claim for damages for negligence similar to the present. The court held that the Postmaster-General was not liable in his personal capacity. They did not in any way decide that he could have been made liable in his official capacity. The judgment of the majority of the court in Lane v. Cotton was approved and followed by the whole of the Court of King's Bench in the time of Lord Mansfield in the case of Whitfield v. Lord Le Despencer, 2 Cowp. 754. There is a subsidiary difficulty to the maintenance of this action, viz., that there is no fund out of which the Postmaster-General could pay damages.

F. E. Smith, for the plaintiff.—The Postmaster-General in his corporate capacity is liable to be sued in circumstances such as the present. The primâ facie constitutional difficulty which has been raised is not a serious one. It is based on the old maxim that the King can do no wrong, and on the old rule that neither the King nor those who represent him directly are liable to an action of tort. That rule had its origin at a time when the moral element in the conception of tort occupied a larger space than it does now, and at a time when the Crown had not yet undertaken any functions which involved the carrying on of trade. Up to the year 1868 the business of transmitting and delivering telegrams was carried on by telegraph companies. Those companies possessed rights and were subject to liabilities like other ordinary trading companies. It is suggested that the Telegraph Act of 1868, while transferring to the Postmaster-General the rights which the companies possessed, renders him immune from the liabilities to which they were subject. If that had been the intention of the Legislature, it would have been expressly so enacted. On the contrary, section 2 of the Act of 1868 provides that, in construing the Telegraph Act of 1863, the term "the company" shall be read as including the Postmaster-General. Section 18 of the Act of 1863, so amended, imposes on the Postmaster-General the duty to keep in repair for six months any street or public road which has been opened for laying down telegraph wires, and renders him liable to penalties for failure to comply with any of the provisions of the section. And section 42 of the Act of 1863, so amended, reads as follows: "The Postmaster-General shall be answerable for all accidents, damage, and injuries happening through the act or default of the Postmaster-General or of any person in his employment by reason or in consequence of any of the Postmaster-General's works." The Act of 1878 does not seem to have anything to do with this case. The effect of the Act of 1868 was that the Government took over the advantages and the disadvantages of the telegraph companies. The Postmaster-General, as a public official, was substituted for the trading companies, and, like any other master, he is liable to answer for the wrongs of his servants—that is to say, of persons who are employed in the telegraph service. The constitutional difficulty is met by section 2 of the Act of 1868. The action therefore lies.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., in reply.—The head of a Government department is not the master of the persons employed under the department. He and they alike are all servants of the Crown. This is clearly shown in the judgments in Lane v. Cotton. Section 42 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, even when read in the way proposed by the plaintiff, does not establish the liability of the Postmaster-General. For the word "employment" still remains in the section, and subordinate officials of the Post Office are not in the employment of the Postmaster-General. It is a mistake to suggest that the non-liability of the head of a Government department has not been affirmed since the State has undertaken any trading functions. In the very case of Lane v. Cotton the question arose with regard to the Postmaster-General. If the Postmaster-General could be held liable in this action he would be liable for the negligence of an employee in the transmission of a telegram. If it had been intended to put any liability on the Postmaster-General with regard to the working of the telegraph service it would have been clearly so enacted.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 17.—COLLINS, M.R.—This case comes before us by way of an appeal from an order of Walton, J. Elizabeth Lawson Bainbridge, the daughter of John Bainbridge, was injured by reason, as she alleges, of the negligence of one Crane, who is a subordinate official of the Post Office; he is called a post office sectional engineer. The action was brought, in the first instance, in her name against Crane, charging him with responsibility for the pain and damage sustained by her through an accident arising, as was alleged, out of his negligence in dealing with the laying of an electric wire. Afterwards her father was introduced into the action as plaintiff claiming damages for the loss of his daughter's services, and a further amendment was made adding the name of the Postmaster-General as defendant. On that part of the case, the addition of the Postmaster-General as defendant, the question arises which we now have to determine. The Postmaster-General took steps to have his name struck out on the ground that there was no cause of action against him. His name was introduced in his public capacity. The amendment makes the action against the Postmaster-General in his corporate capacity under the statutes of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 112 and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 110. The meaning of that is this. The first of the statutes referred to, the Telegraph Act, 1863, was passed for the purpose of regulating the exercise of powers under special Acts for the construction and maintenance of telegraphs. It lays down provisions applicable to the working of telegraphs by companies. Section 3 gives the definition of a company: "The term 'the company' means any company to be hereafter authorized as aforesaid (hereinafter distinguished by the term 'future company') or any company already so authorized (hereinafter distinguished by the term 'existing company')." Section 6 mentions the various works, including the opening of streets and roads, which a telegraph company may execute subject to the restrictions of the Act. Section 18 provides that, after a company have opened a street or road, they shall restore it and keep it in repair for six months, and that, if they fail to comply in any respect with the provisions of the section, they shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty. Section 42, which is the section most relied on, is as follows: "The company shall be answerable for all accidents, damages, and injuries happening through the act or default of the company or of any person in their employment by reason or in consequence of any of the company's works, and shall save harmless all bodies having the control of streets or public roads, collectively and individually, and their officers and servants, from all damages and costs in respect of such accidents and injuries." That was the law regulating companies who undertook the duty of laying down telegraph wires. Subsequently the Act on which the present question arises was passed—viz., the Telegraph Act, 1868. The preamble of that Act is as follows: "Whereas the means of communication by electric telegraphs within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland are insufficient, and many important districts are without any such means of communication; and whereas it would be attended with great advantage to the State, as well as to merchants and traders and to the public generally, if a cheaper, more widely extended, and more expeditious system of telegraphy were established in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and to that end it is expedient that her Majesty's Postmaster-General be empowered to work telegraphs in connection with the administration of the Post Office." The Act then proceeds to enact by section 2: "The Telegraph Act, 1863, shall be incorporated with this Act, except so far as the same, or any part thereof, may be expressly varied, altered, or be inconsistent with this Act; and the term 'the company' in the Telegraph Act, 1863, shall, in addition to the meaning assigned to it in that Act, mean the Postmaster-General." The Act then empowers the Postmaster-General to purchase the undertakings of telegraph companies, which are to vest in him in his corporate capacity, which had been conferred on him for the purpose of holding property by the Post Office Act, 1840. Something turned on that in the course of the argument to which I will refer later on.

We now see the foundation on which the plaintiffs base their action. Their argument is that an action lies, not only against Crane, the author of the wrong, but also against the person upon whose behalf and by whose orders he was carrying out the work of laying the telegraph wires, and that the statute makes the Postmaster-General one of the persons who must be taken to be charged with the duties imposed by the Legislature on telegraph companies. They say that if section 42 of the Act of 1863 is read with the introduction of the words "the Postmaster-General" in addition to "the company," it will be seen that the Postmaster-General is responsible for the negligence of his subordinate Crane, and that an action for damages lies against him in his official capacity. Now, apart from the statutory enactments, and unless the section, which says that the term "the company" shall include the Postmaster-General, has the effect of making him liable in his official capacity, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that he would not have been liable for the negligent act of a subordinate officer. It is important to see the principle on which at common law the conclusion was arrived at that the Postmaster-General could not be so liable unless there was direct proof that he had ordered the act to be done, if the act purported to be done on his behalf. The question first arose a long time ago. The leading authority is the case of Lane v. Cotton, decided in 1701. The head-note of the report is as follows: "The head of a public office under Government with power to appoint and remove the servants of the office who are to be paid by, and give at his discretion security to, Government, is not responsible to an individual for a loss occasioned by the default of such servants. The servant, who is guilty of the default, is. The Postmaster-General is not answerable for a packet delivered to the receiver at the post office and lost out of the office. But the receiver is." Lord Holt differed from the opinion of the other judges, Turton, Powys, and Gould, JJ., who decided that case. The same question came up again for discussion in the time of Lord Mansfield, when the whole court affirmed the decision of the majority in the earlier case. It seems to me that the principle on which that majority acted is the principle which was adopted and made the basis of the judgment of Lord Mansfield in the subsequent case. I will therefore refer to the judgments of the majority in Lane v. Cotton to see what the principle was on which they were based. Gould, J., who was the first to give judgment, said: "If anything can support this action, it must be a contract express or implied; but here is neither one nor the other. The security of the despatcher depends upon the credit of the office, as founded upon the Act. Breese"—that is the delinquent receiver—"is as much an officer as the defendants, but they are more general officers. But Breese is the King's officer, and if there is any contract, it is between the plaintiff and Breese; which appears by the Act, which appoints several acts for all, and puts confidence in all. And, therefore, they resemble a community of officers acting in several trusts, and every one shall answer for himself, not one for the act of another, as in case of a dean and chapter: 1 Edw. 5, 5, a. If the defendants had died, yet Breese would have continued officer, and therefore Breese has a charge and trust of himself, and is not a deputy to the defendants." Powys, J., said: "The defendants have not the power of the management of the office according to their discretion, but are subject to the control of the King and of the Treasury. And because the inferior officers are servants of the King and not of the defendants, their wages being paid to them out of the revenue of the Post Office, and the security taken of them in the name of the King; and therefore it is unreasonable that the defendants should be answerable for the acts of their inferior officers." Turton, J., gave judgment to the same effect. The ground of all their judgments seems to be that there is no relation of master and servant between a superior officer of the Crown and a subordinate officer, and that therefore the superior officer cannot be made responsible in an action for damages for the default of the subordinate officer. The same principle applies whether the claim be one in tort or in contract. Being all equally servants of the Crown, they are not servants of each other. When the question again came up for discussion, the dissenting judgment of Lord Holt was much canvassed, and the court adopted the decision of the other judges. The case is that of Whitfield v. Lord Le Despencer. The head-note is: "Case does not lie against the Postmaster-General for a bank note stolen by one of the sorters out of a letter delivered into the post office." Lord Mansfield said: "The Postmaster-General has no hire, enters into no contract, carries on no merchandize or commerce. But the Post Office is a branch of revenue, and a branch of police, created by an Act of Parliament. As a branch of revenue, there are great receipts; but there is likewise a great surplus of benefit and advantage to the public arising from the fund. As a branch of police, it puts the whole correspondence of the kingdom (for the exceptions are very trifling) under Government, and entrusts the management and direction of it to the Crown and officers appointed by the Crown. There is no analogy, therefore, between the case of the postmaster and a common carrier. The branch of revenue and the branch of police are to be governed by different officers. The superior has the appointment of the inferior officers, but they give security to the Crown. One requisite is that they shall take the oaths taken by all public officers, another strong guard is that they are made subject to heavy penalties." Then, further on, he said: "If the man who receives a penny to carry the letters to the post office loses any of them he is answerable; so is the sorter in the business of his department; so is the postmaster for any fault of his own. Here no personal neglect is imputed to the defendants, nor is the action brought on that ground, but for a constructive negligence only by the act of their servants. In order to succeed, therefore, it must be shown that it is a loss to be supported by the postmaster, which it certainly is not. As to the argument which has been drawn from the salary which the defendants enjoy, in a matter of revenue and police under the authority of an Act of Parliament the salary attached to the office is for no other consideration than the trouble of executing it. The case of the postmaster, therefore, is in no circumstance whatever similar to that of a common carrier." And at the end of his judgment he said: "If there could have been any doubt, therefore, before the determination of Lane v. Cotton, the solemn judgment in that case, having stood uncontroverted ever since, puts the matter beyond dispute." Those passages show that the court adopted the reasoning of the majority of the judges in the earlier case, and arrived at the conclusion that these subordinate officers are servants of the Crown and are not in the relation of servants to their superior officers.

That being so, has the Legislature altered the immunity of the Postmaster-General? Are there any words to be found in the statute which cut down the position of the Postmaster-General with regard to immunity from what it was before he took over the telegraphs? When the provisions which are supposed to have this effect are analyzed, they seem to me to leave the Postmaster-General where he was before. In his official capacity he retains his former immunity. It is contended that he is made liable by section 42 of the Act of 1863 as amended by the alteration in the definition of "company." So amended the section reads: "The Postmaster-General shall be answerable for all accidents, damages, and injuries happening through the act or default of the Postmaster-General or of any person in his employment by reason or in consequence of any of the Postmaster-General's works," &c. It is not suggested that the Postmaster-General himself had anything to do with the negligence of which the plaintiff complains. The plaintiff is obliged to put his case on the footing that Crane was in the employment of the Postmaster-General. That condition is not fulfilled. Crane was not in the employment of the Postmaster-General. He is a subordinate officer of the Crown, and the suggested nexus between the Postmaster-General and him is broken at once. That is sufficient to dispose of this this case, but there are other difficulties in the way of the action. There is no section in any of the statutes providing for any fund out of which damages could be paid by the Postmaster-General in such a case as this. And it is clear that the revenue of the country cannot, in the absence of some legislative provision, be reached by an action brought by a private individual against a public officer in his official capacity: Palmer v. Hutchinson, 6 App. Cas. 619. I think that this case is analogous to that which is mentioned by Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., in Viscount Canterbury v. Attorney-General, 1 Phill., p. 324. He there says: "But then it is said, these officers are appointed by the Crown, and are removable at the pleasure of the Crown. That circumstance alone will not, I conceive, create any such liability. The Keeper of the Great Seal and other persons holding high situations in the State have authority to appoint to many offices, and also to remove the persons so appointed at their pleasure. But they are not on that account subject to make compensation for injury occasioned by the neglect or misconduct of the persons so appointed. The mere selection of the officers does not create a liability. But if the Crown would not be responsible for the act had it been done by the superiors, it follows that it cannot be held liable for the negligence of their subordinate agent whom they appoint and remove, and with the selection or control of whom the Crown has no concern." I think the authorities I have cited show that there was no nexus or relation of master and servant between the Postmaster-General and Crane. The question of the liability of the Postmaster-General was raised in Ireland in the case of Jones v. Monsell, the only case in which this subject has been considered since the passing of the Telegraph Acts. The question there was whether the Postmaster-General could be made liable in his personal capacity, and the court held that he could not. The question whether he could be made liable in his official capacity was left open, but the court spoke of his corporate capacity, and from some of their expressions it might be thought they considered incorporation to be a cardinal factor in the discussion. If the standard was whether the Postmaster-General was incorporated or not, that would give rise to a difficulty in this case; for it is pointed out that he is not incorporated generally for all purposes, and certainly was never incorporated for the purpose of being made liable to an action for damages. In my opinion, however, it is not necessary to rely on that, for I think that the meaning of the decision in the Irish case was not to make incorporation the test, but to emphasize the distinction between what the Postmaster-General did in his personal capacity and what he did in his official capacity. The whole law on the subject of the liability of the heads of Government departments has recently been fully stated by Romer, L.J., in the case of Raleigh v. Goschen.

On these grounds I think that Walton, J., was wrong in not stopping the action against the Postmaster-General. In point of fact the learned judge seems to have done little more than invite us to consider this question, not giving any final opinion himself. But in point of form we must reverse his decision and allow the appeal.

KENT AND ANOTHER v. FITTALL. (a.)

Election law — Registration — Occupation franchise — Lodger—Dwelling-house—Part of a house—Landlord residing in house — Control — Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), ss. 3, 4—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 5.

Where rooms in a house are let out to tenants so as to constitute separate dwelling-houses, the mere fact that the landlord resides in the house does not of itself make the tenants lodgers. It is a question of fact in each case depending upon whether the landlord has any right of control over the rooms let to the tenants. If the landlord has no control over the part of the house which is let to a tenant it is immaterial that he retains control over the passages and staircases and other parts which are used in common by the tenants. Nor is the fact that the landlord pays the rates and taxes and executes the repairs to the house inconsistent with an independent occupation, of the part let, by the tenant as an occupier and not as a lodger.

Case stated by a revising barrister.

"1. At a court holden before me, the barrister duly appointed to revise the lists of voters for the Parliamentary borough of Devonport, Henry Hartnell duly objected to the name of Frank Herbert being retained in the occupiers' list (Division I.) for the parish of Devonport on the ground: 'That you have not occupied as owner or tenant the premises named in the said list for twelve months immediately preceding the 15th of July in this year.'

"2. The facts of the case as found by me were as follows: Frank Herbert occupies as his residence, and has so done for the necessary qualifying period under a verbal hiring agreement from week to week, at a rent of 3s. 8d. per week, one unfurnished tenement room on the third floor of a house, No. 8, Morice-square, such room constituting a separate dwelling and being used by him for all purposes of living, and being separately occupied by him as a dwelling or dwelling-house; and he has let to him therewith such use of the passages and staircases as is necessary and convenient to the access to, and enjoyment of, the said dwelling.

"3. Frank Herbert's landlord is one Charles John Weevil, to whom the said premises, 8, Morice-square, are demised on a yearly tenancy by the owner, one Mrs. Waterhouse.

"4. The said Charles John Weevil resides in a separate and independent tenement or set of rooms upon the said premises.

"5. There are four other occupiers under agreements of hiring with the said Charles John Weevil residing upon the said premises under exactly similar conditions as the said Frank Herbert, save that their tenements are upon different floors and the number of rooms occupied varies. There is also let to the said Frank Herbert and the other said occupiers the use in common of the courtyard, w.c., and wash-house situate therein.

"6. The said Charles John Weevil occupies a set of rooms similarly with the other occupiers of the said house, and so far as their relationship inter se as residents is concerned the said Charles John Weevil occupies no different position than he would if he were not the landlord.

"7. The said Frank Herbert has the exclusive occupation, use, and enjoyment of his said room or dwelling, and the said landlord neither does nor has by agreement or otherwise any right to enter or in any way interfere with or exercise any control or dominion over the said room or the joint user of the portion of the said premises so used in common as aforesaid, nor has he any personal relationship with the said Frank Herbert, nor does he, nor has he any right to, exercise any control or dominion over him in his occupation and user aforesaid.

"8. The said landlord's use of and right of control over the parts of the said premises so used in common as aforesaid is identical with that of his tenants and he does not reserve himself or exercise any right of general control or dominion or mastership over the said premises. The cleansing of the said passages and staircases is shared in common by those using the same, and no service is rendered by the said landlord to his said tenants.

"9. The said Frank Herbert has a key which enables him at all times to open the front door and obtain access to the said house and his dwelling aforesaid, and the landlord reserves to himself no right to otherwise fasten such door.

"10. The landlord is obliged by his contract with the owner to keep the said premises in repair.

"11. The said house is rated as a whole in the name of the said Charles John Weevil, who has duly paid the rates therefor, and whose name appears as the rated occupier in the rate-book. The said Frank Herbert is not rated, and has never demanded or been required to be rated, in respect of his dwelling aforesaid. His name appears upon the rate-book for October, 1904, in a column which is number 24, as appears upon the copy sheet from the rate-book annexed hereto. It does not appear in the rate-book for April, 1905. Copies of these rates are annexed hereto.

"12. The names of 2,595 others on the occupiers' list whose names and places of abode (as appearing in column 2 of the list) are set out in Schedules I. and II. attached hereto were objected to under similar circumstances save that the number of rooms constituting the separate dwelling in each case may vary from one to two, to three, to four, as the case may be, and floors upon which they are situate be different, and save that, as regards the persons objected to in the township of East Stonehouse (where the objections relate only to the Parliamentary franchise), their names appear upon the rate-book as occupiers together with the landlord's name, who alone is the person actually rated and paying rates in respect of the particular house, and save that in some cases the resident landlord is himself the owner of the premises, and save that the terms of the demises to the resident lessee landlord may vary in length, and save that where two or more rooms are occupied by one person they sometimes do not directly intercommunicate nor are they on the same floor. But the above-mentioned distinctive circumstances are admitted by both sides to be, and treated by me as being, immaterial so far as concerns the principle covering the various cases. A copy of the rate for the East Stonehouse parish is annexed hereto.

"13. It was contended for the appellants that the said Frank Herbert was not an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house as tenant or owner, but a lodger, by reason of an alleged control or right of control on the part of the resident landlord and by reason of the said tenement not being separately rateable.

"I held such contention to be wrong, and found that neither in fact nor in law was there on the part of the said landlord any general control or right thereto over the said house or its occupants, and that the relative position of the said occupants to the landlord was the same as if he did not reside upon the premises, and that in fact and in law the said tenement dwellings were separately rateable, and I decided that the said Frank Herbert was an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house and entitled to be upon Division I., and allowed his name and that of the 2,595 other persons to stand upon such occupiers' list (Division I.)

"14. Due notice of appeal from my decision was given in each case, and I ordered the appeals in all the cases to be consolidated.

"15. If the court be of opinion that my decision is wrong, then the register is to be amended by expunging the said names from the said lists."

The town clerk of Devonport (R. J. Fittall) was named by the revising barrister as respondent on the appeal under section 38 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878.

Nov. 7.—Dickens, K.C. (W. H. Clay with him), for the appellants.—The whole question is whether the revising barrister could properly find on the evidence that Herbert was an inhabitant householder; and the proposition on the part of the appellants is that where a landlord merely lets out rooms in the house where he himself lives the occupants of those rooms are lodgers, and not inhabitant occupiers. In this test case Weevil, the landlord, let out rooms with the right of ingress and egress to and from the rooms by a common staircase, with the right in common to each tenant to use the back-yard, w.c., and so forth, while he retained a set of rooms in the house in which he and his family resided. It is submitted that the proper inference to be drawn from these facts is that Weevil held the control of the house, and that his weekly tenants were lodgers. The cleansing of the passages and staircase being shared in common made no difference, and the legal control of the house must be vested in the landlord and not in the tenant, whether the landlord chose to exercise that control or not. His very residence in the house was for the purpose of letting rooms and keeping guard over vacant rooms, the possession in which at once reverted to him so soon as a tenant left and gave up possession. He alone would have the right to bring an action of trespass against a stranger who improperly entered the building. The fact of his living in the house as landlord prevented the tenants from claiming a vote as inhabitant occupiers of separate tenements. The inhabitant occupiers' franchise is conferred by section 3, and the lodgers' franchise by section 4 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867. Section 61 so far as it defined "dwelling-house" has been repealed by 56 & 57 Vict. c. 14, and its place has been taken by section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, which enacts that "the term 'dwelling-house' shall include any part of a house where that part is separately occupied as a dwelling: and the term 'lodgings' shall include any apartment or place of residence, whether furnished or unfurnished, in a dwelling-house." The service franchise is given by section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884. It is submitted that there is no such exclusive occupation in the present case as there was found to be in Toms v. Luckett, 5 C. B. 23, because in that case the landlord did not reside on the premises, and did not retain the character of master as must be presumed he did here. Bradley v. Baylis, Morfee v. Novis, and Kirby v. Biffen (reported together), 30 W. R 823, 8 Q. B. D. 195, are the leading authorities on this question. The facts here are similar to those in Morfee v. Novis. In that case the facts, if anything, were stronger in favour of the inmates being occupiers than the facts found here, because there Brett, L.J., said it had been expressly found that the inmate had the exclusive use although not the exclusive occupation of the room. It is submitted that Morfee v. Novis decides that the claimants here are not inhabitant occupiers. The distinction between cases like this and that of flats has already been drawn by the courts.

Ancketill v. Baylis, 31 W. R. 233, 10 Q. B. D. 577; Hogan v. Sterrett, 20 L. R. Ir. 344; and M'Laughlin v. Chambers, [1896] 2 Ir. R. 497, were also cited.

J. A. Foote, K.C. (G. W. Ricketts with him), for the respondent.—Upon the findings of fact in paragraphs 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the case it was the duty of the revising barrister to follow M'Laughlin v. Chambers, [1896] 2 Ir. R. 497, where it was held that the residence of the landlord in the house did not per se disqualify the voter. Sir George Jessel, M.R., laid down the true test in Bradley v. Baylis, 8 Q. B. D., at p. 220, where he said: "On the other hand, suppose a landlord does not demise the whole of the house, but everything in it that can be demised, except the staircases and passages, &c., as to which he gives the inmates the right of ingress and egress, but exercises no control over and does not reside in the house, I think the inmates are occupying tenants. Here again, does the fact of the landlord repairing or paying rates and taxes make any difference? I think not. Of course he has a right to enter to make such repairs, but still in my opinion that does not prevent the occupier being in rateable occupation." The test, therefore, is not whether the landlord himself is resident in the house, but whether he exercises general control. That is a question of fact for the revising barrister, who has found that here the landlord has retained no control. The test is not whether he has exercised control, but whether he retained the right to exercise control. The present case is distinguishable from Morfee v. Novis, for Brett, L.J., during the course of the argument, mentions the circumstance (8 Q. B. D., at p. 213) that there the finding in the case was that the claimant had the exclusive use and not the exclusive occupation of his rooms. Unless the test of the landlord's residence be the infallible test, which it is submitted it is not, there is no distinction between the present case and the ordinary case of flats in a block of buildings, the inhabitants of which undoubtedly enjoy a separate occupation, except that a flat has a main door with a knocker on it. The point taken that the landlord had only granted an easement over the staircase and those parts used in common which showed that he retained control, was an argument that would equally apply whether he resided there or not. Therefore in that view the residence of the landlord for the purpose of deciding the question was immaterial.

Dickens, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. If Mr. Foote be right in his contention that we ought to construe the case as a finding of fact that the landlord had no control over the house, a case might have been made out that did not or might not have fallen within the rule laid down in the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Bradley v. Baylis. But I do not think that the revising barrister intended to find that as a matter of fact at all; and I base my reason, for considering that we ought not to draw such a conclusion, upon the broad ground that the finding of the revising barrister applies to some 2,500 people, and it seems to me an extravagant thing to suggest that in all those cases he found as a fact that the landlord residing on the premises retained and exercised no control. I think what the barrister meant to say was that there was not such control as would make the cases in the Court of Appeal binding on him. Now, taking this as a test case, what we have to decide is whether when a landlord resides and lives in an ordinary house and chooses to let off some of the rooms to other tenants, giving them the use of such parts of the house not so let as may be necessary, it shows that the tenants of the parts so let are inhabitant occupiers notwithstanding the residence of the landlord. It seems to me, having regard to the class of the property, very probable that the landlord would himself reside in the house for purely personal reasons, such as the easy collection of rents, the exercise of control over and taking care of vacant rooms, and, as he has to repair, seeing that the house is generally speaking kept in repair by him and is properly conducted. Therefore I think that to say that the landlord occupied his rooms in the house in the same way that his tenants occupied theirs, and that the relation between him and the other occupants was the same as if he did not reside upon the premises is incorrect. Now, is the test of residence as regards inhabitant occupiers the main test or not? Mr. Foote says that if it be not we might not be able to distinguish this case from the case of flats. It is quite true that in modern times flats for registration purposes have been regarded as an aggregation of houses each of which forms a separate dwelling in a dwelling-house and have been recognized as separate houses. There is no difficulty in dealing with a number of houses put together as flats are, for it cannot be said that the landlord lives there. As was pointed out in one of the Irish cases, if the landlord lives in the house he must not return the tenants as occupiers. Is residence, then, to be the important criterion? I think that in every judgment of the Court of Appeal it has been made the test. Lord Lindley in Bradley v. Baylis says: "Taking this difference as a guide it appears to me that where a house is wholly let out in unfurnished apartments separately occupied by tenants, and their landlord does not reside in the house and has no servants in the house to look after it for him, the tenants are rateable and are not lodgers; whilst, on the other hand, where a house is let out in unfurnished apartments to tenants and their landlord resides in the house or has a servant in it to look after it for him, then it appears to me that such tenants are not rateable and are lodgers." And in the same case Brett, L.J., says: "Now, in one of the sets of cases before us the whole house had been let out in apartments during the whole time with the exception only of the two staircases. The landlord has gone away and given up the actual control over the house; therefore it seems to me that the persons who occupy those apartments must be held to be inhabitant occupiers of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the statutes. In the other two sets of cases, where the owner has reserved to himself a control over the house, the persons who occupy part of that house are lodgers."

If any distinction is desired to be drawn by reason of the facts set out in the case before us between the present case and the principle upon which the decisions I have referred to have been based, I think it ought to be drawn by the Court of Appeal. I certainly cannot reconcile the Irish case of M'Laughlin v. Chambers with the cases in the English Court of Appeal.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the revising barrister has drawn an inference of law or a mixed inference of law and fact not warranted by the facts as he has found them. Therefore the appeal must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think that the present case clearly falls within the meaning of the rule laid down in Bradley v. Baylis. Where a landlord lets out part of a house and does not divest himself of his interest in that part of the house which the tenants have a right to use, but retains to himself the right of general control, such as a right to interfere with the arrangements of the house with regard to vacant rooms and to turn out trespassers, I think that the English Court of Appeal has laid down a good working rule free from perplexity and difficulty. On the other hand, the rule laid down in the Irish case of M'Laughlin v. Chambers would lead to both, and legal proceedings would follow in very many cases. I think that when a landlord lets rooms with conditions attached to their occupation there is no inhabitant occupation on the part of his tenants, since the landlord necessarily retains a control. In M'Laughlin v. Chambers it was a question of fact whether the landlord actually did exercise control. I can find nothing to support the distinction suggested. If we follow the decision of the English Court of Appeal we have a rule to go by; but if we follow the Irish case we should allow people to drift into litigation in most of the cases in which this state of things arises, for it is idle to suppose that with regard to some 500 or 600 cases the facts as to de facto control will be all the same. If such a class of inquiry were cast upon revising barristers at the request of every tenant they would never get through their work, and this shows the extreme inconvenience that would follow the adoption of this test; whereas the rule laid down by the English Court of Appeal commends itself to our sense of what is practical.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question appears to be, Does the landlord retain his control as master of the house? If he lives in the house, being the lessee of the whole and letting off certain of the rooms, that appears to me to be a strong reason in itself for saying that the landlord living there does retain a control. Here it is said that the revising barrister meant to find as a matter of fact that the resident landlord had no control over any part of the premises except that part in which he himself resided. But I do not think the revising barrister could have meant that, for it seems to me, if he did, he need never have stated a case at all. I think he must have meant it for a finding of law, and forgot or did not notice that the landlord must of necessity have all the rights in himself which he had not parted with. It is suggested that the finding means that so far as control went the landlord was in the same position as his tenant; but this cannot be so, for the landlord would have a right to go all over the house except into the rooms he had let, whilst the tenant of the first floor would have no right upon the second floor, or the tenant of the second would have no right upon the third floor, and so on. The landlord, however, could go all over the house as he liked so long as he did not enter rooms in the occupation of his tenants. I therefore think that the mere fact that the landlord resided in the house is almost conclusive to show that he exercised a certain control. Then, again, if a room fell vacant and was unoccupied, the right of the landlord would be to take possession of it at once, an act of control that would at once distinguish his position from that of his tenants, the other residents in the house.

The respondent, by leave, appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Nov. 15, 16.—The arguments were the same as is the Divisional Court, and the respective parties were represented by the same counsel.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court upon a case stated by a revising barrister, and the question raised is whether under section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, combined with section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, in the particular case before us the person objected to is or is not entitled to be on the list of voters as the inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house. It is said that a number of other cases depend upon the result of this case, but it is also stated that the facts of those other cases vary from the facts of this case in certain particulars, and therefore it seems to me that it is only by agreement between the persons interested and not by any decision of the revising barrister that those cases were made to depend upon the result of the decision in the present case. Therefore I will deal with the matter upon the footing that we are deciding this particular case, the facts in which have been stated by the revising barrister. It seems to me that, in the discussion as to what has been said by various judges with regard to the meaning of the words "lodger" and "inhabitant occupier" as used in the Franchise Acts, we are likely to lose sight of the foundation of the whole matter, that is to say, the conditions on which the Legislature has conferred the franchise. That brings me to section 5 of the Act of 1878, which defines the term "dwelling-house": "In and for the purposes of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, the term 'dwelling-house' shall include any part of a house where that part is separately occupied as a dwelling; and the term 'lodgings' shall include any apartments or place of residence, whether furnished or unfurnished, in a dwelling-house." The section further provides that "where an occupier is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of any part of a house, that part shall not be deemed to be occupied otherwise than separately by reason only that the occupier is entitled to the joint use of some other part." Therefore we have, in dealing with the case of a person who did not occupy a dwelling-house in the ordinary sense of the term, to see whether he comes within the special provisions which give him the franchise in respect of the occupation of part of a dwelling-house, for if so, he is the occupier of a dwelling-house within section 3 of the Act of 1867, and is entitled to the franchise. The question, therefore, is, does he occupy part of a house in such a manner and in such circumstances as to give him a qualification for the franchise? The part of the house must be "separately occupied as a dwelling," and there may be a separate occupation of part of a house as a dwelling so as to give the franchise, although the occupier is entitled to the joint use of some other part. He must occupy as tenant under section 3 of the Act of 1867. Whether he does so or not depends, in the first instance, upon what the facts of the case are—what are the terms upon which he holds under his landlord—and then it becomes an inference of law from those facts whether the occupier is a tenant or lodger. In view of that question the control of the landlord is a material element, and the answer depends upon what is the relation between the landlord and the occupier, and it is only in considering that relation that the residence of the landlord in the house becomes material. The claimant for a vote must show that he occupies as tenant part of a house separately as a dwelling. If another person is really in control of that which the claimant in fact occupies, the latter cannot be said to occupy it separately as a dwelling within the Acts. His occupation would be, not his own, but that of his landlord. That again depends upon his relation between himself and his landlord. The essential question is, is his occupation the occupation of the landlord, or is it an independent occupation of his own? If the occupation is that of the landlord, though the claimant lives in the rooms, he does not fulfil the conditions of the Act. If, on the other hand, he has an independent occupation of his own, then he has such occupation as fulfils the conditions of the Act. I come now to the findings of fact in the case. The revising barrister has found in the most clear and absolute manner that the voter occupies a separate dwelling in the house free from all control by the landlord. We are bound by those findings as findings of fact, unless it can be said that they are inferences of law and not findings of fact. He finds that the voter occupies as his residence one unfurnished tenement room in the house, such room constituting a separate dwelling, and being used by him for all purposes of living, and being separately occupied by him as a dwelling. Therefore the subject-matter of the occupation is clearly brought within the definition of dwelling-house in the Act. [His lordship then read other paragraphs in the case, and proceeded:] In my opinion those are findings of fact, and if the judgment of the Divisional Court contradicts those findings, that judgment cannot stand. It seems to me that it is only by arriving at the conclusion that the statements in the case are not statements of fact but inferences of law that the Divisional Court were able to differ from the decision of the revising barrister who allowed the names to stand in the list. It is only by ignoring the conclusions of fact stated in the case that the Divisional Court were able to arrive at the conclusion they did. I do not think that there is really any conflict upon the law between the view of the Lord Chief Justice and my view, because he thinks that, if he were bound by the findings as findings of fact, his conclusion of law would be the same as mine; and it is only by placing an interpretation upon the case different from that which it will bear that he arrives at his conclusion. It seems to me that the revising barrister has found conclusions of fact and the case does not rest upon inferences of law. I do not know the evidence before the revising barrister the result of which has been summarized in the case. What were the terms of the contract between the landlord and tenant must be a question of fact. The revising barrister has found as a fact that the landlord has retained no control over the part let. If that is so, it is immaterial whether he retained control over the part used in common. We are dealing with the subject-matter itself, not with the access to it. The occupation of the subject-matter itself confers the qualification and not the occupation of the outlying modes of approach. It is contended, in an admirably clear argument, that it is impossible for the occupier to have the dwelling-house occupation franchise if the landlord resides in the house. The residence of the landlord in the house is said to be incompatible with the other occupiers having the dwelling-house franchise. On principle I cannot say that the occupation by the landlord of a distinct subject-matter is any more a bar than if he lived next door or in the next street. The only thing which prevents the occupier from being entitled to the franchise is if his occupation is such that he cannot be properly described as an occupier. If it is an independent occupation, and not the occupation of another person, he is entitled. Again, the right of the landlord to repair is entirely compatible with an independent occupation by the actual occupier.

That being my view upon principle, we are pressed with authorities. Bradley v. Baylis and the two cases decided along with it were pressed upon us as deciding that the dwelling-house occupation franchise cannot be acquired if the landlord resides in the house. In my opinion those cases do not so decide. I think that the observations of the judges in those cases negatived that contention. All their remarks about residence were coupled with another condition—namely, control of the landlord. They showed that the control of the landlord was the essential consideration. No one disputes that if it was found that the landlord of a house let out in separate tenements lived in the house primâ facie he would be deemed to exercise control over the house; but it is not conclusive. I think that Cotton, L.J., summed up what the other members of the court said. He said (8 Q. B. D., at p. 241): "In my opinion there is involved in the term 'lodger' that the man must lodge in the house of another man and lodge with him. With respect to lodging in the house of another man, there is no difficulty about that. What constitutes his lodging with the landlord is the difficulty. In my opinion it is not necessary that the person with whom he lodges—that is, his immediate landlord, should live in the house to make him a lodger. Nor is it necessary that the immediate landlord should have the exclusive control over the key of the outer door; but, in my opinion, some control over the house must be exercised by the person in whose house a man lives to make him a lodger." In those cases control was considered the substance of the matter. The case of Bradley v. Baylis and the two other cases decided with it were carefully and elaborately considered by the Court of Appeal in Ireland in M'Laughlin v. Chambers, and notably by the Lord Chief Baron, who dealt specifically with that point. After dealing with the dicta in Bradley v. Baylis the Chief Baron said that control by the landlord, where he resides in a house let out in separate dwellings, is the important question to be considered. He said ([1896] 2 Ir. R., at p. 509): "In that case, Charlton v. M'Manus, 29 Ir. L. T. R. 16, the landlord came into possession of part of a structure by reason of the tenant of a separate room therein quitting possession and giving the same over to the landlord, who came to live there, and we held that the mere residence of the landlord in the same structure did not of itself disqualify the tenant of another room occupied as a separate dwelling-house, who had been, previous to the arrival of the landlord on the premises, admittedly entitled to be registered as an inhabitant householder. In that case I endeavoured to show that Bradley v. Baylis did not establish that the presence of the landlord in a house let out in tenements does not of itself determine the question whether a person is a lodger or an inhabitant householder. I want now to go a little further and to point out what is the determining factor. . . . In my opinion the rule laid down by Bradley v. Baylis is this: where a claimant dwells in rooms forming part of a structure, in any other part of which structure the landlord dwells, over which structure the landlord exercises a control as master, a paramount governing control, which is to be attributed to his position as master, and which is something different from that of a man who merely occupies rooms in the same structure, then every one of the tenants in the structure or house is a lodger." It is said that that decision is in conflict with the earlier decision of the same court in Hogan v. Sterrett. The Lord Chief Baron also dealt with that suggestion, for he said that "neither of these cases"—Bradley v. Baylis and Hogan v. Sterrett—"decides that the mere fact of the residence of the landlord in the structure in which his tenants reside is enough per se as matter of law to disqualify the tenants." So that when the cases are examined it is seen that there is no difference of view between M'Laughlin v. Chambers and the earlier case in the same court. In that earlier case there is a passage in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls where he said: "I do not mean to decide that in every case where the landlord resides under the same roof the persons occupying the other portion of the structure may not be entitled otherwise than as lodgers. I think they may be entitled; but the evidence of separate occupation must be very clear, such as in the case of flats; for there the landlord would live in a separate 'house' within the meaning of the Act, and there would be several 'dwelling-houses' all under the same roof. When that case arises, it will have to be considered on its merits." That is really the case here. When one finds that a part of a dwelling-house occupied separately as a dwelling is made a dwelling-house within the Act, it seems to me that it is placed by the Act in exactly the same position as a flat. It is equally capable of being the subject-matter of the franchise. I can see no distinction in law between a part of a house which is made a separate dwelling-house by the Act and a flat which is made a separate dwelling-house by its construction. Therefore it seems to me that the mere fact that the landlord lives in one part of the house, which part is itself a separate dwelling-house, is not incompatible with his tenants being inhabitant occupiers of separate parts of the house as separate dwellings. There is a passage in the judgment of Sir James Hannen in Ancketill v. Baylis to the same effect: "It is difficult to define the difference between a tenant and a lodger; but probably it may be said with accuracy that where the landlord himself resides in the house the other inmates are lodgers because they submit themselves to his control; but where the landlord does not reside in the house, or where he occupies a separate set of rooms in the basement, or where the house is divided into separate and independent dwellings, or into separate flats with a porter, or, as happens abroad, a concierge living upon the premises, in each of those cases, even although a servant of the landlord may be present, the separate occupation exists which is necessary to constitute a tenancy. Whenever the relation of landlord and tenant has been created it must continue so long as the tenant continues to dwell in the house, unless he agrees or submits to a change in the nature of his occupation." That seems to me to be in point, and it is a dictum of a learned judge sitting in the Court of Appeal. For the above reasons there seems to me to be no foundation for saying that there is any difference between the decisions in the English and the Irish Courts of Appeal. On the contrary, Palles, C.B., one of the ablest judges upon the bench of either country, after a most careful analysis of the cases, bases his judgment in M'Laughlin v. Chambers upon the English cases. The fact that the landlord resides upon the premises under the conditions described in the case does not prevent the other tenants from being entitled to the franchise as inhabitant occupiers of separate dwelling-houses. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—The subject of this appeal affords a striking example of the difficulty which arises in determining whether a person is the occupier of a rateable tenement or whether he occupies or uses the tenement as a lodger only. It seems to me to be impossible to lay down a hard-and-fast proposition of law or to define the difference between an occupying tenant and a lodger which will solve the difficulty in all cases. In Bradley v. Baylis Sir George Jessel, M.R., said: "I have been quite unable, so far as I am concerned, to frame an exhaustive definition. Some judges have tried to do so, and, in my opinion, they have failed; and I think it wiser and safer to say that the question whether a man is a lodger or whether he is an occupying tenant must depend on the circumstances of each case." I respectfully agree, and I proceed to apply it to the present case. The facts which we have to consider depend upon the findings of the revising barrister. I say at once that in my opinion his findings are findings of fact which it is not right or competent for us to disregard. They cannot be treated as opinions on points of law which it is open to us to disregard or to vary or mould as we think proper. It is really, it seems to me, upon those findings that the difference between us and the Divisional Court arises. Paragraph 2 of the case states that the claimant has during the qualifying period occupied one unfurnished tenement room on the third floor of a house, such room constituting a separate dwelling and being used by him for all purposes of living and being separately occupied by him as a dwelling or dwelling-house, and he has let to him therewith such use of the passages and staircases as is necessary and convenient to the access to and enjoyment of the said dwelling. We may at once disregard the use of the passages and staircases, for section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, enacts as follows: "For the purposes of any of the Acts referred to in this section, where an occupier is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of any part of a house, that part shall not be deemed to be occupied otherwise than separately by reason only that the occupier is entitled to the joint use of some other part." We may, therefore, confine our attention to the consideration of the exact premises occupied solely and exclusively by this inmate. It is also stated in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the case that the claimant has the exclusive occupation, use, and enjoyment of his said room or dwelling, and the landlord neither does nor has, by agreement or otherwise, any right to enter or in any way interfere with or exercise any control or dominion over the said room, nor has he any personal relationship with the claimant, nor does he, nor has he any right to exercise any control or dominion over him in his occupation; that the landlord does not reserve to himself or exercise any right of general control or dominion or mastership over the premises; and (paragraph 9) that the claimant has a key which enables him at all times to open the front door and obtain access to the house and his dwelling, and the landlord reserves to himself no right to otherwise fasten such door. On these findings it is clear that this room was occupied by this inmate as a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act, and there appears to be no doubt that he was, within the meaning of section 3, subsection 2, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, an inhabitant occupier, and, I should say, a tenant occupier, and therefore primâ facie entitled to the franchise. The fact that the landlord pays the rates and does the general repairs of the house does not alter the position of matters. I say so because it cannot be disputed on the part of the respondent that if the landlord did not reside in part of the house and did not exercise control over the inmates, this inmate would not be a lodger, but an occupying tenant. Sir George Jessel said in Bradley v. Baylis: "On the other hand, suppose a landlord does not demise the whole of the house, but everything in it that can be demised, except the staircases and passages, &c., as to which he gives the inmates the right of ingress and egress, but exercises no control over and does not reside in the house, I think the inmates are occupying tenants. Here, again, does the fact of the landlord repairing or paying rates and taxes make any difference? I think not. Of course he has a right to enter to make such repairs, but still, in my opinion, that does not prevent the occupier being in rateable occupation. The fact that the landlord executes the repairs and pays the rates and taxes makes no difference." In the case of ordinary flats the owner often takes upon himself when he lets the flats the obligation of paying the rates and taxes and doing the repairs. In that position of affairs, if this inmate was an occupying tenant within the meaning of the Act, does the mere fact that the landlord occupies a separate part of the house suffice, as a matter of law, to turn what would otherwise be an occupying tenancy into a lodger tenancy? I see no reason why we should so hold as a matter of law, and I agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in M'Laughlin v. Chambers, and with the very excellent reasons given for that decision. To hold otherwise would lead to strange consequences. Take the case of the owner of two houses living in one and letting the other to occupying tenants. Suppose one tenant goes out, and the landlord chooses to come in and live in the part of the house that has thus become vacant; would that mere fact, without any change in the central or other circumstances, change the position of the tenants into that of lodgers? We are not compelled as a matter of law to hold that, which I should regard as an anomalous and ridiculous state of things. It seems to me that the mere residence of the landlord in part of the house would make no difference unless he retained or had some right of control over the parts demised. The right of control is the essential matter to be considered. It has been frequently pointed out that to make an inmate a lodger there must be some right of control. In Toms v. Luckett Maule, J., said that "the question depends upon whether or not the owner of the house resides upon the premises, retaining his quality of master, and reserving to himself the general control and dominion over the whole." Other judges are, to my mind, referring to the same thing when they say that, in considering whether a person is a lodger, it is necessary to see if that person lodges in the same house as the landlord and "with him," or as some other judges say, there must be a personal relation between him and his landlord. I think that this essential right of control was pointed out by Sir George Jessel in Bradley v. Baylis, where he says: "It seems to me, as to unfurnished lodgings (and I will only deal with unfurnished lodgings, as it is the only class of cases with reference to which questions are likely to arise) where the owner of the house does not let the whole of it, but retains a part for his own residence, and resides there, and where he does not let out the passages, staircase, and outer door, but gives to the 'inmates' (I use that term for my present purpose) merely a right of ingress and egress, and retains to himself the general control, with the right of interfering—I do not mean an actual interference, but a right to interfere, a right to turn out trespassers, and so on; there I consider that such owner is the occupying tenant of the house, and the inmate, whether he has or has not the exclusive use of the room, is a lodger." In that passage the learned judge showed the necessity, in considering the question whether an inmate was or was not a lodger, of seeing whether there was a right of general control on the part of the landlord. That being so, in the present case the revising barrister has found that there was no right of control by the landlord over the tenant, and as I cannot hold as a matter of law that the mere residence of the landlord in part of the house makes the occupying tenants lodgers, the appeal must succeed.

One word as to Morfee v. Novis. That case seems to me to be clearly distinguishable. In that case there was no finding by the revising barrister that there was no right of control by the landlord over the premises, but, on the contrary, the inference from his finding was that there was such a right of control, because he found that the occupation was such as to give to the landlord the right to sue for trespass. There was no finding that the inmate had the exclusive occupation, but only the exclusive use of the rooms; and, lastly, Cotton, L.J., pointed out that the immediate landlord exercised control over the whole house—that is, including the part let.

Therefore upon the facts of the present case the inmate was a tenant and not a lodger, and the appeal succeeds.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, makes part of a house separately occupied as a dwelling a dwelling-house within the Representation of the People Act, 1867. To constitute a person an occupier of part of a house he must have the exclusive occupation of the part let. There must be no right of control over that part by the lessor. It is said that the revising barrister has neglected an imperative rule of law, that there cannot be exclusive occupation of a room in a house if the landlord resides in another room in the same house. It is said that the fact of the landlord living in the house shows conclusively that he has a general control over the whole house, including the room that is let. If that were true an extraordinary result would follow. If all the rooms in a house were let out to tenants as separate dwelling-houses, and one room became vacant, and if the landlord came and lived in that room, then that mere fact would convert all the tenants from occupying tenants into lodgers with all the consequences attaching thereto. I am of opinion that the mere fact of the residence of the landlord in the house does not of itself indicate such control by him over the whole house as to make the tenants lodgers.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Aug. 5, 7, 8, 1905.

VICTORIAN DAYLESFORD SYNDICATE (LIMITED) v. DOTT. (a.)

Money-lender—Contracting while unregistered—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 51), ss. 1 and 2.

Section 2 (1) (c) of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, applies to a money-lender who has not registered himself under the Act, and consequently has no "registered name"; and he cannot sue upon any contract made by him while unregistered, the contract being illegal.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff syndicate and a Mr. Bonnard, who was one of its directors, seeking to re-open a money-lending transaction between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The defendant admitted for the purposes of the action that he carried on the business of a money-lender, but he had not registered himself under the Money-lenders Act, 1900.

On the 31st of March, 1904, the defendant lent to the plaintiffs £500 upon the security of a bill for £525 at one month drawn on behalf of the plaintiff syndicate by Bonnard and another director and accepted by the Victorian Cornish Gold Mines Co. The defendant also received as consideration for the advance 100 fully-paid shares of £1 each in the Victorian Cornish Gold Mines Co., and an option to purchase 500 more of such shares at 7s. 6d. each. The bill was renewed monthly seven times, and as consideration for each renewal the defendant received £25 in cash, 100 more fully-paid shares, and a further option to purchase 500 shares at 7s. 6d. each. The defendant received altogether from the plaintiffs as consideration for the loan or the renewals, the bill for £525, £175 in cash, 800 fully-paid shares of £1 each, and options to take 3,000 more such shares at 7s. 6d. each. The value of the shares varied from time to time, but at the date of the action they were worth fully 15s. each. The amount due on the bill was repaid to the defendant on the 23rd of December (the date on which the writ in the action was issued), and on payment of such amount the defendant delivered to the plaintiffs the bill and 2,000 shares which had been deposited as security on making the loan.

The defendant had sold 400 shares for £303 13s. 9d. and retained 400 shares; he also held unexercised options to take 3,000 more shares at 7s. 6d. each.

The plaintiffs claimed that, the defendant being unregistered, the contract was void, and also to have the transactions re-opened on the ground that they were harsh and unconscionable, and that the defendant might be restrained from dealing with the shares or exercising the options which he held, and that he might be ordered to return the shares, and that the options might be cancelled.

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant contended that the terms had been proposed by the directors of the plaintiff syndicate themselves, who were fully aware at the time of their effect, and that the transaction was not harsh and unconscionable in view of the speculative nature of the shares at the time when the advance was made. He counterclaimed for specific performance of the agreements giving him the options on 3,000 shares at 7s. 6d. each.

Astbury, K.C., Gore-Browne, K.C., and W. E. Vernon, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant is a money-lender and is not registered under section 2, sub-section 1 (a), of the Money-lenders Act, 1900; he therefore has not made this contract in his registered name as required by section 2, sub-section 1 (c), and the contract is therefore void and cannot be enforced by the defendant: Cope v. Rowlands, 2 M. & W. 149, 157, 158; Fergusson v. Norman, 5 Bing. N. C. 76; Learoyd v. Bracken, 42 W. R. 196, [1894] 1 Q. B. 114. An Act which is passed for the protection of the public, and imposes a penalty upon the doing of a certain thing impliedly prohibits such thing, and the thing, if done, is void: Benjamin on Sales (4th ed.), 518. The plaintiffs do not desire to rely on the Act except as a defence to the counterclaim. Under the circumstances of this case the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and we ask the court to adjudge what was fairly due to the defendant and to order him to return the rest. We do not object to his retaining the cash actually paid by the plaintiffs on the renewals and on repayment of the loan.

J. B. Matthews, for the defendant.—I do not dispute that whenever a statute prohibits a contract, that contract is illegal and void; but the court has to look at the statute in each case and see whether the particular thing is prohibited. Nothing in the Money-lenders Act, 1900, prohibits the contract of an unregistered money-lender. The argument for the plaintiffs is that, being a money-lender and unregistered, the defendant has no registered name, and therefore has committed an offence under section 2, sub-section 1 (c). I submit that the offence can only be committed by a registered money-lender. The only section of the Act dealing with a person who lends money not being registered is section 2, sub-section 1 (a). If sub-section 2 (c) is to be held to apply to him, the protection that a prosecution can only be instituted with the consent of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General is taken away. The fact that the borrower is a corporation and not an individual must be taken into consideration on the question of whether the transaction was harsh and unconscionable: National Trustees Co. of Australasia (Limited) v. General Finance Co. of Australasia (Limited), [1905] A. C. 373, 381.

Astbury, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J.—The defendant in this case is at the present time, and was at the date of the transaction in question, a money-lender, and his name is not now and was not at that date registered under the Money-lenders Act, 1900. On the 31st of March, 1904, he lent £500 for certain purposes, upon which he has received the following sums: First, the repayment on the 23rd of December of his £500; secondly, sums amounting to £503 13s. 9d. in cash; thirdly, 400 fully-paid shares of £1 each in the Victorian Cornish Gold Mines (Limited), equivalent at 15s. a share to £300; and, fourthly, he claims to be entitled, under options which he says he has exercised, to 3,000 like shares at the price of 7s. 6d.; taking these to be worth 15s. a share, this is equivalent to £1,125. The outcome of this is, that for a loan of £500 made on the 31st of March and repaid on the 23rd of December, the defendant will have received, if he succeeds in holding the bargain, the aggregate value of £503 13s. 9d., £300, and £1,125, making together £1,928 13s. 9d. This £1,928 13s. 9d. is the interest for the advance of £500 for, roughly, nine months. The value is in fact more than £1,928, for the shares are quoted at more than 15s. The plaintiffs say two things—first, that the defendant being a money-lender not registered under the Money-lenders Act, 1900, the contract is void; and secondly, that even if that is not so, the terms are harsh and unconscionable.

Upon the first question the relevant provisions of the Act are two—namely, first, that a money-lender, which the defendant is, must register himself under the Act; and, secondly, that he shall not enter into any agreement in the course of his business as a money-lender otherwise than in his registered name. Mr. Matthews, for the defendant, argues that, inasmuch as the defendant has not complied with the first of these provisions, he is not amenable to the second of them; that he escapes altogether from the provision of the Act that he shall not enter into any agreement in the course of his business as a money-lender except in his registered name by failing to comply with the provision of the Act that he shall have a registered name. I am unable to adopt that argument. The argument is rested upon this: It is said, and truly, that sub-section (3) of section 2 requires that if a money-lender is prosecuted under clause (a) of sub-section (1)—that is to say, for not registering himself—the consent of the law officer of the Crown must be obtained, and that a like consent is not required for a prosecution under clause (c). I do not know, but I can easily understand that the intention of the Act may be this—that it might be a hardship upon a person to prosecute him for non-registration as a money-lender without getting the consent of a law officer of the Crown, when the fact in debate might be the very difficult one, whether he is or is not a money-lender within the Act; whereas, if that is not the question, but he is prosecuted for the offence of failing to contract in his registered name, the same reason does not apply. That may be the meaning; I do not know, but suppose that it is so. Mr. Matthews' contention is that clause (c) relates only to the contract of a registered money-lender when he contracts otherwise than in his registered name. I think the contention is not supported by the provisions of the Act. If the unregistered money-lender be prosecuted, whether under (a) or (c), it would be necessary to aver that he was a money-lender, and an issue of fact might be whether he was a money-lender or not. If that issue did arise, it may be that the consent of the law officer would be necessary. It is unnecessary for me to determine that. That will have to be determined if ever any such prosecution should be instituted. To my mind it does not at all follow as a matter of construction of the Act that clause (c) does not apply to the contract of an unregistered money-lender. In my opinion it does. It follows from that, that the respondent has committed a breach of that clause of the Act of Parliament which requires him, being a money-lender, to contract in the course of his business as a money-lender in a registered name.

The next question is whether the Act is so expressed that the contract is prohibited so as to be rendered illegal. There is no question that a contract which is prohibited, whether expressly or by implication, by a statute, is illegal and cannot be enforced. I have to see whether the contract is in this case prohibited expressly or by implication. For this purpose statutes may be grouped under two heads—those in which a penalty is imposed against doing an act for the purpose only of the protection of the revenue, and those in which a penalty is imposed upon an act not merely for revenue purposes, but also for the protection of the public. That distinction will be found commented upon in numerous cases, including those which have been cited of Cope v. Rowlands, 2 M. & W. 149, and Ferguson v. Norman, 5 Bing. N. C. 76. Parke, B., in the former case says the question to determine is whether the Act "is meant merely to secure a revenue to the city, and for that purpose to render the person acting as a broker liable to a penalty if he does not pay it? or whether one of its objects be the protection of the public, and the prevention of improper persons acting as brokers?" If I arrive at the conclusion that one of its objects is the protection of the public, then the act is impliedly prohibited by the statute and is illegal. I desire to point out that the present case is on that point abundantly plain. There is no question of protection of the revenue here at all; the whole purpose is the protection of the public. The money-lender has to be registered and has to trade in his registered name obviously and notoriously for the protection of those who deal with him. The purpose is a public purpose, and therefore upon all the authorities the act for the doing of which a penalty is imposed is an act which is impliedly prohibited by the statute, and is consequently illegal. The short effect of the statute, as it seems to me, is this: That it provides that a money-lender's contract must be in that money-lender's registered name, otherwise a penalty is imposed upon him; the result being that the act done is an act forbidden by the statute, and is illegal. There is another consideration. Not a bad test to apply, which leads in exactly the same direction, is this: whether the penalty in the Act is imposed once for all, or whether it is a recurrent penalty imposed as often as the act is done; if it be the latter, then the act is a prohibited act. Now, here the penalty is imposed every time the act is done. Further, the Act goes on to provide that on a second or subsequent conviction a man may be imprisoned with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding three months. Every time the money-lender contracts otherwise than in his registered name he is doing an illegal act. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the contract under which the defendant was to receive certain sums was an illegal contract on which he cannot sue. The result is that his counterclaim fails, and I dismiss it with costs.

In the action the plaintiffs say that they do not wish to rely upon the non-registration of the defendant; they are desirous that the man should have what is a fair return for his money, and they ask me to act upon section 1 of the Act and find what is fairly due. I cannot put myself in that position. I have held that the contract is void. I cannot then set myself to see whether, under the Act of Parliament, I ought to set it aside, because there is nothing to set aside; and I cannot say how its terms ought to be reduced, because there are no terms to reduce. But in case this should go further, and the Court of Appeal should want to know what my judgment is upon the facts so far as they are material upon this part of the case, I will add this: There is a dispute of fact between Mr. Bonnard and Mr. Dott as to what passed when the bargain was originally made. Mr. Bonnard says that Mr. Dott represented himself as being unable himself to advance the money but as knowing a Mr. Richard Webster (who, according to Mr. Matthews' case, did not exist) who was willing to lend the money on the terms that he should have 60 per cent. (£25 a month) and certain fully-paid shares, and that Dott said that he (Dott), as his remuneration, would want a call on 500 fully-paid shares in the Victorian Cornish Co. upon the terms that were agreed. Dott says this is not so; that no Mr. Richard Webster was ever mentioned at all. On that question of fact I think that Mr. Bonnard is speaking the truth and Mr. Dott is not. There are other cases in which Mr. Dott professed himself unable to find the money, and I have to consider whether or not he is likely to have done so in the present case. One consideration which should be borne in mind in determining whether or not this was a harsh and unconscionable bargain is, I think, that the original bargain was obtained by a misstatement as to how the payments which were to be made for the loan were to be shared as between Dott and the supposed Mr. Richard Webster. Another matter which should be borne in mind is this—that Dott was certainly getting all the liability of the Cornish Co., such as it was; and was getting the liability, such as it was, of Bonnard and Dillon, who signed the note; and was getting the security of 2,000 fully-paid shares in the Victorian Cornish Co. That is a strong element in estimating the risk run by the defendant.

On the other hand, it is very necessary to bear in mind that, except in the particulars which I have stated, the terms were not, so far as I can see, extorted from Mr. Bonnard at all. He was willing to pay for a transaction which no doubt was not one of ordinary money-lending, in which there might be a considerable risk. All those are matters which should be borne in mind, and if I had had to estimate as best I could what would have been a fair return for the money, I do not know that I should have arrived at any higher figure than that which the plaintiffs are willing to concede. In point of fact the plaintiffs say this: "We do not seek to get back the £25 a month—that is, the 60 per cent. on the £500; let the defendant keep that." I can put this into the order: "The plaintiffs voluntarily offering to allow the defendant to retain the 60 per cent., order the defendant to repay the other sums and to re-transfer the shares." I believe all the figures are agreed between the parties, and, subject to any error of arithmetic which I may myself have made, it seems to me that there will be an order for the repayment of £303 13s. 9d., and an order to re-transfer 400 fully-paid shares in the Victorian Cornish Co., and an order for the dismissal of the counterclaim. As regards the costs, the defendant must pay the costs of the action, and, as I have already stated, the costs of the counterclaim.

I may add that in arriving at this conclusion I do so largely, not upon the basis of any merits of the plaintiffs, but upon the demerits of the defendant.

In re CHILDE AND HODGSON'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale of freeholds—Undisclosed easement—Underground goit or watercourse—Constructive notice—Rescission of contract—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78).

Where a contract for the sale of freehold land contains a provision that the land is sold subject to the conditions contained in or referred to by a specified deed, and reference to that deed would have disclosed the fact that the land was subject to certain restrictions contained in a second deed, a purchaser, who before executing the contract has not inspected either the first or the second deed, will not be granted relief on the ground that he had no notice, at the time when he entered into the contract, of the restrictions contained in the second deed.

Adjourned summons.

This was a purchasers' summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking for rescission of a contract for the sale of freehold property, or for an abatement of the purchase-money, on the ground that the vendors had not made out a good title by reason of a material defect in the premises (the existence of a goit or watercourse), undisclosed at the time when the contract was entered into.

By an agreement in writing dated the 5th of July, 1904, the vendors, who were the receivers and managers appointed by the court for the debenture-holders in the Empire Boiler and Engineering Co. (Limited), agreed to sell to the purchasers certain freehold property situate at Ovenden, near Halifax, in the county of Yorkshire, consisting of a factory and other buildings known as the Empire Boiler Works.

Paragraph 9 of the contract of sale provided that the property was sold "subject to all easements affecting the same, and also subject to and with the benefit of the covenants, conditions, restrictions, and stipulations contained or referred to in and by an indenture of conveyance dated the 21st of December, 1899."

By the indenture of the 21st of December, 1899, the property was conveyed to the present vendors' predecessors in title subject, inter alia, to the conditions mentioned or referred to in an indenture dated the 5th of September, 1898.

The indenture of the 5th of September, 1898, which was a deed of compromise to settle disputes which had arisen between one John Todd and certain of the vendors' predecessors in title, provided, inter alia, that the said John Todd was to be entitled to the uninterrupted supply and flow of water running through an underground goit or watercourse under the land in question, subject to the right of the vendors' predecessors in title to divert such goit or watercourse so far as it did not lessen or interfere with the supply of water.

It appeared from the affidavits that the goit or watercourse in question consisted of a walled conduit about two feet square running under the premises contracted to be sold, and lying about nine or ten feet below the floor of one of the buildings, and a few inches below the floor of another building. It formed the head goit supplying water to a mill-dam belonging to John Todd, who had the right to enter and repair it.

It appeared also from the affidavits that the existence of the goit would not have been disclosed on an ordinary inspection of the premises by an intending purchaser, nor were either of the deeds of 1899 or 1898 inspected by the purchasers previously to signing the contract.

On the 1st of May, 1905, the purchasers issued the above summons.

Rowden, K.C., and J. G. Wood, for the purchasers.—It is the duty of a vendor to disclose all material defects at the time when the contract is entered into, and not to leave the purchaser to discover them for himself by inspecting the title-deeds. This was the rule laid down by the Court of Appeal in Reeve v. Berridge, 36 W. R. 517, 20 Q. B. D. 523, and followed in In re White and Smith's Contract, 44 W. R. 424, [1896] 1 Ch. 637, and Molyneux v. Hawtrey, 52 W. R. 23 [1903] 2 K. B. 487. A walled goit or watercourse, such as the present one, is rather in the nature of an exception or reservation from the land itself than of an easement proper, and as such it does not come within paragraph 9 of the contract. In In re Puckett and Smith's Contract, 50 W. R. 532, [1902] 2 Ch. 258, there was a provision in the contract similar to paragraph 9 of the present contract, but it was held not to excuse the vendor from disclosure of an underground watercourse, which would not be visible on an ordinary inspection of the premises.

Norton, K.C., and Abraham, for the vendors, were not called on.

WARRINGTON, J.—In this summons the purchasers are asking for rescission of a contract for the sale of freehold property, or for compensation, on the ground of a material defect in the property of which they had no notice at the time when the contract was entered into. [His lordship stated the facts as set out above.] The question is one of law arising upon the construction of the contract, the material stipulations being contained in paragraph 9. [His lordship read the paragraph and the reference to the deed of 1898 contained in the deed of 1899.] Now, the deed of 1898 was in effect a deed of compromise as to disputes over certain land, of which the land now in question, known as lot 31, forms part. On the plan annexed to the deed of 1898 this lot 31 is shown as having a goit or underground watercourse running through it; not only this but the deed itself contains a stipulation that the West Yorkshire Land Investment and Guarantee Society (Limited), the predecessors in title of the present vendors, are to have the right of diverting the goit flowing through lots 30 and 31 for the purposes of developing their estate, subject to Todd's right to the uninterrupted flow of water through it. Now, if the purchasers had inspected the deed of 1899 they would have ascertained that they were buying subject to the conditions contained in the deed of 1898; and if they had looked at the latter they would have found that they could only interfere with the goit subject to Todd's rights, and the plan would have shown them that the goit ran through the land they were proposing to buy. Mr. Rowden has cited two cases, both of which relate to leaseholds, and the point in each case is that a purchaser of leaseholds is only fixed with notice of the ordinary covenants which would be contained in a lease, and not of any special onerous covenants which it is the duty of the vendor to disclose at the time of the contract, and not for the purchaser to ascertain by inspecting the lease itself. In In re White and Smith's Contract, [1896] 1 Ch., at pp. 641, 642, Stirling, J., thus sums up the law: "In my opinion . . . it is primâ facie the duty of the vendor to disclose all that is necessary to protect himself, and not the duty of the purchaser to make inquiry before entering into a contract. . . . The circumstances under which a purchaser without actual knowledge of a state of facts ought to be held to have constructive notice of it have been recently considered by the Court of Appeal in Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25, where the law as laid down by Lord Cranworth in Ware v. Lord Egmont, 3 W. R. 48, 4 De G. M. & G. 460, was adopted. One test according to what is there laid down appears to be whether inquiry ought to have been made as a matter of prudence having regard to what is usually done by men of business under similiar circumstances." The question, then, for me to decide is, ought the purchasers, as a matter of prudence in the ordinary course of business, to have inquired into this deed of 1899? and if that is so, what ought they to have discovered by that inquiry? Now paragraph 9 of the contract says: "Subject to . . . the covenants, conditions, restrictions, and stipulations contained or referred to in and by" the deed of 1899; is it possible to say, in the face of that, that it would not be prudent for the purchaser to look at the deed of 1899? Assuming that is so, would it be prudent not to look at the deed of 1898, which is clearly referred to in the deed of 1899? It seems to me quite hopeless to say they should not, as a matter of prudence, have looked at the deed of 1898. Therefore I arrive at the conclusion that as a matter of prudence they should have looked at the deed of 1898, and had they done so they would have had notice of the goit. This summons therefore fails.

SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR v. WYNNE AND OTHERS. (a.)

Crown—Prerogative—Distress for rent—Chattels belonging to Crown seized on tenant's premises by landlord—Immunity from distraint of Crown chattels.

Chattels belonging to the Crown are exempt from liability to seizure by distress.

So held, reversing the decision of the county court judge in an action for damages for illegal distress of a horse, the property of the Crown, seized on a farm belonging to the defendant for rent due to her from the tenant, although only formal notice that the horse was Crown property had been given to the bailiff and to the auctioneer, and no legal proceedings in the nature of an extent had been instituted to establish the title of the Crown in the horse.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Winchester County Court in an action for damages for illegal distress, raising the question of the immunity from distraint of the goods of the Crown.

The facts which were not in dispute were that the defendant, Miss Wynne, had distrained for rent upon a horse which belonged to the Government and was one of those used in the South African War. The horse was lent by the officer commanding the yeomanry in the district to one Tibble, who was Miss Wynne's tenant, a member of the yeomanry who had served in the war. The horses which had been acquired as mounts for the various bodies of yeomanry were insured by the Government for £30 each, the premiums being paid by the Secretary of State for War.

When the fact became known to the military authority that a distress had been put into Tibble's farm they gave notice to the bailiff, and subsequently to the auctioneer, that the horse which bore the Government mark belonged to the Crown. Nevertheless it was put up and sold for £9 10s.

The present action was then brought in the county court claiming damages for illegal distress, and it was not disputed that the horse was the property of the Crown. The county court judge held, however, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover because in order to make good his right on behalf of the Crown some legal proceedings in the nature of an extent ought to have been instituted by him to establish his title to the property in question. He accordingly dismissed the action

The Secretary of State for War appealed.

J. Simon (Henry Sutton and G. S. Robertson with him), for the plaintiff.—It is submitted that goods belonging to the Crown, which are upon the land of another person, are not liable to be distrained for rent due from that person to his landlord. There is no direct authority to support this proposition, but in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant (17th ed.), p. 496, citing Viner's Abridgment, among a list of things enumerated as exempt from liability to seizure by distress is Crown property. In Chitty's Prerogatives of the Crown (1820 ed.), p. 377, it is stated that the King's cattle damage feasant were not distrainable. This case is an a fortiori one because it might there have been urged that the owner of straying cattle was in the wrong, which could not be alleged here. With regard to the damages, the plaintiff's witnesses agreed that £25 to £30 was the value of the horse, but no evidence was called by the defendant. At the sale the horse only fetched £9 10s. [THE COURT intimated they did not desire to hear further argument.]

No one appeared for the defendant.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I regret that this case has not been argued on the other side, because I cannot pretend to recollect, or even ever to have known, all the law there may be in connection with such a matter as this; but I have no doubt that Mr. Simon, aided as he has been by very able assistance, has done his best to ascertain what the authorities are; and would have called to our attention anything which he found against him if there had been substantial authorities the other way.

In my opinion, the decision of the learned county court judge was wrong, and cannot be maintained. I think he has fallen into the error of thinking that the authorities establish that the Crown must take proceedings in the nature of legal proceedings before its goods can be protected, because at the conclusion of his judgment he says: "It is, in my view, not sufficient that a mere claim or demand for the delivery of the goods seized should be made by the Crown. There must, in my opinion, be something equivalent to an extent—that is, formal legal process of some kind actually commenced." It is rather difficult to see if the Crown's goods are upon a man's property and the Crown claims them what legal process could be commenced except the claim or an action founded on the claim, as this was. There is no necessity for a writ of extent; not only is there no necessity for it, but a writ of extent would not be applicable. The learned judge does not seem to have quite appreciated that the authority he has cited is only useful for the purpose which Mr. Simon has last mentioned in his argument—namely, of showing that the title of the Crown derived from proceedings—"inchoate" is scarcely the right word—the title of the Crown which is founded upon proceedings, takes precedence of the right of the landlord who would otherwise be entitled. But it seems to me there is a much broader principle involved here which unfortunately the judge overlooked, and that is that the Crown property never was, according to the law of England, subject to these incidents. There is the passage cited to us from Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, and which seems to me to be a logical deduction, in which the author, speaking of distress for rent, says: "There is no modern decision as to Crown property. But it is laid down in the old text-books that a man cannot distrain during the possession of the Crown, and it would seem to follow that Crown property, even though the Crown be not tenant, is privileged, on premises demised to a subject." If even when the Crown is tenant and owes the rent the Crown property cannot be taken in distress, it would seem a strange thing to hold that the Crown property could be taken for someone else's rent. Therefore logically the proposition contended for follows. Again, if we refer to books of great learning, such as Chitty's Prerogative of the Crown and other authorities there cited, it would certainly seem that there are many instances in which the Crown goods are exempt from rights and privileges of other people and liabilities of other people. I do not refer to them all because they may rest on different considerations—for instance, taxes, tolls, and rates, and things of that kind, but when it is stated in Chitty's Prerogative of the Crown that the personal property of the King is not subject to the laws relative to sale in market overt and distress damage feasant, I think two very strong instances are given, because, of course, the sale in market overt depends upon an old common law right that by a sale in market overt the purchaser gets a good title, and it must be the exemption of the Crown property from that, which gives the Crown the right. In the same way, I think Mr. Simon's point is well founded although it is not direct authority, that the argument in favour of Crown property being liable to distress damage feasance would be very much stronger than the argument as to the liability of Crown property to pay the rent of other persons because the property happens to be on their land.

I think, therefore, the county court judge is mistaken in thinking that legal proceedings, and those only, are the root and foundation of the protection of Crown property and that the law which has prevailed for centuries with regard to the custom of a landlord to levy distress at common law, is not sufficient to enable the landlord to take Crown property. Therefore judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

There is some slight difficulty in regard to there being no finding as to the value which is involved, and no agreement as to the value in the court below, but I think substantially justice will be done if we take the lowest figure mentioned as the value of the horse—namely, £25 (it is quite clear that the learned judge would not be bound to take the £9 10s. for which the horse was sold at a forced sale), and if we enter judgment for the plaintiff with costs here and below for £25, giving the defendant leave to have a new trial if she considers the value is less, upon the terms, of course, of paying the costs of this appeal and of the previous trial.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and the only observation I wish to add is that to my mind utter absence of direct authority upon the subject, seeing how far back our books of precedent and our books of abridgment and so on go, is of itself an argument in favour of the proposition of the appellant in this case; because if Crown property had been subject to this distress, seeing the immense number of Crown properties that there were in ancient times and the very considerable number there are still, it would be almost impossible that there should not have been sub-leases and sub-demises which should from time to time have affected the property of the Crown.

DARLING, J.—I agree. To my mind this is an important and interesting case, and but for the fact which my brother Wills, J., has just pointed out, one would be rather surprised not to find among the list of things absolutely privileged from distress mention made of the goods of the Crown. But if one reflects upon what the history of the country has been, and why goods are held by the Crown and who represented the Crown, and whose business it was to seize goods, one would not expect to find that any high sheriff would have ventured to take the goods of William the Conqueror or any succeeding monarch. I add a word or two on this matter because there seems to me to be a real principle involved here, making it manifest that the goods of the Crown are privileged from distress and ought to be privileged from distress for the public good. Goods called goods of the Crown are held by the Crown for the public advantage, for the benefit of the whole country, and many of those goods by their very nature are held for the defence of the country by the Crown, to whom the defence of the country is confided. This very horse was a horse which had served in the Boer War and which might be required at any moment for the defence of this country. Therefore it seems to me that anyone who had to consider this matter from the beginning would say among goods which shall not be liable to be seized for rent due to anybody, whether by the Crown or by anyone else—a fortiori by anyone else—shall be those things which belong to the Crown because the Crown has to keep the country defended against the enemies of whom it always has plenty.

Now, it is worth noticing, I think, that all goods, with certain well-known exceptions, even those of a stranger, are subject if they be on the demised premises to distraint for rent owing by the tenant of those premises. If the goods of the Crown were not absolutely privileged it must constantly happen that when an expedition is being sent abroad, horses belonging to the Crown and military stores, the property of the Crown, would have to be temporarily placed in some town on their way to the seaport; or in sheds and buildings actually at the seaport; and it might well be that those premises where the goods or horses were placed were held by a person who had not paid his rent. Can it be supposed for a moment that things absolutely necessary to a military expedition should be liable to be seized and held and sold with all the formalities necessary to distress for rent, and the military expedition perhaps delayed while this enforcement of civil right went on. I should have been very much surprised if anybody could have pointed to a case in which the goods of the Crown on the way to the battle of Agincourt or Waterloo had been seized—let us say at Southampton, close to where this very horse was seized. It seems to me that the whole of history shows that what could not have been possibly tolerated in the case of those expeditions could not be tolerated now in the case of this horse which was held by the Crown manifestly for the purpose to which I have alluded—namely, the defence of the country.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

By her will, dated the 8th of January, 1891, Elizabeth Horne (hereinafter called the testatrix) appointed M. C. W. Horne and C. H. Benett to be trustees and executors thereof and devised the residue of her real and personal estate to her trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof to M. C. W. Horne for life or until such act or thing as therein more particularly mentioned, and after his death if he should die leaving lawful issue then to pay the annual sum of £200 to Maude Laura Horne during her widowhood, and after making provision out of the residue of the income for the maintenance of the infant children of M. C. W. Horne she declared that the trustees should hold her residuary trust estate subject to the above-mentioned life interest in trust for such child or children of M. C. W. Horne, and in such shares and manner as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for all the children equally.

The testatrix died on the 7th of March, 1891, and her will was duly proved by M. C. W. Horne and C. H. Benett, the executors and trustees thereof.

M. C. W. Horne died on the 7th of March, 1893, without ever having exercised the powers of appointment given him by the testatrix's will. C. H. Benett thenceforward until his death intestate on the 28th of June, 1903, was the sole trustee of the testatrix's will.

The defendant Edith Pearce Benett, the widow of C. H. Benett, was on the 25th of July, 1903, granted letters of administration to the estate and effects of C. H. Benett.

On the 3rd of September, 1903, the defendant paid to the Royal Exchange Assurance Co. a premium of £17 on a policy on the life of Maude Laura Horne which had been assigned by her on the 10th of July, 1895, to C. H. Benett to secure repayment by her to the trust estate of a sum of £600 advanced to her thereout.

By indenture of the 30th of November, 1903, made between the defendant of the one part and W. R. Law and H. L. Crawford, of the other part, the said W. R. Law and H. L. Crawford were appointed trustees of the testatrix's will in the place of M. C. W. Horne and C. H. Benett, but no part of the testatrix's estate was vested thereby in them.

On the 25th of April, 1904, two leasehold houses, being part of the trust estate, were assigned by the defendant to the new trustees.

C. H. Benett's estate was insolvent, and an administration action was commenced by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other creditors of C. H. Benett against the defendant as his legal personal representative.

On the 7th of December, 1903, the usual order for accounts and inquiries was made by Buckley, J.

A summons was taken out in the administration action by the new trustees, asking (1) that it might be determined whether it was the duty of the defendant in her capacity of legal personal representative of C. H. Benett to prove in the administration action as a creditor of C. H. Benett's estate in respect of the moneys belonging to the estate of the testatrix which were in his hands at the time of his death or in respect of which he was then indebted to or otherwise liable to account to her estate, and in respect of interest, &c., and that the defendant might be directed to prove in the administration action for the moneys; (2) in case he should be so directed to prove that it might be determined whether the defendant was entitled to exercise for the benefit of the applicants a right of retainer over the assets belonging to the estate of C. H. Benett in respect of these moneys or some of them; (3) that the defendant might be directed to exercise such retainer if entitled so to do.

Buckley, J., came to the conclusion in fact that Mrs. Benett had acted as a trustee of Elizabeth Horne's will and directed her to exercise her right of retainer for the benefit of the estate.

Mrs. Benett appealed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case we really have to decide whether the decision of Buckley, J., in the court below was correct, or the decision of Joyce, J., in In re Ridley. A question of fact has been raised here, whether Mrs. Benett did anything by way of acceptance of the trusts of the will of the testatrix Elizabeth Horne of which her deceased husband was the trustee. In our judgment she did nothing whatever by way of acceptance of those trusts. In that state of things the question arises whether the beneficiaries who are entitled under that trust, of which the deceased Mr. Benett was the trustee, can come to the court and insist on Mrs. Benett as the legal personal representative of her deceased husband exercising her right of retainer, she not having in any way accepted the position of a trustee. I need not go at length into the question of what are the rights of the legal personal representative of a deceased trustee in respect of declining to accept the position and duties of a trustee. The case of Legg v. Mackrell shows—whether you look at the judgment of Campbell, L.C., in the Court of Appeal, or of Stuart, V.C., in the court below—that the legal personal representative of a deceased trustee has an absolute right to decline to accept the position and the duties of a trustee. That being so, we have to consider the question whether these beneficiaries under the will have the right to call upon the legal personal representative of the deceased trustee to exercise the right of retainer in their favour. It is said, with a good deal of reason, that this question has already been determined in the cases of Fox v. Garrett and Sanders v. Heathfield. With regard to the later case, which is a decision of Malins, V.C., when the facts of the case are looked at, it is plain that the Vice-Chancellor had not really this question to decide, because on the facts of that case what he had to decide was whether the beneficiaries had a right to insist upon the application of moneys which had been retained in accordance with the trust. It was a case in which the right of retainer had been already exercised, therefore that case does not seem to me at all to stand in the way of a decision in accordance with the view of Joyce, J., in In re Ridley. With regard to Fox v. Garrett, that was a case in which in point of fact there were two estates, both being administered by the court, and possibly the ground of the decision in that case was that the two estates were both being administered, and the court may have taken the view that where two estates were being administered by the court the court had a right to deal with the matter in a way in which it would not otherwise have dealt with it. I confess for myself I am not quite certain that the real ground of the decision was the fact of the two estates both being administered by the court, but it occurred to me in the course of the argument that this was a material matter which the court took into consideration in Fox v. Garrett, and I am somewhat confirmed by the fact that in the 6th ed. of Williams on Executors, vol. 2, p. 978, published in 1867, some years after the decision, the view seems to be taken that this circumstance of the two estates both being administered was to a considerable extent the ground for making the administrator retain for the benefit of the persons interested in the creditor's estate. Whether the decision in that case can be so explained or not, it is necessary for us to consider whether that case was rightly decided. For myself I am prepared to say that it was wrongly decided. Everyone agrees that the right of retainer was a legal right. Before very long after that right had been established the question arose whether the right could be exercised in respect of a debt due to the executor, but in respect of which he had no beneficial interest, though the legal right was vested in him, for the purpose of benefiting the persons beneficially interested. What was held was that the legal right of retainer in an executor was in no way affected by the fact that when he had received the debt due to him from his testator's estate he would have to hold and apply and distribute it according to the requirements of the trust of which his testator was the trustee. That being so it seems to me that the proper statement of the result is that the right of an executor to retain is not a right which he holds in trust, but it is a personal privilege of his own which was given to him because the acceptance of the office of legal personal representative put him in a position which was disadvantageous as compared with the position of other creditors of the deceased. He could not have sued himself, and he was deprived of the advantage of being the first to sue. In these circumstances he was granted by the common law the privilege of retainer. If the earlier cases upon the right of retainer are examined, this right is always there spoken of as a privilege. In the first edition of Williams on Executors, where the author speaks of the right of retainer, I observe there is a good deal which does not appear in the later editions; but in all the earlier passages dealing with right of retainer, Sir Edward Vaughan Williams speaks of it as a privilege, and the cases referred to also deal with it as a privilege. He says (Part III., Book II., ch. 2, s. 6, p. 685, of the first edition): "This privilege of the personal representative arises from the mere operation of law on the ground that it were absurd and incongruous that he should sue himself, or that the same hand should at once pay and receive the same debt"; and he goes on to speak of the circumstances in which it can be exercised. Where the privilege has been exercised and the right of retainer asserted, from that moment I do not doubt that the executor, in respect of the proceeds of the retainer, is a trustee for the cestui que trustent under the trusts, but in my opinion there is no trust whatever in respect of the right of retainer itself. It was suggested by Mr. Upjohn in his very instructive argument that really and of necessity the executor must be a trustee in a sense from the first. That he certainly was bound to preserve and collect this property of which his testator had been trustee I agree; but in my view he had to preserve and collect it because that obligation was thrown upon him virtute officii. I do not think it would be proper to describe him as a trustee in the matter of this collection, or to say that because in the course of the collection he was entitled to exercise his personal privilege the same obligation which made it his duty to preserve and collect all the personal estate of his testator made him a trustee in any sense for the beneficiaries entitling them to insist on the exercise of this right of retainer in their favour. The case is really not unlike the case of a trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee takes over the estate of the bankrupt, but with regard to a great many kinds of property vested in the bankrupt they might be of such a nature that no interest whatever could come to the creditors, because no part of the property in question was the beneficial property of the bankrupt. But very often there was property as to which it was not certain whether the bankrupt had any interest or not. It was held that in such cases the mere possibility of an interest in the bankrupt was not enough to pass the property to the trustee, though in some cases the circumstances might be explained so as to show that some beneficial interest belonged to the debtor and passed on his bankruptcy to the representative of the estate. I do not think that in these cases the trustee in bankruptcy became a trustee for the cestui que trustent to whom the debtor was indebted, though no doubt the trustee in bankruptcy had duties to perform in respect of the preservation of the property. Suppose the trustee in bankruptcy died and some estate was still outstanding, he being in the position of a sole trustee. I do not think that in either of the cases I have put, the executor of the trustee would be responsible for or have any duty as to getting in that estate.

In these circumstances, in my judgment, the right conclusion to come to is that which Joyce, J., arrived at in In re Ridley. He does not in terms deal either with Fox v. Garrett or Sanders v. Heathfield or In re Faithfull or In re Owen, but I agree with the conclusion at which he arrived, that the executor of a sole trustee who has not accepted the trusteeship or in any way acted as trustee cannot be ordered by the court at the instance of the cestui que trustent of the deceased testator to exercise his right of retainer. I should like to add that I am not at all sure that after the appointment of the new trustees the power to exercise the right of retainer continued. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J., referred to the facts and continued: The will of Elizabeth Horne is so expressed that the administratrix might have become trustee of the will and acted in the execution of the trusts had she elected to do so; but she did not desire to become a trustee of the will, and she studiously abstained from doing anything which amounted to an acceptance of the trusts. In so holding we differ from Buckley, J., who came to the contrary conclusion upon the evidence, which was not so fully before him as it has been before us. The defendant, as legal personal representative, did, however, appoint new trustees of the will, but the deed of appointment contained no vesting declaration so as to pass to the new trustees the right to sue in respect of any legal choses in action which were vested in the last trustee. The new trustees now ask that the legal personal representative of the last trustee may be ordered to exercise the right of retainer vested in her, for the benefit of the persons beneficially entitled under the will of the testatrix. The question that we have to decide is really whether a legal personal representative is under a legal obligation to exercise his right of retainer for the benefit of beneficiaries. We have had the benefit of an able argument from Mr. Upjohn, and the way in which he puts it is this. He begins by considering the position of a sole trustee in whom is vested a legal chose in action. On the death of such a trustee, he says, the new trustee properly appointed being unable, as he would have been before the Judicature Acts, to get a legal assignment to himself of the chose in action, might have called on the legal personal representative of the deceased trustee to permit him to sue in the name of the representative for the purpose of getting in the chose in action for the estate. I think that the new trustee would have had that right. Then Mr. Upjohn goes on to say that if the debtor was the deceased trustee, then, as is perfectly obvious, the representative of that trustee could not sue himself, but he is given by law the privilege of retaining out of the assets of his testator an amount sufficient to satisfy a debt due to himself, and the new trustee could call on the legal personal representative to exercise the right of retainer for the benefit of the cestui que trustent just as he could call on him to allow his name to be used for the purpose of recovering the legal chose in action. That reasoning, supposing it to be sound, is all based upon the impossibility of the trustee suing in his own name to recover a legal chose in action, but in the case before us it breaks down because the debt was a purely equitable one. It was a debt which arose from the deceased trustee having dealt with the estate in such a manner as to render himself liable for a breach of trust. The right to enforce that liability is that of an equitable owner, and the beneficiaries could have sued the legal personal representatives of the deceased trustee, and the new trustees when properly appointed could have sued her without waiting to obtain a vesting order from the court. I think, therefore, that argument fails, and this result would follow if it were well founded, that in every case in which a sole trustee dies insolvent and having committed a breach of trust, his legal personal representative would have to exercise his right of retainer for the purpose of recouping the trust estate, and would be guilty of a breach of trust if he did not exercise the right in that way. For that proposition no authority was adduced, and breaches of trust by sole trustees who have died insolvent not having been unknown for a long period one would have expected some authority for that proposition if there had been any, but no such authority has been produced. I do not deny that there may be cases in which the legal personal representative might be called upon by the cestui que trustent to exercise a legal right of retainer vested in him. It would be easy to cite examples of this. For instance, if there were a surviving trustee of a marriage settlement which contained a covenant by one of the trustees to pay a sum of money, which would when paid form part of the trust estate, and that trustee died insolvent and intestate and the surviving trustee took out administration to him, I think it would be clear that, having got administration by virtue of being a creditor in his trust capacity, he would be bound to exercise such rights as the law gives him for the benefit of his trust estate. I can conceive other cases where the legal personal representative of a deceased surviving trustee would stand in the position of a trustee for the beneficiaries, but I do not see how a legal personal representative who is under no such obligation as I have indicated towards the beneficiaries under another instrument could be compelled to exercise for their benefit that personal right which the law gives him of retaining out of the assets of his testator in favour of his own personal debt. As regards the authorities, the case of In re Ridley is an express authority in favour of the view which I take. The principal authority cited, on the other hand, was Fox v. Garrett, which has been followed in Ireland in the case of In re Owen. In both these cases, as I read them, there was a legal debt, and this case is therefore distinguishable on that ground. Another distinction is that in both those cases two estates were being administered by the court, and it is possible, though it is not so stated in the report in either case, that some circumstances may have occurred in which a duty towards one particular estate may have been established. Therefore, on that ground also, this case is not covered by the decisions in those cases. But if these distinctions are not satisfactory, I must say I prefer the view taken by Joyce, J., in In re Ridley to that of Romilly, M.R., in Fox v. Garrett. As regards Sanders v. Heathfield, which was followed in In re Faithfull, I do not think that our decision trenches in any way upon those cases. In both those cases the legal personal representative had elected to exercise the right of retainer, and it was held that having thus elected he had done nothing with which a court of equity could interfere, and was entitled to appropriate the fund for the benefit of the persons beneficially entitled under the trust. As regards the decision of Buckley, J., in this case, it rested on the ground that the legal personal representative had accepted the trusts of Elizabeth Horne's will. We have held that that view is not the right view. That removes the legal ground on which Buckley, J., based his decision. I think therefore the appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons, and I have very little to add. Buckley, J., held that the defendant had accepted the trusts of Elizabeth Horne's will because her solicitors had paid the premium due in respect of a policy of life assurance. We must treat the payment by the solicitors as a payment by her, whether she knew of it or not, but I think it was a payment by her for the benefit of whomsoever it concerned, it not being known at the time of the payment whether the policy was part of the testator's estate or of the estate of which he was trustee, and I should be sorry to hold that by an act of such dubious import the defendant accepted the position of a trustee of Mrs. Horne's will. Then we have to consider what is the position of the legal personal representative of a sole trustee with reference to the right of retainer. As my lord has pointed out, the right is a personal privilege, though, of course, there may be a duty superadded to it. If the debt is due to the personal representative in the character of a trustee, then I think that the view taken by Romer, J., in Davies v. Parry was correct. He says: "If as trustee he represents a creditor, he is compellable at the instance of his cestui que trust to enforce his right." That comes from the superadded relation owing to his filling the position of trustee. If, however, we do not find that relationship existing in fact, I do not, apart from authority, see any reason why the legal personal representative should be bound to satisfy these particular creditors rather than other creditors. The right of retainer is a personal privilege, and I do not see why the court should compel a legal personal representative, who is not willing to exercise it, to exercise this right. No doubt the view we take is opposed to Fox v. Garrett, but I prefer the view taken by Joyce, J., in In re Ridley, which is contrary to Fox v. Garrett, and I agree with my lord and with Stirling, L.J., that the latter case was wrongly decided.

MANCHESTER (MAYOR OF) v. NEW MOSS COLLIERY (LIMITED). (a.)

Mines and minerals—Subsidence—Lateral and vertical support—Construction of Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17).

Undertakers cannot claim under conveyances made in pursuance of Acts incorporating the Railway Clauses Consolidation and Waterworks Clauses Acts—whether such conveyances be of surface alone or of surface and minerals—any right to support from land belonging to any person to whom they have not paid, or are not ready and willing to pay, compensation under the Act.

Pountney v. Clayton, 31 W. R. 664, 11 Q. B. D. 820, followed.

Trial of action.

In this case the plaintiffs, who were the local authority for the city of Manchester, sought to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendants from working mines underlying land adjacent to land acquired by the plaintiffs in such a way as to cause subsidence of the land so acquired and injury to reservoirs constructed thereon.

Part of the land in question had been purchased from one Taylor and part from the Earl of Stamford.

The defendants counterclaimed that, if they were liable for workings under the Stamford land at more than forty yards from the Taylor land, they were entitled to compensation under the Waterworks Clauses Act in respect of the obligation to leave mines unworked at such greater distance.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

J. Fletcher Moulton, K.C., Jenkins, K.C., and Hugh Moulton, for the plaintiffs.—We base our case on the simple common law right of a freeholder and our land must not be let down. We do not rely on the Waterworks Clauses Act; the clauses of that Act relating to compensation do not apply here. The fundamental case is Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, 15 W. R. 647, 2 H. L. 27. For the purposes of this case we make no distinction between land and buildings thereon. We say that the defendants are letting down our land. As part of the damage we are entitled to damage done to buildings. It is for the defendants to show that the result of the subsidence is due to our buildings and not to their mining operations: Stroyan v. Knowles, 6 H. & N. 459. In cases of this class, if a railway or a water company acquires a right to support, there is nothing in the Waterworks Clauses Act to take it away from them. When surface and mines are severed, a right to support is created, but previously there is no such right.

Neville, K.C., Upjohn, K.C., and R. F. Macswinney, for the defendants.—The real question is, What, having regard to the authorities, is the true construction of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with regard to the position of waterworks undertakers with reference to their mines. The authorities all lead to this conclusion—that both the Railway Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), and the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, are substantially similar enactments, which introduce, with regard to both railway undertakers and waterworks undertakers, a code, which is not in addition to the common law rights of landowners, but is in substitution for those rights in the case of railways and in the case of waterworks. It makes no difference whether the land is taken compulsorily or voluntarily, or whether the surface land is purchased alone or with the mines.

Fletcher Moulton, K.C., in reply.—Section 6 and sections 18 to 27 are the sections of the Waterworks Clauses Act by which we are affected. These sections together constitute an addendum to or modification of the main code of expropriation contained in the Lands Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18). Section 6 of the Waterworks Clauses Act shows that it was intended that certain sections of the Act should be supplementary to the main expropriation code contained in the Lands Clauses Act. Section 18 deals only with the construction of the conveyance and has nothing to do with rights. Sections 19, 20, and 21 are purely administrative clauses, enabling machinery which is going to be established by later clauses to be effectively worked. Section 22 does not confer rights. All it says is that notice must be given under certain conditions, and that undertakers shall have rights of expropriation on compensation terms. Section 23 deals with rights. Section 24 is for the benefit of both parties. Section 25 provides for payment by the undertakers in respect of their interference. Section 26 provides for mutual inspection of, and information about, work being carried on. Section 27 deals with cases where water accumulated by the waterworks may be a danger to the mines below, on the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands, 3 H. L. 330.

Dec. 12.—FARWELL, J.—The plaintiffs claim to be owners in fee simple of certain lands in Lancashire, and as such seek an injunction to restrain the defendants from working the mines under adjacent land so as to let down the surface. Under their special Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. ccii.), which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, the plaintiffs were empowered to acquire and construct waterworks for the supply of Manchester and other places with water, and accordingly, by conveyances dated the 13th of January, 1875, they acquired under the powers of the Acts from Lord Stamford and had conveyed to them 246 acres, 3 roods, 31 poles, delineated on the plan on the deed, excepting to the grantor all mines and minerals with full liberty to work the same without making any compensation for injury to the surface; and by another conveyance, dated the 1st of July, 1875, they acquired under the like powers from John Taylor and had conveyed to them 23 acres, 3 roods, 39½ poles, delineated on the plan thereon, together with all mines, minerals, delphs, and quarries thereon. This latter property forms a sort of peninsula running up into, and on three sides nearly surrounded by, the Stamford land, as appears from the plan that has been put in evidence. In 1875 the plaintiffs obtained a further Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. clxi.) enabling them to extend their waterworks. I do not think it necessary to go further into details of the plaintiffs' title, as I hold that it is plain, on the face of the conveyances and Acts, that both the Taylor and Stamford land were acquired under statutory powers for the purpose of the waterworks, and it follows that the principles laid down by the House of Lords in Elliot v. The North-Eastern Railway, 11 W. R. 604, 10 H. L. Cas. 333, apply—namely, that the conveyances are to be read as if the Acts of Parliament were incorporated therein, and that, too, whether the lands were taken under compulsion or by agreement. When the undertakers have compulsory powers it can make no difference whether the landowner drives them to put those powers into actual execution or whether he yields without doing so; in either case he sells because he must. The case of Elliot v. The North-Eastern Railway arose on the construction of a private Act with clauses differing materially from those that I have to consider, but the general principle is the same, and Fletcher v. Great Western Railway, 8 W. R. 501, 4 H. & N. 242 affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber 6 H. & N. 689, is to the same effect. There the land was, as here, acquired by agreement and not by putting into actual execution any compulsory power, and Cockburn, L.C.J., in the Exchequer Chamber, at p. 697, says: "The owners of the land in the question had conveyed it to the defendants, a railway company, for the purposes of their railway. This was not a voluntary conveyance in the ordinary sense of that term, but a conveyance of the land according to the provisions of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act"—I think he must mean the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—"by which the owners must necessarily have parted with it." This is material, because the plaintiffs' case is pleaded and was opened as if they were simply owners in fee who had acquired land as a common law corporation and not under any statutory powers. I hold that this is not so, but that their rights fall to be determined as owners who have acquired under statutory powers.

(a.) Reported by F. HARDINGE DALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts in the case are not really in dispute to any material extent. I find that the plaintiffs duly constructed their reservoirs, partly on Stamford land and partly on Taylor land, more than twenty years ago, part of the northern embankment being on Taylor land; and that the defendants have worked, and are continuing to work, under the Stamford land in such a way as to cause subsidence to the Taylor land and to render further subsidences inevitable, whether the working be continued or stopped at once, and that such subsidences would have occurred whether the embankment had been placed on the land or not. This last finding renders it unnecessary to refer further to the reservoirs on the point either of damages or of injunction: Stroyan v. Knowles, 6 H. & N. 459. There is a small discrepancy of expert opinion on the exact extent to which the area of danger of subsidence extends, but it is unnecessary for me to decide between the conflicting experts because it is common ground that this area extends considerably beyond forty yards from the outside of the Taylor land. The defendants have given notice of their intention to work up to the limits of their property, and the plaintiffs have declined to pay compensation under the Act and insist that they have the ordinary rights of a common law owner to lateral support; the defendants contend that the rights of the parties depend on the Waterworks Clauses Act, and that under that Act the plaintiffs have no such right; the plaintiffs retort that those Acts do not expropriate owners without compensation, but proceed on the basis that nothing is taken away without compensation, and that nothing has been done or paid to deprive them of the ordinary owners' right to lateral support, and that if they do not choose to compensate the defendants the latter can only proceed to exercise such rights as they would have had if the Waterworks Clauses Act had not passed.

Now the rights of surface and mineral owners at common law are well settled. Every landowner has, as an incident of his property in land, a right to its lateral support by the adjacent land to an extent sufficient to support it in its natural state. Where the surface and the minerals have been severed, whether by grant of surface reserving minerals or by grant of minerals reserving surface, the surface owner has a right to support both lateral and vertical unless a power of working the minerals so as to let down the surface is granted or reserved, and where there is nothing to show how or when surface and minerals were severed the same right to support exists. The authorities cited in argument undoubtedly establish that in the case of railway and waterworks undertakings the common law in this respect has been displaced by a statutory code. As Lord Esher says in Lord Gerard's case, 43 W. R. 374, [1895] 1 Q. B. D. 464: "I am of opinion that, wherever the company seek to take compulsorily from a landowner part of his land, leaving a mine, the case is governed by the group of sections in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, commencing with section 77. It appears to me that that group of sections is the law by which in such a case the rights and obligations of both parties are to be determined, to the exclusion of any common law right that might otherwise arise from the relation between the parties. The rights which arise from that relation are statutory, and all questions, both as regards compensation and other matters, are to be governed by the Act of Parliament." This is fully borne out by the cases in the House of Lords of the Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, 15 W. R. 647, 2 H. L. 27, and Holliday v. Wakefield, 40 W. R. 129, [1891] A. C. 91. Lord Esher confines his observations to the case before him, but for the reasons already given I am of opinion the code applies, whether the land is taken compulsorily or not, in all cases where the undertakers acquire lands under statutory powers which incorporate the Railway Clauses Act or the Waterworks Clauses Act, as the case may be. Further, I am of opinion that this statutory code cannot be dealt with piecemeal by taking section 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act alone and looking no further into the Act, when it is shewn that the undertakers have acquired the mines as well as the surface, but that all the sections (from 18 to 27 inclusive) relating to mines are to be read together as part of one scheme of legislation, and, if any defect or obscurity be found in one, recourse is to be had to the whole series: see Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co., [1903] A. C., at p. 430, citing Smith v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 W. R. 130, 3 A. C., p. 165. Except that section 27 in the Waterworks Clauses Act has no equivalent in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, I agree with the late A. L. Smith, L.J.'s, statement in Consett Waterworks Co. v. Ritson, 22 Q. B. D., at p. 329, that there is no material distinction between the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, in this respect; the sole difference is that in the former Act it is provided that, if no compensation is paid, it shall be lawful for the mine owner to work the mines, and in the latter there are added these words, "as if this Act and the special Act had not been passed." In my opinion these words are necessarily implied in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, and their insertion in the Waterworks Clauses Act adds nothing to the clause, and the decided cases that have been cited are equally applicable whether they relate to railways or to waterworks. In considering the powers and duties to be given to and imposed on undertakers exercising the compulsory powers of the Land Clauses Act, the Legislature foresaw that, in the case of railway and waterworks undertakings peculiar conditions would exist with respect to mineral rights. It would be obviously unjust to deprive the mineral owners of their property without compensation, but there was great difficulty in most cases in assessing any immediate value that would be fair, and moreover in mineral districts the amount of compensation, if mines had to be purchased out and out in the first instance, might be so large as to render the construction of the undertaking financially impossible. It therefore appeared good to them to alter the common law by which a purchaser buying land acquires with it such rights as are necessary for its use for the purpose for which it is bought and which the vendor can convey, and (in the case of waterworks) the law by which undertakers, who are authorized to execute works, are under no liability for any loss arising from the proper construction and use of those works. By the former I mean the law as enunciated in Caledonian Railway Co. v. Sprott, 4 W. R. 659, 12 Macq. 449, and Elliot v. North-Eastern Railway, 11 W. R. 604, 10 H. L. Cas. 333, and by the latter the law as enunciated in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 3 H. L. 330. In order to get over this difficulty the Legislature adopted the principle of deferred compensation, it relieved the undertakers from the necessity of immediate purchase, and it preserved to the mineral owner his right to be fully compensated when the time arrived at which it became practically possible for him to work his mines, or, in default of compensation, his right to work notwithstanding that he might thereby let down the surface. As Lord Macnaghten says in Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, 37 W. R. 627, 13 A. C. 696, "Where lands containing mines are taken by a railway company it would probably be a most serious injury to the vendor to compel him to include his mines in the sale. In most cases he would be selling a long narrow strip of minerals, which might form an impassable barrier in the middle of his mines. If the sale were a voluntary sale to an ordinary purchaser it would be a matter of course to reserve the mines. On the other hand, neither railway companies nor persons who construct waterworks require mines as such, or are capable of working mines for profit. Mines are only useful to them so far as they may contribute to the support of the lands under which they lie. And in many cases they may be worked without interfering with the beneficial enjoyment of the surface." In the case of waterworks, if the mine owner works in default of receiving compensation the undertakers may be liable for injury done to his mines by flooding under the doctrine of Fletcher v. Rylands. This is carried out by the fasciculus of clauses in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 18 to 27. Section 18 provides that the undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines or minerals under any land purchased by them except only such parts as are carried away in constructing their works unless they expressly purchase them, and all such mines are excepted out of the conveyance of such lands unless expressly named and conveyed. I cannot regard this section as a mere conveyancing section, inserted solely for the purpose of altering the ordinary construction of deeds in the case of railway and waterworks undertakings, and therefore of no application in cases where the mines are bought and conveyed; either by itself or in conjunction with the following clauses it has the effect of depriving the undertakers of all right to support from the excepted mines—a right that would otherwise be implied, as the sale is for the purpose of the undertaking: see Lord Esher's judgment in Pountney v. Clayton, 31 W. R. 664, 11 Q. B. D., at p. 834—as soon as the mine owner is in a position to give notice of intention to work his mines, and this appears to me to be material in considering the effect of the exception in the section. It is contended that it has the effect of placing the undertakers, who have purchased the mines, outside the Act altogether, and in the position of an ordinary owner in fee. But inasmuch as the courts have held on a consideration of all the sections, 18 to 27, that the conveyance of land, excepting the mines, does not grant any indefeasible right of support, it is necessary to consider whether there is anything in the same sections that will affect the right thus claimed under the exception in clause 18, where the conveyance under the statute has been of the mines as well as of the surface. Clause 22 provides that except where otherwise provided for by agreement between the undertakers and other parties, if the owners, &c., of mines under the undertakers' works or within the area prescribed by their private Act, or, if none, within forty yards therefrom (which I will call the statutory area) be desirous of working, such owners, &c., shall give notice of their intention to work thirty days before commencing to work, and if the undertakers make compensation shall not work; but if they fail so to do the mine owner may work as if the Act and the special Act had not been passed. This clause obviously applies to all mines within the statutory area, whether they belong to the owner of the surface taken by the undertakers or to other persons. The principle of the Act is that no person shall be deprived of his mines without compensation; if the owner of adjacent mines is not the same person as the owner of the surface taken, he is within section 22, and cannot work without giving notice; if he gives notice he is entitled to compensation or to work with the benefit of clause 27. This is clear if the surface owner has sold surface only, and how can any act of his alter the rights of the adjacent owner? If, as Mr. Moulton argues, the principle of the Acts is compensation, not expropriation, why is the owner of the adjacent mines to be deprived of his rights under clauses 22, 23, and 27 by the payment of compensation to another person? It is true that the owner in fee at common law who sells the fee sells also the rights that he has to lateral support; but the answer must be that in this case section 18 does not put the undertakers in the position of the ordinary owners in fee, but in the position of owners in fee according to a statute which gives them such rights only as they can possess and enjoy consistently with the rights given to others by the same statute. This leaves untouched the case where the owner of the surface who sells the mines as well is also owner of the adjacent mines. It may be (I express no opinion) that he grants the right to subjacent support, if he gets compensation which covers it; but this does not apply to the case of the adjacent mine owner who has received no compensation and has done nothing to displace or defeat his statutory rights. If this were not so, the waterworks company might purchase a strip of land a few yards wide and long with the mines below, and, by building the wall of their reservoir upon it, prevent large areas of coal from being worked without paying any compensation at all, and without being under the liability imposed by section 27. The evidence in this case shows that the area of danger in deep mines with the seam on the dip is very large, and that the value of the minerals in question in this case is nearly a million sterling. Further, the acquisition of the mines by purchase under section 18 is entirely at the option of the company, and they are not likely to buy except in cases where the existence of workable mines is extremely unlikely. It is no part of their business to work mines, nor could such strips as they could buy be worked profitably. If they buy, they buy for support, and they can do this more advantageously under section 22, not only because they can defer payment, but also because they do not under that section buy and pay for the mines, but have only to compensate the mine owner for what the mine owner would have made out of it during the time it would have taken him to work it: see Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Waterworks, [1903] A. C. 426. Although there is no express authority on the point, this is the principle on which the Exchequer Chamber appears to me to have acted in The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Metropolitan Railway Co., 17 W. R. 416, 4 C. P., p. 192, where they held that the board of works had acquired no right to lateral support for one of their sewers, and this is the distinction between that case and the case of In re The Corporation of Dudley, 8 Q. B. D., p. 86, 30 W. R. Dig. 120, where the right to direct support by subjacent mines was held to have been acquired. I agree with Mr. Moulton's contention that the Land Clauses Consolidation Act and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act and the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act are based on the principle that expropriation and compensation go hand in hand, but I apply it against the plaintiffs in favour of the owner of adjacent minerals, who is not to be expropriated without compensation. There is no question of expropriating the plaintiffs, they are the persons with statutory power to expropriate others, and the real question is, What extent of estate and interest on the true construction of the Act have they succeeded in appropriating to themselves?

I hold, therefore, that the defendants are entitled to work within the statutory area, whether they let down the plaintiffs' reservoirs or not. The next question is, as to the rights of the parties outside the statutory area, in this case forty yards, as the plaintiffs' private Acts give no other limit, for I find on the evidence that workings without as well as within the area have caused subsidences on parts of the plaintiffs' embankment on the Taylor land, although it is not possible to distinguish between the effect produced thereby. Now, the extent of the statutory area is left to the discretion of the undertakers, just as the extent of the land to which their compulsory powers and the limits of deviation therefrom are left to them, subject, of course, to the approval of the committee of the House. The scheme of all such Acts is that the undertakers state accurately the extent of the property required to be taken by them and obtain from the Legislature powers over the same in exchange for compensation; the courts never presume that the Legislature has authorized A. to take B.'s property without compensation. The Legislature can, of course, do so, if it thinks right; but, if it does, its intention must be expressed in clear and plain terms. The obvious intention of the Waterworks Clauses Act is that the undertakers should state the area from which they require support and should be authorized to acquire such support with the special privilege of deferring payment of compensation. Their contention is that they are entitled to support beyond that area so chosen by themselves without paying any compensation—that is, that they can give themselves rights without payment by neglecting to secure a proper area of protection either intentionally or from lack of foresight. I am of opinion that I cannot construe the conveyance according to the statute under section 18 as giving them any such rights; the undertakers have been given the powers and privileges in the statute in exchange for all other rights in respect of support, whether lateral or vertical; if they cannot claim the benefit of section 22 to an extent sufficient to protect their works, they have only themselves to thank, because they failed to extend the statutory area sufficiently. I cannot construe the Acts so as to enable them to increase their rights by their own defaults, and there is all the more difficulty in the plaintiffs' way because this right claimed by them is one to which it would be very difficult to give practical effect by way either of injunction or damages. A claim to lateral support, not from the adjacent land which can be rightfully worked out, but from land beyond the worked out adjacent land, is certainly difficult to enforce in practice: see Corporation of Birmingham v. Allen, 25 W. R. 810, 6 Ch. D. 284. Further, I think that my opinion on both points follows from and is not an undue extension of the decision in Pountney v. Clayton, 31 W. R. 664, 11 Q. B. D. 820. In that case the minerals under the land taken by the railway company were in lease to a tenant, and the Court of Appeal assumed (at p. 832) that the tenant was bound so to work the mines as not to let down the surface. The lessor conveyed the land to the company subject to the lease, and the company took advantage of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act and did not purchase the lessee's interest. It was argued that, as the lessor had conveyed that surface to the company, he had thereby conveyed all the rights in respect of and for the benefit of the surface which he had as against the lessee; but the court rejected this contention and held that the company had only such rights as the mineral sections in the Railway Clauses Act had given them, and that the lessee could work so as to let down the surface as against the railway company and all persons claiming through them, although the lessor had not as between himself and his lessee parted with his rights to support. Mr. Moulton urged that the case merely decided that the plaintiff had not proved his title, but the gist of the decision is the reason why he failed to prove it. I venture to think that I am following the principle of that decision in holding, as I do, that undertakers cannot claim under conveyances made in pursuance of the Acts incorporating the Railway Clauses Consolidation and Waterworks Clauses Acts—whether such conveyances be of surface alone or of surface and minerals—any right to support from land belonging to any person to whom they have not paid or are not ready and willing to pay compensation under the Act. Reference has been made to the Public Health Amendment Act, 1883, but I do not think that it has any bearing on the case before me, except that section 3, sub-section 2, enables local authorities, such as the plaintiffs, to alter and extend the statutory area. This section obviates any difficulty that may arise from a mistake in the original estimate of the area of danger, and enables local authorities to protect themselves in case of danger on the usual and proper terms of paying compensation. The result is that the action fails, and is dismissed with costs.

CARLISLE v. SALT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Party-wall notice and award—Material facts—Non-disclosure of by vendor—Title—Deposit—Expenses of investigating title—Return of—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 90.

A party-wall notice and award under the London Building Act, 1894, are material facts, and the non-disclosure of them by the vendor entitles the purchaser to the return of the deposit with interest, and also the expenses of investigating the title, together with the costs of the action.

Stevens v. Adamson, 2 Stark. 422, followed.

In this case the plaintiff claimed repayment of the deposit he had paid the defendants, together with the expenses he had incurred in investigating the title and the costs of this action.

The facts were as follows: On the 12th of October, 1904, an agreement was entered into by the plaintiff and the defendants whereby the plaintiff agreed to purchase the freehold hereditaments No. 9, Portsmouth-street, Lincoln's-inn, from the defendants for the sum of £1,950, and to pay forthwith a deposit of 10 per cent. on the purchase price. The plaintiff accordingly paid the defendants' agent the sum of £195 deposit as aforesaid.

Previously to this, on the 2nd of November, 1903, a party-wall notice under the London Building Act, 1894, was served on the defendants by the owner of the adjoining premises, No. 10, Portsmouth-street (hereinafter called the building owner), whereby the building owner gave notice that he intended to execute certain works therein mentioned in connection with the party-wall separating Nos. 10 and 9, and on the 10th of October, 1904 (two days before the agreement was entered into), an award was made whereby it was agreed that the existing party-wall should be demolished and a new one erected in its place.

The defendants failed to disclose these facts to the plaintiff on or previously to the 12th of October, 1904.

The building owner immediately proceeded to carry out the works mentioned in the said award.

On the 4th of November, 1904, a dangerous structure notice under the London Building Act, 1894, Amendment Act, 1898, was served upon the defendants requiring them forthwith to take down various portions of the said premises and to shore up the same immediately, and in obedience to a subsequent order by a magistrate the house was pulled down.

Previously to the pulling down of the said premises they were in the occupation of a tenant.

Younger, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the plaintiff.—A party-wall notice had been served upon the defendants, and an award made under the London Building Act. These were material facts, and it was the duty of the defendants to disclose them. This duty the defendants had failed to perform. The condition of the premises which necessitated the dangerous structure notice and the magistrate's order arose from the carrying out of the works mentioned in the award. A good tenant had been lost owing to the pulling down of the house in obedience to the magistrate's order.

They cited Stevens v. Adamson, 2 Stark 422; Turner v. Green, 43 W. R. 537, [1895] 2 Ch. 205; Whittington v. Seale-Hayne, (1900) W. N. 31, 48 W. R. Dig. 99; Newbigging v. Adam, 35 W. R. 597, 34 Ch. D. 582.

Hughes, K.C., and R. E. Moore, for the defendants.—The plaintiff bought the premises with a view to pulling them down and rebuilding, and therefore the demolition of them by the defendants in obedience to the magistrate's order was no hardship on him. The party-wall notice and the award were not such material facts as it was the duty of the defendants to disclose. If, however, they were such material facts, that would only entitle the plaintiff to claim that the defendants should clear off the incumbrance before the completion of the contract.

They cited the following cases: In re Leyland and Taylor's Contract, 49 W. R. 17, [1900] 2 Ch. 625; Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, 27 Ch. D. 89; Soper v. Arnold, 38 W. R. 449, 14 A. C. 429; Mostyn v. West Mostyn Co., 24 W. R. 401, 1 C. P. D. 140; Torrance v. Bolton, 21 W. R. 134, 8 Ch. App. 118; Edwards v. M'Leay, 2 Swanst. 287.

JOYCE, J., in giving a considered judgment, reviewed the facts and said: This is not an action to set aside for fraud a purchase completed by conveyance and payment, but simply to get payment back of the deposit and the expenses of investigating the title. The defendants admit that they did not disclose to the plaintiff that they had received a party-wall notice and that an award had been made, but no fraudulent intent is imputed to them. These were material facts affecting the price and the title of the property.

Now, the vendor of real estate is under an obligation to disclose a material defect in the title or in the subject of the sale which is exclusively within his knowledge, and which the purchaser could not be expected to discover for himself with the care ordinarily used in similar transactions. In this case the defendants concealed, for they did not disclose, facts which were material to the value of the property, and which constituted material defects in the title. I must follow Stevens v. Adamson, and order the defendants to repay the deposit with interest, and also the expenses to which the plaintiff has been put in investigating the title, together with the costs of this action.

OFFIN v. ROCHFORD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Highway — Roadside waste — Road between irregular fences—Presumption of dedication—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 26 (1)—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1—R. S. C, 1883, ord. 25, r. 5.

The fact that a public highway runs between fences raises the presumption that all the open space between the fences forms portion of the highway, and was intended to be dedicated to the public, unless there is evidence to rebut that presumption. The fact that the fences are irregular, and not in a continuous line, does not by itself rebut the presumption of dedication.

Trial of action.

The question to be determined in this action was whether a triangular strip of grass land inclosed by fences on two sides but lying open to a public highway on the third side, formed portion of the highway, or belonged to the owner or the adjoining inclosed land free from any public rights of way.

By a simple deed of conveyance dated the 24th of December, 1902, the plaintiff Offin purchased a freehold farm, known as Brick House Farm, situate in the parish of South Fambridge, in the county of Essex, including a triangular strip of rough grass land, about 1,600 square yards in extent and thirty yards in width at its broadest part, lying open to a public highway which intersected the farm upon one side, but separated from the farm premises by hedges and a gate on the remaining two sides.

In 1904 the plaintiff contracted to sell the farm, together with the triangular strip, to one Edward Thomson, and the latter having entered into possession under the contract, with the consent of the plaintiff erected a fence inclosing the triangular strip from the highway, leaving a margin of about seven feet between it and the highway.

In or about July, 1904, the Rochford Rural District Council, as highway authority for the district, and acting in compliance with the statutory duty imposed upon them by section 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1894, by their agents entered upon the land and broke down and destroyed the fence.

In February, 1905, the plaintiff commenced this action claiming a declaration that the triangular strip of land belonged to him absolutely free from any public right of way or other right, and an injunction restraining the defendants, their servants and agents, from trespassing upon it.

The defendants claimed that the land formed portion of the highway, but did not rely upon any specific acts of dedication, or of intention to dedicate to the public, either alone or jointly with evidence of user. They also set up section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, by way of defence.

The proved facts as to user and situation of the land and hedges appear in the judgment.

Rowden, K.C., and Begg, for the plaintiff.—Though it is admitted that the metalled portion of the road is a public highway, it is necessary to prove user of the unmetalled portion. The farm and the triangular strip of land have been in settlement since 1826, with the exception of a short period from 1871 to 1875, therefore there was no person capable of dedicating the land to the public during that period. This is sufficient to rebut any presumption of dedication arising from user by the public during that period: per Cotton, L.J., in Spedding v. Fitzpatrick, 38 Ch. D., at p. 414, 36 W. R. Dig. 157. The position of the fences shows that the strip of land once formed part of an ancient close before the road was made across it. This is sufficient to rebut any presumption of the fences having been put up as boundaries separating the highway from the inclosed land. The fences are irregular, and not in a continuous straight line, therefore there is no presumption that the whole of the land between the fences has been dedicated to the public: Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council, 81 L. T. 405, 48 W. R. Dig. 67; Countess of Belmore v. Kent County Council, 49 W. R. 459, [1901] 1 Ch. 873. Further, the user by the plaintiff, or his predecessors, is sufficient to rebut the theory of dedication. As to the defence set up under section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, the plaintiff is really claiming a declaration of title, and therefore this action does not amount to an "action, proceeding, or prosecution" such as is contemplated by that section. Even if it does, and the plaintiff has no cause of action, the action comes within ord. 25, r. 5, which enables the plaintiff to claim a declaration of title even though no "consequential relief is or could be claimed or not."

Dickens, K.C., and Herbert Smith, for the defendants.—Where the road runs between fences there is a presumption that the whole of the land between them has been dedicated to the public, even though the fences are irregular: Harvey v. Truro Rural District Council, 52 W. R. 262, [1903] 2 Ch. 638. If user by the public of the metalled portion is admitted, there is no need to prove user of the unmetalled portion: Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co. (Limited), 10 W. R. 538, 6 L. T. N. S. 378. In Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council the land formed part of the waste of the manor, here it does not. Countess of Belmore v. Kent County Council does not apply, because in that case there was evidence to rebut the presumption of dedication. Here the evidence of user given by the plaintiff is insufficient, nor has there been given any evidence at all which is inconsistent with an intention of dedication. [They referred also to the following cases: Rex v. Wright, 3 B. & Ad. 681; Locke-King v. Woking Urban District Council, 62 J. P. 167, 46 W. R. Dig. 66; Friern Barnet Urban District Council v. Richardson, 62 J. P. 547; Curtis v. Kesteven County Council, 39 W. R. 199, 45 Ch. D. 504.] As to the defence under section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, this is an action, proceeding, or prosecution within that section, and is therefore barred because the cause of action was the breaking down of the fence by the defendants, and that took place more than six months before the action was commenced. Ord. 25, r. 5, does not enable the plaintiff to bring an action for an injunction after the stipulated period has elapsed.

Rowden, K.C., replied.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question in this action is whether a piece of grass land abutting upon the metalled portion of a public highway is or is not roadside waste, and therefore portion of the highway itself. It is necessary first to consider the facts: The locus in quo is the rural district of Rochford, and the piece of land in question has until recently been treated as forming portion of a farm known as Brick House Farm. We know nothing with regard to the character of the road except from a point somewhat south of South Fambridge until it reaches the actual locus in quo, and between these points the road runs between some kind of fences, and by the side of the road are strips of roadside waste of varying width. When the fence reaches the corner of the triangular strip in question, it turns off somewhat sharply to form the boundary dividing the strip from the farm premises on two of its sides, and runs on until it almost meets the metalled portion of the road at the far corner of the strip. One portion of the fence or hedge, which forms two sides of the triangle, looks older than the other portion. The piece of land is covered with rough grass, and in 1901 there appears to have been a small dip in the soil near the boundary of the metalled portion, and beyond this the surface of the strip of land is somewhat higher than that of the metalled road, but it seems doubtful whether it is higher than the crown of the road. It looks, in fact, as though the elevation had been made by throwing out the soil to form the gutter. As to the fences bounding the strip on two sides, looking at the map it is possible to conjecture that the strip of land once formed an ancient close with the land on the other side of the road, and that the road cut this close into two parts. But it appears from the evidence that the fences in the field on the other side of the road are not of the same nature as the fences bounding the strip on two of its sides, therefore I cannot hold that the road was made over an existing close.

As to the mode in which the land has been used at various times, it appears to have been used by the tenants for several purposes: They have from time to time placed clamps of manure upon it, but always, it seems, nearer to the fence than to the road; they have also grazed cattle, and perhaps sheep, upon it, but the sheep do not appear to have been penned, in fact the user as to grazing seems to have been the same as on all parts of the roadside waste along the road; they have used it as a means of passage in going to and from the road to the gate in the north-east corner of the fence; in one instance corn was threshed and the resultant straw stacked upon it, and on one occasion when steam ploughing was going on in an adjacent field a house on wheels for the use of the men stood upon it for a few days. Now none of these acts are inconsistent with the notion that the land is subject to public rights of way, and are therefore not enough to rebut the presumption upon which the defendants rely. In the evidence one act was mentioned which, if established, would have been inconsistent with the notion of public rights. It was said by one witness that at some date previous to 1859 a row of iron hurdles upon wheels was placed near the edge of the road, and that when threshing took place on that occasion these had to be moved back. Of the other witnesses not one has deposed as to this crucial fact, and in the absence of any testimony of the same kind I am unable to accept it, and must treat it as if it had not existed. On the other hand no acts of user by the public have been shown from which we can infer dedication, apart from the dedication of the metalled portion. But if the presumption relied on by the defendants exists—that is to say, that primâ facie all the land between the hedges was intended to be dedicated—it is not necessary to prove a separate dedication of the triangular strip apart from the dedication of the metalled road. Therefore the real point which I have to determine is whether the presumption exists or not. The proposition of law upon which the defendants rely is to be found expressed in the direction which Martin, B., gave to the jury in Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co. Crompton, J., says (6 L. T. N. S., at p. 379): "My brother Martin laid down two propositions . . . upon the subject of the first proposition he says: 'In the case of an ordinary highway, although it may be of a varying and unequal width, running between fences on each side, the right of passage or way primâ facie, unless there be evidence to the contrary, extends to the whole space between the fences, and the public are entitled to the use of the entire width of it as a highway, and are not confined to the part which may be metalled or kept in order for the more convenient use of carriages or foot passengers.' That seems to us to be a very proper direction. An objection was made to it in two ways by Mr. O'Malley. It was said that that would apply to cases where there is a highway open to a considerable greensward or land which may be inclosed by the lord of the manor if connected with the waste, or by the landowner if it belongs to the landowner, and that the direction to the jury would take in, a place of that kind which is really not part of a highway. But I own it strikes me that my brother Martin guards carefully against that. He speaks of an ordinary highway as running between fences, and he says that primâ facie that is to be taken as a highway. . . . The proposition is confined to the case of an ordinary highway running between fences, though it may be of varying and unequal width. That is the principle of Rex v. Wright, 3 B. & Ad. 681, which is a very strong case, and the principle is also laid down in several other cases which are referred to in Rex v. Wright. Taken altogether, I think it comes to this, that primâ facie when you look at a highway running between fences, unless there is something to show the contrary, the public have a right to the whole and are not confined to the metalled part of it."

Counsel on behalf of the plaintiff argued that considerable doubt as to whether this proposition applies to the case of a road bounded by irregular fences was raised in Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council and also in Countess of Belmore v. Kent County Council. Now, is this really so? In Neeld's case the land in question formed part of the waste of the manor, and it was separated from the road by a ditch. It was held both by the Court of Queen's Bench and by the Court of Appeal that there was evidence to rebut the presumption; and whether the presumption existed or not in the case of a road bounded by irregular fences was not determined. In the Court of Queen's Bench, Channell, J., referring to Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co. (Limited), says (81 L. T. N. S., at p. 406): "The result of that decision seems to me to be that where there is a high road running between two fences at some distance away from the part of the high road that is usually used, a question of fact arises whether those are the fences or boundaries of the high road. If that be so, this decision comes to little or nothing more than that the action of the highway authorities in metalling a particular part of the road does not limit the rights of the public to that part. That is a very clear proposition, and it is by no means clear that on this question the judges ever intended to go beyond that point. . . . Of course it is a question of degree in each case whether or not there is a substantial piece of waste, and then comes the question whether the fences between the enclosed land and the waste were put up with any reference to the highway or whether they were put up where they are for some other reason. I am inclined to think that in each case that question ought to be decided before any question of presumption with regard to the space which in fact may be found to exist between the fences. . . . Consequently it seems to me that before considering the question of presumption you must first consider whether the fences in existence were put up in reference to the highway and are fences or boundaries of the high road in the sense in which Crompton, J., used the expression in Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co., or whether they are simply boundaries separating the enclosed land from the waste." He then goes on to consider the facts and circumstances, including the fact that the land formed part of the waste of the manor, and concludes that if the case had been decided in 1874 there would have been great doubt, but since that date acts of ownership had taken place to rebut the presumption, and he therefore decided against the highway authority. In the same case in the Court of Appeal Lord Russell, L.C.J., says (81 L. T. N. S., at p. 409): "Their suggestion is that because the road has hedges on either side the whole space between those hedges is part of the highway; and in support of that argument they relied upon the case of Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co. . . . It seems to me very difficult to give assent to such a general proposition as this, that, under all conditions where you find a metalled road bordered by unmetalled margins, and beyond the margins by hedges, there is an invariable presumption that all the space between the hedges is highway. . . . That would depend to a great extent, I think, on many other circumstances—such, for instance, as the nature of the district through which the road passes, the width of the margins, the regularity of the line of the hedges, and the levels of the land adjoining the road. These are all circumstances which should be taken into account before any presumption of law can arise as to the width of the highway." Smith, L.J., at p. 409, accepts the statement of the law laid down by Crompton, J., in Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co., and Williams, L.J., at p. 410, agrees that if any presumption arose in that case, it was amply rebutted by the evidence, and doubts whether any "presumption can be said to arise in the case of a road going across the uninclosed waste of a manor." Here I am not dealing with waste of a manor, but primâ facie the fences were erected on either side of the road to separate land not dedicated to the public from land dedicated. The mere existence of fences by itself would not be sufficient to raise the presumption; the real question is, are the fences to be taken as having been put up as the boundary of the highway? Primâ facie the fence is the boundary of the highway unless some other reason can be found to rebut the presumption. In Countess of Belmore v. Kent County Council, as in Neeld's case, the court held acts of ownership had been exercised which were inconsistent with public rights. Cozens-Hardy, J., referring to Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council, says ([1901] 1 Ch., at p. 878): "Now, applying the principles laid down by the late Lord Chief Justice, I think there is no presumption of dedication up to the old fence, or that, if there is any presumption, it is rebutted by the surrounding circumstances and by the evidence." Now am I to say that a fence forming two sides of a triangle was primâ facie made as a boundary to the highway? I recur to the facts. It is true the fences are irregular and that here the strip of land contains some 1,600 square yards. But I have great difficulty in finding any other reason for the erection of the fence originally unless it was intended to be the boundary of the highway, and it is impossible for me to account for its existence upon any other theory. Therefore I think, on the merits, the defendants are right in saying that the presumption exists, and I hold, therefore, that the triangular strip forms portion of the highway.

I must also have decided in the defendants' favour on the point raised under section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. In 1904 the plaintiff erected a fence separating the strip from the road, and on the 11th of July the highway authority entered upon the land and destroyed the fence. On the 23rd of July the plaintiff complained to the rural district council, and the latter wrote a letter asserting their claim on behalf of the public. The writ in this action was issued in February, 1905, more than six months after the removal of the fence by the district council.

By section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, it is provided that "Where . . . any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority . . . the action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months after the ceasing thereof."

In this case the only act complained of by the plaintiff is the pulling down of the fence, and that is expressly alleged in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim. Now, the mere assertion of a right did not by itself afford a good cause of action, the only act which gave the plaintiff a legal cause of action was the pulling down of the fence, and therefore I think section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applies. Ord. 25, r. 5, enables the court to make a declaration of right without granting any other specific relief, but there must be a good cause of action before the court can make the declaration, there must, in fact, be a good cause of action to justify the action being brought at all. I hold, therefore, that this action is barred by section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and there will, therefore, be judgment for the defendants with costs as between solicitor and client as provided by section 1 (b).

STANBURY v. EXETER CORPORATION. (a.)

Local government—Diseases of Animals Acts—Inspector appointed by local authority—Sheep detained by inspector on suspicion of having sheep-scab — Negligence of inspector—Liability of local authority—Principal and agent—Sheep-scab Order, 1898, Arts. 2,14—Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 57), ss. 2, 22, 35 (xiii.).

A veterinary inspector, who was appointed by a local authority under the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of that Act and the orders of the Board of Agriculture made thereunder, detained a ram offered for sale in a market belonging to the plaintiff under a mistaken suspicion that it was suffering from scab. In doing so the inspector was guilty of negligence, and the plaintiff was caused a loss.

Held, that the local authority were not liable to make good the loss so occasioned to the plaintiff, because the order of the Board of Agriculture in question, under which the inspector purported to act, imposed the duty on the inspector, and not upon the local authority.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the county court judge at Exeter.

One Heath, the veterinary inspector appointed on the 7th of February, 1900, by the defendants, who, it was admitted, were the local authority within the meaning of the sections and order quoted, had on what turned out to be a mistaken suspicion that it was suffering from sheep-scab detained a ram the property of the plaintiff, who had suffered damage thereby, and had brought an action against the defendants as being the employers or principals of Heath, against whom he alleged negligence.

The county court judge held that Heath was not the servant or agent of the local authority (the defendants) appointed by them to perform duties imposed upon them by the Act, but was appointed to perform duties imposed on him by the Act; and the defendants were therefore not liable for his negligence out the soil to form the gutter. As to the fences bounding the strip on two sides, looking at the map it is possible to conjecture that the strip of land once formed an ancient close with the land on the other side of the road, and that the road cut this close into two parts. But it appears from the evidence that the fences in the field on the other side of the road are not of the same nature as the fences bounding the strip on two of its sides, therefore I cannot hold that the road was made over an existing close.

As to the mode in which the land has been used at various times, it appears to have been used by the tenants for several purposes: They have from tim to time placed clamps of manure upon it, but alwe it seems, nearer to the fence than to the road; have also grazed cattle, and perhaps sheep, r but the sheep do not appear to have been r fact the user as to grazing seems to ha was same as on all parts of the roadside we upon the road; they have used it as a mea their own officer going to and from the road to the of the Diseases of east corner of the fence; in or Agriculture may threshed and the resultant subject and and on one occasion whe the following going on in an adi and regu- wheels for the use of a diseased for a few days. section 2 of the Act of 1894 inconsistent with t execute and enforce this Act to public rights Board of Agriculture so far as to rebut the pr or enforced by local rely. "An inspector of a local authority on receiving in any manner whatsoever information of the supposed existence of sheep-scab or having reasonable ground to suspect the existence of sheep-scab . . . shall put in force and discharge the powers and duties conferred and imposed on him by or under the Act of 1894 and this order." It is submitted that section 14 of the order, which directs the seizure of an infected or suspected animal exposed for sale to be dealt with as provided in the order by the inspector "or other officer appointed by them in that behalf," shows that the duty is not cast on the inspector, but on the local authority, and they therefore are liable for his negligence.

Clavell Salter, K.C., and J. A. Hawke, for the defendants.—The corporation appointed the inspector as directed by the Act, and it is not suggested that they appointed an unqualified man or that there was any negligence on their part, and consequently they can only be held liable if it were shown that Heath was acting as their servant in doing the negligent act complained of. A consideration of the Act and of the Sheep-scab Order makes it clear that the inspector was not exercising any statutory duty imposed on the corporation, and therefore no question of any delegated authority by them can arise which might render the defendants liable. There are no English authorities directly deciding this question of delegated authority, but it has been considered in America. In Mackay v. City of Buffalo, 7 Hun. Rep. New York Sup. Ct. 401, it was held that police officers were not the servants or agents of the police committee so as to render the city authority by whom the police were appointed responsible for a wrongful discharge of duty. True, part of a highway. In Garlick v. Knottingley Urban District Council, [1904] 2 Loc. Gov. Rep. 1345, it was held that inasmuch as the power given to the local authority by section 121 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to destroy infected articles was not exerciseable by the medical officer of health on his own initiative, no claim for compensation for articles a medical officer had without the authority of his board directed to be destroyed could be made against the local authority under section 308 of the Act.

Forsyth v. Caurieff and Corporation of Toronto, 20 Ont. Rep. 478, was also cited.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the county court judge was quite right and has drawn a proper distinction, although his judgment requires amplification. If this was an ordinary case of delegation to an agent by a corporation or local authority of their statutory duties which necessarily must in many cases be delegated to inferior agents to carry out, the ordinary rule, respondeat superior, would apply. The corporation would be liable in such case, for it must be assumed, as it was throughout the argument, that Heath was guilty of negligence in doing the act complained of by the plaintiff. The case seems to me analogous to that of a policeman, who, appointed by a local authority, nevertheless has statutory duties to perform independent and wholly apart from duties imposed on a local authority. On the other hand, duties are often imposed on local authorities that in fact would have to be performed by some officer to whom they would be delegated. In the present case, however, under section 35 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, the local authority had only to appoint the inspectors who were to carry out the Act and the orders made under it, and it is not unimportant to observe that the Board of Agriculture have expressly reserved power to themselves under section 35 (3) of removing such an inspector from his office if on inquiry they are satisfied that he has been guilty of a breach of duty. Section 14 of the Sheep-scab Order, 1898, imposes on the inspector appointed by the local authority the duty of seizing, removing, and detaining sheep affected with or suspected of being affected with this disease. He is bound to obey that order independently of any authority given him as inspector when appointed by the local authority. The question has arisen whether the local authority is liable when in the execution of the duty imposed on him by the order the inspector seized an animal negligently? In my opinion the local authority is not liable. Heath was not an agent in that which he did of the local authority. He was not appointed to perform duties imposed on the local authority, but to perform duties imposed on himself as an inspector appointed under

The par- the performance of ion did not exist until of Agriculture was made. no question of delegation of spector, because the order does not ne local authority or require them to ne duty which is imposed on the inspector. ase is almost analogous to that of a police officer appointed by a watch committee of a borough, and nobody has ever heard of a corporation being made liable for the negligence of a police officer in the performance of his duties, although the watch committee has to appoint, control, and remove the police officers. The reason is to be found stated in Beven on Negligence (2nd ed., vol. 1), pp. 388-9, quoted during the argument. For these reasons I think the decision of the county court judge was right and that the corporation are not liable.

DARLING, J. — I agree. The inspector was appointed under sections 2 and 35 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, and section 35, sub-section 3, provides that the Board of Agriculture may remove any inspector of a local authority who is incompetent or has been guilty of misconduct or neglect without consulting the local authority in the matter. The question whether the local authority are liable depends upon whether the negligent act done by the inspector purported to be done by virtue of corporate authority or by virtue of something imposed as a public obligation to be done, not by the local authority, but by an officer whom they were ordered to appoint. The particular things which the inspector did here were things which the corporation themselves could not do, and they were not in fact doing them. They had to carry out the Act, and had to do that by appointing an officer. When that officer was appointed he was to be guided by instructions given to him, not by the local authority, but by the Board of Agriculture. The inspector could say to the local authority that, although they appointed him, his duty was to carry out the instructions of the Board of Agriculture. There was an order of the board directing the inspector what he was to do, and it is the doing of that which the board ordered him to do that is said to have given a cause of action against the corporation in this case. Now, it is worth noticing that this statute contemplates two kinds of inspectors. The Board of Agriculture are to appoint inspectors who are to administer the Act over a wider area than the limited area controlled by the inspector appointed by the local authority, and no one would contend that an action would lie against anyone but the inspector for the acts of an inspector appointed by the board. Why, then, should the corporation be liable for the acts of an inspector appointed by them? The inspector appointed by the board is bound to act as the board direct him. That is exactly the position of the inspector appointed by the corporation, who is bound to do as the board direct him, and can be dismissed by the board. These were not acts done by a servant of the corporation, or under their authority, but were acts of a public nature done by a public officer appointed by the corporation, as directed by the statute.

PRINCE v. HAWORTH. (a.)

Contract—Probate action—Costs to be paid out of the estate—Legality of contract.

A plaintiff in a probate action entered into an agreement with the two defendants (one of whom was an infant) that whichever of the two wills in dispute was established the costs of both parties to the suit as between solicitor and client should be paid out of the estate, whether the court so ordered or not. At the trial the defendant succeeded, but the court refused to sanction the agreement on behalf of the infant defendant and ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs of both parties to the suit. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action upon the agreement against the adult defendant to recover the costs which the plaintiff had been ordered to pay in the probate action.

Held, that the above agreement was not void as being against the policy of the law in that it intended to affect the administration of justice, and that it was enforceable as against the defendant, who was sui juris.

Action tried before Lawrance, J., without a jury.

The facts of the case and the arguments used are fully set forth in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

LAWRANCE, J.—This case was tried before me as a short cause in December last. The facts are as follows: A testator died having left two wills dated respectively on consecutive days, the 3rd of March and the 4th of March, 1903. Under the later will the plaintiff claimed as residuary legatee, and under the former the defendant claimed the estate as executor and trustee for an infant as beneficiary. Proceedings were taken in the Probate Division to establish the validity of one or the other of these wills. In the course of these proceedings the following agreement was made between the plaintiff on the one part and the defendant and the infant (Rebecca Clegg) of the other: "We hereby agree that, whether the will dated the 3rd of March, 1903, or the will dated the 4th of March, 1903, is upheld on the trial of this action that the costs as between a solicitor and his client of the plaintiff and of the defendants Thomas Haworth and Rebecca Clegg shall be paid out of the estate of deceased, whether the court so orders or not. Dated the 20th of February, 1903. William Prince, plaintiff. Thomas Haworth, Rebecca Clegg, defendants. James Clegg, guardian for defendant R. Clegg." In the probate action the court pronounced in favour of the earlier will. On an application made the court refused to sanction the agreement on behalf of the infant beneficiary, and directed that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the defendant and the infant.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff now claims a sum of £327 15s. 6d., his costs as between solicitor and client caused in and about the proceedings. The defendant refuses to pay, on the ground that the agreement was and is void, as being against the policy of the law in that it tends to affect the administration of justice. In support of this contention the case of Egerton v. Earl Brownlow and Others, 4 H. L. Cas., at p. 163, was cited, and as instances of the general principle that such agreements are void I was referred to Thomas v. Wainwright, 6 Bing. N. C. 174, a case of fraudulent preference in a composition with creditors, and Lound v. Grimwade, 37 Ch. D. 605, a case of an agreement made to suppress or to colour certain incidents in a criminal prosecution. It appears to me that none of these authorities really touch the present case. If all parties to the present agreement had been sui juris, can anybody doubt that they might have made it? Either party might then have charged or mortgaged his interest, such as it was, in the fund; he might even have conveyed it absolutely either to the party on the other side or to anybody else. There is a broad distinction between an agreement which tends to divert the course of justice and prevent it reaching the goal and an agreement which merely regulates the rights of the parties after the course of justice has reached its proper goal. It is clear that an agreement of the latter kind is not, merely as such, void; if it were every judgment of a court of justice would operate as a restraint in alienation of the property recovered. Then is there any special prohibition against a successful claimant to a fund or estate agreeing to pay out of a fund or estate if and when recovered by him the costs of the unsuccessful claimant? It is said that ord. 65, r. 14*a*, makes such an agreement invalid. That rule provides that the costs occasioned by any unsuccessful claim or unsuccessful resistance to any claim to any property shall not be paid out of an estate unless the judge otherwise orders. But that is merely a rule of practice indicating what order shall under ordinary circumstances be made in proceedings before the court; it does not in any way affect the conduct of the parties after the order of the court has been made. In other words, it is quite consistent with the judge's order directing the costs to be paid by the parties that one party shall agree to pay the other party his costs, and to pay them out of what fund he pleases. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that if the parties to this agreement were all of age there would be nothing to prevent them from making this agreement. The difficulty is caused by the fact that one of the persons who signed the contract is an infant, and it is contended that without the other person he the defendant cannot in fact perform his promise to pay the plaintiff's costs out of the estate. But when an action is brought against a person for breach of contract to do an act it is not generally an answer to say that he is unable to do it; the mere inability of the defendant to perform his contract specifically is immaterial to the question of his liability to the plaintiff for non-performance except in cases where his promise is conditional upon his ability to perform it. I do not think that the promise of the defendant in the present case was subject to any such condition.

Probably the liability of either party was conditional upon one or the other of the two wills being upheld, and if neither party succeeded in establishing the will under which he claimed, the agreement as to payment of costs would not bind either. But I cannot see that this agreement was subject to any other condition. If the plaintiff had succeeded in establishing the will of the 4th of March, I cannot doubt that he would have been liable under the agreement to pay the defendant's costs, and I can see no reason why the liability of the defendant who has succeeded should be limited by any conditions which are not reciprocal on both sides. It cannot be suggested that his liability was intended to be conditional upon the infant being jointly liable with him because on a matter of law he must be taken to have known that the infant was incapable of binding herself by an agreement such as this. A promise by two persons to pay a sum of money is in law a promise that they or one of them will pay it, and one of them may be sued upon it; his only right is to apply by summons to have the other joined as defendant, which has not been and could not be done in this case, as the co-contractor is an infant. It appears, therefore, that the defendant has promised for good consideration that the plaintiff's costs shall be paid out of the fund. He cannot perform this promise. The promise is not conditional upon the happening of an event which has not happened. The result is that, on the authority of Bradley v. Heath, 3 Sim. 543, he is liable, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

MORAN, GALLOWAY, & CO. v. UZIELLI. (a.)

Insurance (Marine)—Insurable interest—Constructive total loss—Policy on disbursements—Advances for "necessaries"—Admiralty Court Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), s. 6.

The plaintiffs, who had made advances for "necessaries" within the meaning of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, caused themselves to be insured "at and from Vancouver . . . and/or places in the United Kingdom, and for thirty days in port after arrival . . . upon any kind of goods . . . and upon the body . . . of and in . . . The Prince Louis . . . on disbursements against the risk of total and constructive total loss of ship only." The perils insured against included perils of the seas. During the insured voyage the vessel received such damage from perils of the seas as to amount to a constructive total loss, the cost of repairing her exceeding the value of the ship when repaired. The plaintiffs collected the freight, having a lien on it for advances, and placed it to the credit of their account with the shipowners. The freight thus retained was insufficient to repay the plaintiffs the whole amount of their advances. The plaintiffs had no lien or charge upon the ship.

Held, that, so far as the plaintiffs' claim for disbursements was a claim for necessaries within 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, the plaintiffs had an insurable interest to the extent of the unsatisfied balance of the advances. A creditor of a shipowner who has advanced money for the necessary disbursements of the ship has an insurable interest in the debt due to him by the shipowner for such necessaries. Such a debt carries with it the legal right to seize the ship in an action in rem. The debt is different from ordinary debts, as the law gives to a creditor for necessaries a kind of security which ordinary creditors do not possess. When the ship is at sea the creditor for necessaries has a real interest in its safety.

The facts and argument appear in the judgment.

March 27, 1905.—WALTON, J., delivered the following considered judgment: In this case the plaintiffs' claim is under a marine policy dated the 2nd of June, 1902, subscribed by the defendants for a sum of £500. The terms of the policy in so far as they are material for the purposes of this case are as follows: "Be it known that Moran, Galloway, & Co., as well in their own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth may (or) shall appertain in part (or) in all doth make assurance and cause themselves and them and every of them to be insured lost or not lost at and from Vancouver and/or Puget Sound or any ports and/or places in the United Kingdom and for thirty days in port after arrival however employed upon any kind of goods and merchandizes and also upon the body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munition, artillery, boat, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel called the Prince Louis, the said ship, &c., goods and merchandizes, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy are and shall be valued at"—that is printed; then these words are written: "On disbursements against the risk of total and constructive total loss of ship only." The perils insured against included perils of the seas. The Prince Louis was a foreign ship, which at the date of the policy and at the time of her constructive total loss belonged to a company which, as I understand, was a foreign single ship company, though my judgment does not depend upon this latter assumption. The plaintiffs were the agents for the ship in this country. Some of the members of the firm own shares in the company which was the owner of The Prince Louis, but it was not contended that this was material for the purposes of this case. The plaintiffs, as ship's agents, had during the years 1900, 1901, and 1902 made advances for the ship's disbursements, and at the date of the policy and of the alleged loss the shipowners were indebted to them in a considerable amount on account of such advances. Some of the advances were made for the purposes of the voyage covered by the policy, but a large part of the advances had been made before the commencement of such voyage, and for other purposes. The defendants have admitted that the advances were in fact made, and were made for the purposes mentioned in the plaintiffs' account.

The question arose at the trial whether the advances were "necessaries" within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), s. 6, and whether at the date of the policy and the loss the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount owing to them on account of such advances by an action in rem in the Admiralty Division. This question was reserved. For the purposes of this judgment, I assume that at the date of the policy and of the loss the owners of The Prince Louis were, and still are, indebted to the plaintiffs, first on account of disbursements, and secondly on account of disbursements which were for "necessaries" within the meaning of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6. The Prince Louis loaded under charter a cargo of timber at Vancouver in April, 1902. She sailed with such cargo on the insured voyage on the 1st of May. She arrived in Cardiff Roads on the 24th of November, and docked for discharge on the 25th of November. Her cargo was all discharged by the 18th of December, and the freight thereon was earned and paid to the plaintiffs as agents for the owners of the ship. She removed to another berth to receive stiffening and a cargo of coals under a fresh charter, and received her stiffening on the 20th of December. The loading was not proceeded with, and, by reason of two survey reports, dated respectively the 12th of January and the 23rd of January, 1903, and a specification, dated the 24th of January, 1903, it was found that the cost of repairing her would exceed the value of the ship when repaired. The condition of the ship, as found by such surveys, was due to straining in bad weather and perils of the sea between the 1st of May and the 24th of November, 1902. It was admitted that the ship did become a constructive total loss in consequence of damage which she received at sea during the voyage in question. It was admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to collect the freight, and had a lien upon it for the amount owing to them for advances. The plaintiffs received and retained the freight, and placed it to the credit of their account against the shipowners. The plaintiffs had no lien or charge of any kind upon the ship. The defendants admit that the plaintiffs had an insurable interest in disbursements in so far as there was a lien for them upon the freight, but no further; they admit that such interest was insured by the policy, but say that, inasmuch as the freight was received by the plaintiffs, there was no loss. The plaintiffs contend that independently of their lien upon the freight they had an insurable interest to an amount equal to the value of the ship in respect of what was owing to them for disbursements, whether secured by any charge or lien on the ship or not; that such interest was insured by the policy, and inasmuch as there is still a considerable sum owing to them after giving credit for the freight received, they have suffered a loss in respect of which they are entitled to be indemnified under the policy.

Before proceeding further, I may point out that, in the case of an ordinary shipowner's policy on disbursements, no questions arise such as have to be considered in the present case. In such cases the disbursements represent expenditure by the shipowner either on his ship or for the purpose of earning his freight, and such policies are in the nature of insurances of the shipowner, either upon his ship or upon his freight. And even in cases of insurances effected after the Admiralty Court Act, 1840, and before the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Björn, 33 W. R. 719, 10 P. D. 44, effected by the ships' agents as in the present case on disbursements for necessaries supplied to a ship, it was not likely that any such question as I have now to consider would arise. For it was commonly supposed before the decision in The Heinrich Björn that the Admiralty Court Act, 1840, had given a maritime lien for necessaries (see, for instance, Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice (2nd ed., 1886), p. 183); and if there was a maritime lien, there was an insurable interest. Since The Heinrich Björn, decided in 1885, the question which I have now to decide has not, so far as I know, been considered or decided in any case which has come before our courts. This, however, may be to some extent due to what I believe is a common practice of insuring disbursements "under honour" policies upon which no action can be brought.

The question which has to be determined in this action is whether the plaintiffs have lost by perils of the sea anything in which they had at the time of loss an insurable interest; and, if so, what was the amount of such loss. In the first place, it is convenient to consider whether the plaintiffs had any insurable interest. In dealing with this question, a further question sometimes arises, whether the interest of the assured was sufficiently described in the policy; but no such question arises in the present case. The plaintiffs' interest was in respect of their advances, and it has been admitted that such interest is sufficiently described in the policy as "disbursements"; and this description is perhaps a little amplified by the words which follow—that is to say, "against the risk of total and constructive total loss of ship only." I may add that this admission which was made before me in chambers did not involve an admission that the plaintiffs had an insurable interest. What, then, was the plaintiffs' interest? They clearly had an interest in the debt which was due to them on account of their disbursements; or, in other words, in their legal right as creditors of the shipowners. But this legal right was in no sense dependent on the safe arrival of the ship. It remained the same whether the ship was lost or not. It was not, and was not capable of being, exposed to the perils insured against. It was never at risk under the policy. It was not lost. As was said by the court in Stainbank v. Fenning, 11 C. B. 51, at p. 89, "A mere debt . . . for repairs and disbursements could not legally be made the subject of an insurance." I think, therefore, that the fact that the plaintiffs were interested in the debt merely as a debt did not give them any insurable interest. What other interest in respect of their disbursements had the plaintiffs? They had a charge or lien on the freight; but this they have not lost; on the contrary, it has been fully satisfied. The plaintiffs, however, contend that they had an interest, not merely in freight, but in the ship itself as the practical security for the payment of what was owing to them by the shipowners. They say that the ship was, after the freight was exhausted, if not the only, at all events the principal, asset of the shipowners, and that the recovery of the debt owing to the plaintiffs for their advances was in fact dependent on the safe arrival of the ship. It was not proved that the recovery of the debt was in fact dependent on the safe arrival of the ship. There was no evidence before me to show that the debt may not still be recoverable from the shipowners. The plaintiffs' case in this respect cannot be put higher, I think, than this, that the recovery of the debt was rendered less certain and more difficult by the loss of the ship. Assuming that in this sense the recovery of the amount due for disbursements was dependent on the safe arrival of this ship, did this give to the plaintiffs, who had no charge or lien of any kind on the ship at the time of the loss, an insurable interest under the policy? As was explained by Lawrence, J., in the opinion delivered by him in the House of Lords in Lucena v. Craufurd, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 269, at p. 302, an interest which is not in the nature of a property legal or equitable in the things exposed to maritime perils may still be insurable. "Where," says the learned judge, "a man is so circumstanced with respect to matters exposed to certain risks or dangers as to have a moral certainty of advantage or benefit but for those risks or dangers he may be said to be interested in the safety of the thing. To be interested in the preservation of a thing is to be so circumstanced with respect to it as to have benefit from its existence, prejudice from its destruction." He then proceeds to show that it is no valid objection to these propositions that the interest is liable to be affected by other matters than the perils insured against; and he sums up his opinion upon the question in these words: "It seems to me that the contract of marine insurance may extend to protect every kind of interest that may subsist in, or be dependent upon, things exposed to the dangers to which maritime adventures are subjected; and I am not aware that by the laws of this country it has been reduced within narrower limits." It is unnecessary to cite cases to show that this opinion of Lawrence, J., has always been accepted as a correct statement of the law. If it stood alone and without further explanation, it seems to me that the plaintiffs might have good grounds for contending that, as creditors of a single-ship company, they had an interest dependent on the safety of the company's ship; an interest just as insurable as the interest of a creditor in the life of his debtor. But I think that in the latter part of the same opinion Lawrence, J., himself indicates clearly that the words "interest dependent upon things exposed to the dangers to which maritime adventures are subjected" require further definition. In Lucena v. Craufurd, the assured were commissioners, whose duty it was under a statutory commission to take charge of Dutch vessels and cargoes "which had been or might thereafter be detained in or brought into the ports of the United Kingdom." Before the commission was issued, certain Dutch vessels and their cargoes had been seized by order of the British Government for the purpose of being brought to this country. After the commission was issued the commissioners insured these ships and their cargoes. The ships with their cargoes were lost before arrival in this country, and the commissioners brought an action upon the policy. Under these circumstances, Lawrence, J., after stating the general principles in the words which I have read, expressed his opinion that, as the purpose and object of the commission was only to take care of the Dutch property after its arrival in England, and the commissioners till then had not any power to interfere with it, and could not in their character of commissioners suffer any damage by a loss happening before they had any concern in the ships or goods, they could not be said at the time of the loss to have had any insurable interest. The same view was adopted by Lord Eldon, Lord Erskine, and apparently by Lord Ellenborough, the noble lords who heard the appeal. In the words of Lord Eldon (at p. 323): "Expectation, though founded upon the highest probability, was not interest, and it was equally not interest whatever might have been the chances in favour of the expectation." Without citing later cases it is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, the result of the authorities is that, although an interest to be insurable is not necessarily a right, legal or equitable in, or charge upon, the property or arising out of the ownership of the subject-matter exposed to the risks insured against, and although any interest may be insured which is dependent on the safety of the thing exposed to such risks, still it must in all cases at the time of the loss be an interest legal or equitable, and not merely an expectation, however probable. In so far as the plaintiffs' claim depends upon the fact that they were ordinary unsecured creditors of the shipowners for an ordinary unsecured debt, I am satisfied that it must fail. The probability that if the debtor's ship should be lost he would be less able to pay his debts does not, in my judgment, give to the creditor any interest, legal or equitable, which is dependent upon the safe arrival of the ship. In such a case all that the creditor has, all that he can lose by the loss of the ship, is an expectation. I do not think that the creditor of a shipowner has an insurable interest in all the shipowners' property which is exposed to maritime risks This appears to me to be assumed by the court in the case of Stainbank v. Fenning, which I have already cited; and as far back as in the second edition of Arnould on Marine Insurance, published in 1857, I find an American case cited, apparently with approval, in which it was decided that "advances for repairs of ship give no insurable interest in the ship unless when secured by a lien by law or contract" (p. 329).

But a further, and to my mind much more difficult, question remains to be considered. It is said that the plaintiffs in the present case had more than an expectation, because they had the right under the Admiralty Court Act, 1840, to proceed in rem for the recovery of the amount owing to them. I assume, for the purposes of this judgment, that the disbursements in question were made for necessaries within the meaning of the Act At the date of the policy and at the date of the loss the position of the plaintiffs was this. They had advanced moneys for the necessaries of The Prince Louis. The ship was at sea on her voyage to Cardiff. The plaintiffs had a right which entitled them immediately after the arrival of the ship at Cardiff to arrest her under process; and by so doing, in the language of Dr. Lushington in The Volant, 1 W. Rob. 383, cited by Fry, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Björn, to obtain "security for prompt and immediate payment." If the ship was lost, the right to obtain this security on The Prince Louis was gone. Was this a real risk which underwriters may be asked, in consideration of an adequate premium, to undertake? And if they do undertake it, is the contract a binding contract? There is no doubt, to my mind, as to the reality of the risk. The foundation of the rules as to insurable interest is that the contract of marine insurance is essentially a contract of indemnity. Unless the assured is exposed to a real loss by the perils insured against, the contract is not a contract of indemnity, but is a mere wagering contract, and cannot be enforced. I am satisfied that a contract such as I have indicated, and such as is contained in the policy now in question (in so far as it extends to cover the plaintiffs' interest in respect of necessaries), is not a wagering contract, and is a contract by which the plaintiffs were protected from the risk of a real loss. I agree with what is said by the authors of the Digest of the Law of Marine Insurance, Mr. Chalmers and Mr. Owen, at p. 9 of the edition of 1901, and I borrow their language: "The definition of insurable interest has been continuously expanding, and dicta in some of the older cases which would tend to narrow it must be accepted with caution." I fully appreciate the argument founded upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Björn, 10 P. D., at p. 54: "The arrest of a vessel under the statute"—that is, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65—"is only one of several possible alternative proceedings ad fundandam jurisdictionem; no right in the ship or against the ship is created at any time before the arrest; it has no relation back to any earlier period; it is available only against the property of the person who owes the debt for necessaries; and the arrest need not be of the ship in question, but may be of any property of the defendant within the realm. The two proceedings"—the Lord Justice is speaking of proceedings where there is a maritime lien, and proceedings where there is only a right to arrest in rem ad fundandam jurisdictionem—"the two proceedings, therefore, though approaching one another in form, are different in substance; in the one case the arrest is to give effect to a pre-existent lien, in the other, the arrest is only one of several alternative modes of procedure, because, to use the language of Dr. Lushington in The Volant, 'it offers the greatest security for obtaining substantial justice in furnishing a security for prompt and immediate payment.'" But this decision comes only to this, that there is no maritime lien, no charge upon the ship for necessaries. But there may, as I have shown, be an insurable interest without any such charge of lien. It is no sound answer to the plaintiffs' contention upon this point to say that the plaintiffs' right to obtain a security on the ship might be defeated by perils other than those insured against. This difficulty is dealt with by Lawrence, J., in Lucena v. Craufurd, 2 Bos. & P. N. R., at p. 303. I think there is a distinction between the position of a creditor for an ordinary debt who has no right to arrest the property of his debtor except after judgment, under a writ of execution, and the position of the plaintiffs in this case. To hold that there was an insurable interest in this case will not offend against the principle of the rules as to insurable interest, or against any decision of our courts. To hold that there was no insurable interest would, I think, be to impose an unnecessary fetter upon business, which seems to me very ordinary and reasonable business, in no way tainted by the vice of wagering or gaming. Therefore I hold that, to the extent to which the plaintiffs' claim for disbursements was a claim for necessaries within 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, they had an insurable interest. There remains the question whether there was any and what loss, and that may involve an investigation of facts, and further argument on questions of law. Those questions are still open.

On the 11th of August, 1905, the following considered judgment was delivered:

WALTON, J.—In this case the plaintiffs claim upon a marine policy underwritten by the defendants, by which the plaintiffs caused themselves to be insured at and from Vancouver and/or Puget Sound to any ports and/or places in the United Kingdom and for thirty days in port after arrival however employed in the good ship or vessel called The Prince Louis, and by the terms of the policy it was expressed to be upon disbursements against the risk of total and constructive total loss of ship only; and the plaintiffs allege that the vessel became a constructive total loss, and they claim the amount for which the policy was underwritten by the defendants—that was the sum of £500. It was a policy for £500 on disbursements against the risk of total and constructive total loss of the ship only. The facts were to some considerable extent admitted. The defendants in their defence expressly admitted that The Prince Louis loaded under charter a cargo of timber at Vancouver in April, 1902; that she sailed with such cargo on the insured voyage on the 1st of May; arrived in Cardiff Roads on the 24th of November, and docked for discharge on the 25th of November. Her cargo was all discharged by the 18th of December, and the freight thereon was earned and paid to the plaintiffs as agents for the owners of the ship. She moved to another berth to receive stiffening and a cargo of coals under a fresh charter, and received her stiffening on the 20th of December. The loading was not proceeded with, and by reason of two survey reports dated respectively the 12th of January and the 23rd of January, 1903, and a specification dated the 24th of January, 1903, it was found that the cost of repairing her would exceed the value of the ship when repaired. The condition of the ship as found by such surveys was due to straining in bad weather and perils of the seas between the 1st of May and the 24th of November, 1902.

The admission amounts to this, that the ship did become a constructive total loss during the voyage upon which the disbursements were insured, and that she became a constructive total loss, and therefore the loss occurred some time before the 24th of November, 1902.

Now, the first question that arose in this case was whether the plaintiffs had any insurable interest; and after argument and consideration I have already held that a creditor of the shipowner who has advanced money for the necessary disbursements of the ship has an insurable interest in the debt due to him by the shipowner for such necessaries. I have held that such a debt carries with it the legal right to seize the ship in an action in rem, and is in this respect different from ordinary debts, as the law gives to a creditor for necessaries a kind of security which ordinary creditors do not possess. When the ship is at sea the creditor for necessaries has a real interest in its safety.

Having already decided that if the plaintiffs had a good claim for necessaries at the date of the loss they had an insurable interest, it becomes necessary to consider whether they in fact had such a claim, and if so, whether they have suffered any loss by the loss of the ship.

Now, the plaintiffs' accounts show disbursements made by them for various purposes up to the end of 1902—that is to say, up to the 31st of December, 1902, amounting to £5,433 6s. 4d., but of that £5,443 it is admitted by the plaintiffs that £245 8s. 7d. were for things which were not necessaries. It further appears that some of the disbursements constituting the £5,433 were made after the date of the loss, and those amount to £74 11s. 10d. Deducting those two items, which taken together amount to £320 0s. 5d., from the £5,433 6s. 4d., it leaves £5,113 5s. 11d. for disbursements made before the date of the loss, and which are alleged by the plaintiffs to be moneys advanced or spent for necessaries. But again there must be a deduction made because before the loss certain sums amounting to £868 5s. 3d. had in fact been received which reduced the debt owing for necessaries at the date of the loss to £4,245 0s. 8d.; therefore we have this claim by the plaintiffs, that they had advanced moneys for necessary disbursements of the ship to an amount of £4,245 0s. 8d. Well, a considerable discussion took place before me, and argument as to whether a very large number of items which were included in this balance of £4,245 0s. 8d. should not be struck off the claim on the ground that they could not be treated as necessaries in respect of which the creditor would be entitled to proceed in rem. Just leaving that point over for the moment—I shall have to deal with it in a moment—it may be convenient to consider how far the plaintiffs have been able, notwithstanding the constructive total loss of the ship, to avail themselves of the security—I use the word security, not perhaps in a technical sense, but in a sense which may be sufficiently understood without further explanation—how far they have been able to avail themselves of their security upon the ship and freight as things have happened; and I find that they have been able to avail themselves of that security, notwithstanding this constructive total loss of the ship to the amount of £2,800—that is, the freight received plus the proceeds of the sale of the damaged ship. There was some controversy as to the exact amount, but that is the figure which I find as accurately as I can arrive at it—£2,800.

Well, if that be so, the next question is whether the plaintiffs had a claim for necessaries at the date of the loss which exceeded that sum of £2,800, because if they had no claim for necessaries properly so called at the date of the loss for an amount exceeding £2,800 it is obvious that they have not suffered any loss.

I have gone through the very numerous items in the plaintiffs' account making up the £4,245. I have gone through them or made them up to a larger amount, £5,433, and in my judgment at any rate a very considerable sum must be taken from that amount. I have come to the conclusion that all the payments made for insurance premiums must be taken off. That seems to be the latest decision on the subject in the case of The Andre Theodore, which was a decision of the President of the Admiralty Court, which is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. 158. The insurances amount to £499 18s. 5d., I think, from the statement which has been supplied to me by the plaintiffs. That has to come off. Then there is another item for commissions and brokerage. I do not think they can be treated as necessaries. It seems to me that they simply were the remuneration or part of the remuneration, probably the principal part of the remuneration, which the plaintiffs received as the general managers of the vessel Prince Louis. They had the full and absolute control and management of that ship, which belonged to a foreign single ship company, but the plaintiffs were the agents, not only in this country, but, as I understand, they were agents with ample authority to manage the business of that ship wherever she was on behalf of the single ship company. They had complete control. I may have a word to say about that in a moment, but I mention the fact here; and amongst other things they had to manage the business of the ship, the chartering and the collecting of the freights, and the insuring and all the business of the ship; and their remuneration or part of their remuneration, I think their principal remuneration, was the money which they received by way of commission and by way of brokerage, and that, I think, must be deducted. There are a number of other items, many of them very small items, but I may mention some of the larger ones which I have taken off. There is £246 15s. 8d. which is a payment made for coal short delivered at Rhyl. I do not think that can be treated as a necessary. There is a smaller item, £26 5s. due to Bureau Veritas. There are some other smaller items; there is £204 19s. 9d., for instance, it is commission on estimated freight £204 19s. 9d. in The Vancouver. I have taken that off; and there are some other items. The result is this, that substantially after deducting all those amounts from the £4,245 there is really nothing left over and above this figure of £2,800, which the plaintiffs have actually received on account of the security which they had upon the ship and upon the freight. It is, of course, extremely difficult to arrive at an exact figure; for instance, there is an item of interest, which is a substantial item of £277. That of course would have to be accurately adjusted; and if the amount of the disbursements is reduced the amount of interest would have to be reduced. That interest continued up to the 31st of December, whereas the loss occurred in the latter part of November, so there would be little more than a month's interest to come off in any case. Then the interest would have to be reduced. There are other items, but I think it is sufficient for me to say that substantially there has been no loss, or if there has been a loss the amount recoverable would be such a mere fraction of the amount claimed that it would really make no difference in the result of this case; and to arrive at the matter exactly would involve going into inquiries, and I think further evidence as to many of these items, which would cost a great deal more than the result would justify.

What other points are there left for me to decide? I think there are one or two points which were argued, and upon which I think I ought to express an opinion. In the first place it is necessary to observe this is not a valued policy. In my judgment it is an open policy for £500. I quite appreciate the argument that being a policy on disbursements it may be said to be a policy on money, and that you do not value money. Money does not require valuation, it values itself. I think that the same argument might apply, indeed I have heard it applied, to insurance on freight, which is very analogous for many purposes to this insurance. Having regard to the underwriting customs and rules that have been laid down and to the decisions of the courts, I think it must be treated as an open policy. If it is an open policy, it is an insurance for £500 on such disbursements as the plaintiffs had at risk at the time of the loss; and if the disbursements being necessaries amounted, we will say, to £2,800, then on the policy for £500 the plaintiffs in respect of any loss would only be able to recover that proportion measured by the ratio between £500 and the total interest at peril—namely, the £2,800. That rule seems to be perfectly established in all classes of marine insurance. It is not necessary to cite authority for it, because it is so perfectly clear and so perfectly well understood. It is stated, for instance, merely to take the statement of it in Chalmer and Owen's Digest of the Law of Marine Insurance, which contains a number of propositions purporting to be a complete statement of the law upon marine insurance. It is stated in this way in section 68: "Where there is a loss recoverable under the policy the insurer, or each insurer if there be more than one, is liable for such proportion of the measure of indemnity as the amount of his subscription bears to the value fixed by the policy in the case of a valued policy or to the insurable value in the case of an unvalued policy," and the result is that even if the debt owing for necessaries, that is the plaintiff's claim for necessaries, did by some small sum exceed the £2,800 which they have received, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover in respect of that only a small fraction represented by the proportion of £500 to £2,800, or rather to the amount, whatever the amount of the necessaries was, exceeding the £2,800. I do not think there is any other point with which it is necessary for me to deal. If any question arises as to the details, there may be liberty to apply.

Upon the action generally the judgment will be for the defendant with costs; judgment for the plaintiffs as to the question of insurable interest, and I give liberty to apply in case either of the parties desire that I should express my judgment more fully about any particular item, but I do not think it is necessary for any purpose.

On the 13th of November, after further argument, an order was made that costs were to be costs in the action, and leave was given to the defendants (if necessary) to give notice of cross-appeal as to costs.

GOLDSCHMIDT v. OBERRHEINISCHE METALLWERKE. (a.)

Practice — Receiver — Equitable execution — Judgment debtor a foreigner resident abroad—Debts due to judgment debtor within jurisdiction—Special circumstances —Rules of Supreme Court, ord. 45, r. 1; Appendix B., Form 25—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 8.

The plaintiff recovered judgment for a sum of money against the defendants, who were a foreign company incorporated and resident abroad. The plaintiff applied for a receiving order of the debts due and accruing due to the defendants by customers in England, whose names were set out in an affidavit made by the plaintiff. In that affidavit the plaintiff stated that the defendants had no place of business in this country, and no assets or property here which could be taken by any ordinary process of execution; that the only assets here were the debts due or becoming due to them from their customers in this country; and that he was informed by some of the customers that the defendants had, since the judgment, taken steps to obtain payment of their debts, and that he believed that the defendants intended to collect all the moneys due to them in England and thus to defeat the judgment. The plaintiff stated that he could not apply for a garnishee order to attach the debts due to the defendants, because he did not know which customers owed money nor the amount of their debts, if any.

Held, that there were special circumstances in the case which enabled the court to appoint a receiver.

Appeal from an order of Channell, J., in chambers.

The action was brought for an account of the commission due to the plaintiff as the sole agent of the defendants in Great Britain, and for payment of the amount found due. At the trial of the action judgment was given for the plaintiff for an amount to be ascertained upon an account to be taken by an official referee, and the costs of the action. The taxing-master, before the account was taken, proceeded to tax the costs of the action, and at the request of the plaintiff's solicitor he gave an interim certificate that he had allowed the sum of £250 on account of the plaintiff's costs. The plaintiff thereupon applied at chambers for the appointment of a receiver of the debts and sums of money due and owing and thenceforth becoming due and owing to the defendants by persons and firms who were customers of the defendants in this country. The plaintiff made an affidavit in support of the application, in which he stated that the defendants were a limited liability company incorporated and carrying on business at Mannheim, in Germany, and had no place of business in this country, and no assets or property here, which could be taken in execution by a fi. fa. or any ordinary process of execution; that the only assets which they had in this country were the debts due and owing and which would become due and owing to them by persons and firms to whom they had supplied goods; that an exhibit to the affidavit contained a list of the persons or firms to whom, as he (the plaintiff) was informed and believed, the defendants had supplied goods; that he was informed by several of the above-mentioned persons that the representatives of the defendant company who had attended the trial in London had since the judgment called upon those persons to obtain payment of their accounts, and the plaintiff believed that it was the defendants' intention to collect all the moneys due to them in England, and to change the name of the company, so preventing him from obtaining the fruits of his judgment. Channell, J., refused to appoint a receiver.

The plaintiff appealed, and notice of the appeal was served on the defendants, but they did not appear.

It was stated that though the plaintiff knew who were the customers of the defendants in Great Britain, he did not know which particular customers owed any debts to the defendants, or the amount of their respective debts, if any, and could not therefore make an affidavit necessary to found garnishee proceedings against any particular debtor, as required by ord. 45, r. 1, and Appendix B, Form 25.

A. Powell, K.C., and C. Tindale Davis, for the plaintiff.—Unless the plaintiff can get the appointment of a receiver there will be no remedy available to him. The defendants have no assets in this country on which execution can be levied. The plaintiff cannot obtain an order under ord. 45, r. 1, attaching debts due to the defendants in this country because he cannot in the affidavit in support of that application give the name of any creditor who owes money to the defendants nor the amount of the debt, as required by Form 25 in Appendix B to the rules. Nor can the plaintiff get discovery in aid of execution, under ord. 42, r. 32, by examining the defendants as to whether any and what debts are owing to them, because they are foreigners resident abroad. If a receiver is appointed he can send notice to all the defendants' customers here directing them to pay to him any debts which are owing or accruing. In this way alone can those debts be reached. Special circumstances may render it just or convenient within section 25, sub-section 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873, to appoint a receiver: per Fry, L.J., in Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. v. Parkinson, 37 W. R. 264, 22 Q. B. D. 173, at p. 177. There are special circumstances here, especially in view of the fact that the defendants are endeavouring to collect the debts and so to deprive the plaintiff of the fruits of his judgment. The order for a receiver ought therefore to be made.

The defendants were not represented.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion there are sufficient special circumstances in this case to enable us to make an order for the appointment of a receiver, which a litigant is only entitled to if he can show that the circumstances are such as to make it practically, I will not say impossible, but very difficult, to get the ordinary remedy by execution. In Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. v. Parkinson Fry, L.J., said: "I do not say that there would have been no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver under that section, if there had been special circumstances in the case rendering it just or convenient to make such an order. It may be, for instance, that an order could be made for appointment of a receiver to hold property liable to execution, to prevent someone making away with it, or to get in debts, where under particular circumstances it was a more convenient mode of procuring satisfaction of the judgment than the usual process of attachment." In my judgment this case falls within those words for two reasons. It is a case where the appointment of a receiver is necessary to get in debts, and also to prevent the defendants making away with the debts, because upon the affidavit before us it seems likely that this foreign company will withdraw the moneys owing to them from execution in this country unless a receiver is appointed. There are, therefore, special circumstances here which justify us in making this order.

STIRLING and MOULTON, L.JJ., agreed.

THE COURT made an order appointing the plaintiff receiver of the debts without security until he had collected £300, with liberty to apply for an extension of the order if and when the amount found due to him under the judgment should be increased.

Appeal allowed.

STUCLEY v. KEKEWICH. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Assignment of personalty— Unpaid purchase-money — Vendor's lien—Reversionary interest—Interest—Statute of Limitations.

A vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money extends to personalty and is not limited to real estate, and extends not only to principal money but to interest from the time that the equitable lien comes into existence; and as regards personalty there is no Statute of Limitations which applies to such a claim for interest.

Davies v. Thomas, 49 W. R. 68, [1900] 2 Ch. 462, and Mellersh v. Brown, 38 W. R. 732, 45 Ch. D. 225, followed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Farwell, J.

The plaintiff in the action, Edward Arthur George Stucley, is one of the two surviving sons of the late Sir George Stucley and Lady Elizabeth Stucley, the other being the present baronet, Sir William Lewis Stucley, one of the defendants.

In 1873 the plaintiff, who was then at Cambridge, became involved in financial difficulties, and for the purpose of raising money mortgaged certain reversionary interests under his parents' marriage settlements and his mother's will.

With the view of freeing the plaintiff from these difficulties and disincumbering the reversionary interests and of preventing him at the same time from incumbering them in the future, the father, Sir George Stucley, in January, 1874, paid off the whole of the plaintiff's liabilities, and the said mortgages were transferred to the father, and it was declared that the mortgaged premises should thenceforth stand charged in his favour with the amount paid to liquidate the plaintiff's debts.

At the same time the plaintiff executed a deed, dated the 31st of January, 1874, assigning to his father a reversionary legacy of £5,000, to which he was entitled under his mother's will, subject to his father's prior life interest for the sum of £1,500, as therein expressed, but no sum of money was then or thereafter actually paid to the plaintiff under this deed.

At the date of that deed the father was in the position of sole trustee of the legacy of £5,000, the fund representing it being in his legal control.

Immediately after these transactions the plaintiff went to Australia, where he remained until his father's death in March, 1900.

He now claimed that the deed of assignment of the legacy of £5,000 should be declared void on the ground that it was never intended to be an absolute assignment for valuable consideration, but constituted, with the other documents, a single transaction, the sole object of which, as between his father and himself, was that his debts should be paid, his father taking security for the money to be so expended, and that it should be put out of the plaintiff's power further to incumber his various reversionary interests.

The plaintiff claimed alternatively a declaration that he was entitled to a lien on the fund representing the £5,000 for the £1,500 as unpaid purchase-money.

The defendants, as respectively trustees and executors of Sir George Stucley, and Sir Lewis Stucley, his eldest son, defended the validity of the deed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question was whether the transaction should, in the circumstances, be treated as one of mortgage only.

At the conclusion of the arguments before Farwell, J., on the 4th of November, 1904, his lordship reserved judgment, in order that the parties might, if possible, arrive at some amicable settlement.

This, however, was not done, and on the 14th of February last his lordship delivered his judgment, dismissing the action with costs. In the course of his judgment his lordship found as a fact that the father took the assignment in consideration of the £1,500, though his lordship had no sort of doubt that the sum was not taken as cash and was never intended to be, the very last thing that the parties intended at that time being to trust this young man with 1,500 sovereigns; but by some blunder or oversight they did not treat the assignment, as it was intended to be treated, as a payment of a claim due to the father. Accordingly the principal sum due to the father from the son must be reduced by that £1,500. Further than that his lordship did not see that the plaintiff was entitled to any relief at all, and he therefore dismissed the action with costs.

From that decision the plaintiff appealed.

Jenkins, K.C., and G. Lawrence, for the appellant.

Upjohn, K.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondents.

G. Lawrence replied.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument: Mellersh v. Brown, 38 W. R. 732, 45 Ch. D. 225; Smith v. Hill, 9 Ch. D. 143, 26 W. R. Dig. 146; In re Hancock, 59 L. T. 197; In re Lake's Trusts, 63 L. T. 416, 39 W. R. Dig. 112; London and Midland Bank v. Mitchell, 47 W. R. 602, [1899] 2 Ch. 161; Davies v. Thomas, 49 W. R. 68, [1900] 2 Ch. 462; Levy v. Stogdon, [1898] 1 Ch. 478, 46 W. R Dig. 173; Toft v. Stephenson, 7 Hare 1, 5 De G. M. & G. 735; Alexander v. Newman, 2 C. Cas. 321; and Machreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to the facts, and the claims in the action, and continued: Farwell, J., dismissed the action, being of opinion that the evidence on the trial was not strong enough to override the plain words of the deed of the 31st of January, 1874; but although dismissing the action, he does not expressly deal with the claim for a declaration of a lien in favour of the plaintiff, E. Stucley, as an unpaid vendor. I agree with the findings of fact of the learned judge, and with his conclusion in respect of the other claims. It was not really contended that there ever was a payment in cash by Sir George to his son of £1,500, the receipt of which is acknowledged by the receipt indorsed on the deed. The executors cannot find any trace of this sum ever having been paid either in cash, or in account, or by agreed appropriation. In fact, counsel for the respondents admitted that they could not argue that, as cash, that sum had, in accordance with the receipt indorsed, been paid, and Farwell, J., in his judgment takes the same view. The question therefore arises whether the plaintiff Edward Stucley is not, as unpaid vendor, entitled to the declaration of lien he claims on this reversionary legacy assigned by him to his father, and which continued reversionary down to the death of the father.

Two points were made by counsel for the respondents as against this claim. One was that the doctrine of the lien of an unpaid vendor does not apply to a sale of personal property. The other is that, although the expression is frequently used that equity gives the unpaid vendor "an interest" in the subject-matter of sale to the extent of the purchase-money owing to him, yet that expression is merely figurative; and that the unpaid vendor here is not entitled to all the remedies which accrue to the owner of an express charge, to enforce payment out of the reversionary legacy of the sum charged and interest.

With regard to the first point, Davies v. Thomas is a sufficient authority that the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money extends to personal property. That was a case in which the principle of a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money was held applicable to a share of the proceeds of a sale of leaseholds under a trust for conversion directed by the will of a testator. Lord Alverstone there says: "But, even if the thing sold had been simply a claim to receive a share of the money arising from the realization of the leaseholds, I think the unpaid vendor would have been entitled to a lien upon the share which he sold." And although Rigby, L.J., stated that there was another way in which the case might be disposed of without going carefully into the question of a vendor's lien, he did not dissent from the view taken by Lord Alverstone. The case is, in my opinion, an express authority that a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money extends to personal property. Having regard to the express decision in that case, I do not think it is at all necessary to do more than follow that decision of the Court of Appeal; but an examination of the authorities, to my mind, shows that the principle affirmed in that case—namely, that the lien of an unpaid vendor applies to personal property—is by no means a new principle affirmed there for the first time.

As regards the second point, the case of Rose v. Watson shows that the lien extends not only to principal money, but also to interest from the time that the equitable lien comes into existence; and Munns v. Isle of Wight Railway shows that the right which the owner of an express charge possesses to have the charge raised by a sale or mortgage of the property charged extends to a lien arising under the general principles of equity, such as a vendor's lien.

Now, in the present case, an unpaid vendor is claiming a declaration of lien for the purpose of enforcing the undoubted interest he possesses to have his unpaid purchase-money paid out of the subject-matter of the assignment in question. It was suggested that, although he might have had a lien which he could have enforced—and enforced by obtaining an order of the court for a sale or mortgage—yet this right did not extend to payment of interest for the whole period since the date on which the purchase-money ought to have been paid; and an attempt was made to contend that the right to interest can only be enforced with regard to arrears of interest for which an action can be brought without being obnoxious to the Statute of Limitations. In my judgment the authorities clearly show that this is not so. Of course, in the case of a sale and purchase of land, the express provisions of section 42 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, apply, but that section has no application to a case of personalty; and, in my opinion, the authorities show that, in the case of a lien on personal property which is the subject-matter of a sale, not only does that statute not apply, but there is no Statute of Limitations which has any application at all. The first case in which, in my judgment, the state of the law was recognized is Smith v. Hill, where it was held that a mortgage of a reversionary interest in a sum of money forming part of a testator's residuary personal estate was unaffected by section 42 of the statute, notwithstanding that such sum was invested on mortgage of real estate. But the case which, to my mind, comes nearer to the present is Mellersh v. Brown, a decision of Kay, J., as he then was. The head-note to that case is this: "A mortgage of reversionary interests in personal estate contained a covenant by the mortgagor for payment of the mortgage money with interest at 5 per cent. on a specified day; but there was no provision for payment of any subsequent interest. No interest was ever paid. Fourteen years after the date of the mortgage an action was brought for foreclosure and the usual decree was made. Held, that redemption could only be allowed on payment of interest at 5 per cent. for the whole period of fourteen years." If it is true that the unpaid vendor has this equitable lien on the personal property, the subject-matter of the sale, for his unpaid purchase-money, and if it is true—and I have already said that in my opinion it is true—that the remedy for enforcing that lien is the same as where there is an express charge, then it follows that in such a case there is no Statute of Limitations which will prevent the vendor from recovering that purchase-money, together with the whole of the interest from the time the purchase-money ought to have been paid.

In my judgment the result is that the plaintiff Edward Stucley is entitled to enforce his remedies against the fund representing the reversionary legacy for obtaining the £1,500 unpaid purchase-money, together with interest, from the date of the assignment, which I suppose should be at 4 per cent. It is not necessary that we should work out the figures now; but the result is that, to a substantial extent, the plaintiff has succeeded in this action, though the largest part of the plaintiff's claim is a claim in which he has failed. As to the costs, in the circumstances it seems to me that justice will best be done in this case by directing that there shall be no costs either below or on appeal.

STIRLING, L.J., said that in his opinion there was upon the evidence no real ground for the contention that the deed of the 31st of January, 1874, ought to be treated as a security only. His lordship continued: In the circumstances of this case I have come to this conclusion, that the sum of £1,500, which was expressed to be the consideration money for the purchase of this reversionary interest, was not paid by the father in any shape whatever, and therefore that the plaintiff Edward Stucley is, as regards that sum of purchase-money, in the position of an unpaid vendor of that reversionary legacy. The question, therefore is whether he is entitled, as an unpaid vendor, to a lien upon the legacy.

In the case of Shaw v. Foster the relation subsisting in the eye of a court of equity between a vendor and a purchaser of leasehold property is thus stated by Lord Cairns: "The vendor was a trustee of the property for the purchaser; the purchaser was the real beneficial owner in the eye of a court of equity of the property, subject only to this observation, that the vendor, whom I have called the trustee, was not a mere dormant trustee, he was a trustee having a personal and substantial interest in the property, a right to protect that interest, and an active right to assert that interest if anything should be done in derogation of it. The relation, therefore, of trustee and cestui que trust subsisted, but subsisted subject to the paramount right of the vendor and trustee to protect his own interest as vendor of the property." So that the unpaid vendor is there treated as having an "interest"—"a personal and substantial interest"—in the property he has sold. Again, in Rose v. Watson, which was the converse case—namely, a case in which the purchaser had paid part of his purchase-money under a contract for sale, and then declined to complete—Lord Cranworth says: "There can be no doubt, I apprehend, that when a purchaser has paid his purchase money, though he has got no conveyance, the vendor becomes a trustee for him of the legal estate, and he is, in equity, considered as owner of the estate. When, instead of paying the whole of his purchase-money, he pays a part of it, it would seem to follow, as a necessary corollary, that, to the extent to which he has paid his purchase-money, to that extent the vendor is a trustee for him; in other words, that he acquires a lien, exactly in the same way as if upon the payment of part of the purchase-money the vendor had executed a mortgage to him of the estate to that extent." Those last words seem to be very material to the argument which has been addressed to us.

Now, here a case has occurred which has occurred frequently before—that a vendor has executed a conveyance, upon the face of which it is expressed that he has received the purchase-money, and there is an indorsement on the conveyance accordingly. It has long since been decided by Mackreth v. Symmons that, although the conveyance contains a statement upon the face of it that the purchase-money has been paid, and a receipt for the money is indorsed on the deed, yet, if the money has not in fact been paid, the vendor's lien will prevail, not only against the purchaser, but also against all persons claiming under him with notice that the purchase-money has not been paid. Such, then, is the position defined by the authorities as regards a sale of real estate. In my opinion Davies v. Thomas is an authority that the doctrine is not limited to the case of a sale of real estate, but extends, at any rate in some cases, to a sale of personal estate and to all cases in which the property sold is of such a nature as that the court will decree specific performance of the contract for the purchase of it. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff here is to be treated as having an interest in him in the nature of property in the subject-matter of this sale—namely, in the £5,000 legacy purporting to be assigned by this deed of assignment. If, then, he has an interest in the nature of property, he is entitled to enforce that interest. It makes, in my opinion, no difference whether the interest arises from a lien given him by a court of equity or whether it arises from an express charge or from an express assignment by way of mortgage. As Lord Cranworth said in Rose v. Watson, the right or interest acquired under the lien is the same as if a mortgage had been executed for the amount unpaid. So it appears to me. The plaintiff, the unpaid vendor here, is in the same position as if, immediately after the transaction in which purchase-money was not paid, his father had executed to him a charge upon this equitable reversion for the sum unpaid.

That being so, there is no Statute of Limitations which applies to the case of a person coming to recover an interest in personal property such as the fund here, the reversion in which has now fallen in. In my opinion, the observations of Kay, J., in In re Hancock, Hancock v. Berrey, apply to the present case. The learned judge there pointed out that in the case before him, which was an assignment of a reversionary interest by way of mortgage, the Statute of Limitations would not apply; and he proceeds as follows—and this meets a considerable part of the argument that has been addressed to us: "But then it is said—or at least this is the only way in which the argument could possibly be put, as it seems to me—the debt to secure which this assignment was made is barred, or rather the right to sue to recover the debt is barred; and that therefore the mortgagor has some right to recover back the share he has assigned. Is that so? For example, let us try it by the most concrete instance one can put. Suppose the assignee of this reversionary interest in personal property had commenced an action against the trustees claiming to have the share handed over to him. Of course he need not make the assignor a party. He had nothing to do but prove his assignment, and the trustees would have had no answer whatever; they must have handed it over. Then could the mortgagor have maintained successfully a suit to prevent their handing it over? On what ground? Suppose he had brought an action saying, 'True, I did assign this; true, the reversion fell in so lately as October, 1887; but I seek to restrain the trustees from handing over that reversion to my assignee, because I say that the debt to secure which I made the assignment is barred.' What Statute of Limitations or any other statute would enable him to maintain an action like that? There is no Statute of Limitations which destroys the debt. The Statute of Limitations only destroys the remedy of the creditor. The creditor could not sue the mortgagor upon the covenant, because then he would be met by the Statute of Limitations which bars the action. The mortgagee says, 'I do not want to sue anybody; all I want is to have this mortgage property, which is mine, handed over to me.' How it can be kept from him I cannot conceive." All that applies, with very slight variations, to the present case. The position of the plaintiff's father was that of sole trustee and executor of the will under which the plaintiff claims, and in that capacity he had the fund under his control. He, of course, had notice of the assignment to him and of the fact that he had failed to pay the purchase-money. That brings the case almost directly within Davies v. Thomas. In that case Rigby, L.J., after pointing out that the trustees of the will at the time of the mortgage (which was of a reversionary share of the proceeds of leaseholds directed to be sold) held the property upon certain trusts, and that at the time of the sale of the mortgagor's interest the trustees held the property in the condition of leaseholds, and that subsequently to the assignment to the purchaser they sold the leaseholds, and then held the proceeds in trust for the persons entitled to it, proceeded as follows: "What was the position of the trustees? David Lewis, the purchaser, was throughout the solicitor who acted for the trustees as well as the solicitor for the plaintiff, who was the vendor. . . . It would, in my opinion, be impossible for the trustees to say that they had not in equity constructive notice of the purchase by their solicitor of the mortgaged property, and of the fact that he had not paid the whole of the purchase-money. It was their duty to administer the trust fund produced by the sale of the leasehold property—a fund which was in their hands subject to the trusts of the will. Could they in favour of their solicitor ignore the rights of the vendor and say that they were not concerned with him, but were concerned only with their own solicitor who had purchased the mortgaged share from him? If a court of equity had been administering the fund, it would have inquired into the facts, and finding that the purchaser had not paid the purchase-money, it would have held that it was its first duty to see that the mortgagee, and through him the mortgagor, had been satisfied before handing over the purchased share to the purchaser. The court would have had no difficulty in doing that. And, in my opinion, the trustees are bound to do that which the court would have done had it been administering the fund." So here, the fund was under the legal control of the father in his capacity of trustee and executor. If the court had been administering the fund, and had found that the trustee of this fund had, on purchasing the reversionary interest in it, failed to pay his purchase-money, the court would have had no difficulty in enforcing the right of the unpaid vendor.

I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff has a lien for the unpaid sum of £1,500 entitling him to payment of that sum, together with interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the purchase. This is in accordance with Smith v. Hill and Mellersh v. Brown.

It appears that the legacy in question formed a moiety of a sum of £10,000 originally secured by a Mersey and Irwell Navigation bond. According to the evidence of the solicitor to the defendants, that bond has been sold, and the money has been invested on other security. The fund having been under the control of Sir George Stucley, not only the bond itself, but also the security substituted for it, became liable to the plaintiff's lien.

As to the defendants' contention that the plaintiff's claim is too late, in my opinion, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff's demand is not a stale one, and he is not on that ground deprived of the right he now seeks to enforce. It appears to me, therefore, that on this part of the case the plaintiff succeeds.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. I agree entirely with all that Farwell, J., said upon that part of the case to which his decision was directed. With regard to the point as to the right of the plaintiff to a lien for his unpaid purchase-money, but for the elaborate argument we have heard upon that part of the case I should have thought it was scarcely arguable. To my mind it is impossible to doubt that this assignment must be treated as what it purports to be—that is, as an assignment by way of absolute sale. I cannot rely upon parol evidence of a transaction which happened thirty years ago. I think we are bound to take all the documents relating to that transaction as they stand; and one of those documents is an assignment upon the purchase by the father from the son of the latter's reversionary legacy of £5,000 in consideration of the sum of £1,500. The part of that transaction which it is now important to consider is that the £1,500 purchase-money was never paid by the father to the son. That being so, it is said that the vendor has, according to well-settled principles, a lien upon the property which he sold for the purchase-money which has never been paid. It is quite settled that a vendor's lien is not a mere personal equity, and that it really creates a charge upon and an interest in the property sold, in the same manner as if that charge had been created by writing. One cannot illustrate that better than by reference to the old law of mortmain, under which the purchase-money for land contracted to be sold by a testator, but in respect of which he had the usual vendor's lien at his death, was not available for satisfying charitable legacies. The reason was that that lien was an "interest in land," for a vendor's lien on the sale of land is recoverable by statute as being an incumbrance on the land.

It has been argued that a vendor's lien is limited to land and does not extend to personal estate. There is the distinct authority of the Court of Appeal in Davies v. Thomas to the contrary; and, that being so, I do not think it necessary to go back to the earlier authorities, or to discuss the principles upon which those authorities were decided. I see no reason in principle why the doctrine should not apply to every case of personal property in which the courts of equity assume jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the sale. Then, if there is in this present case the right to a vendor's lien, as I am of opinion that there is, over this personal estate which was sold, there is no Statute of Limitations which applies, and there is no answer to the claim for interest from the date at which the right to interest arose—that is, from the date of the deed.

Again, the purchaser, Sir George Stucley, was in the position of sole trustee of the fund, the reversionary interest in which was the subject-matter of the sale and purchase. He was also entitled to the income of the fund during his life, and by reason of his purchase he became entitled to the reversion in that fund, but subject to the vendor's lien. His representatives cannot, merely because the fund is now in possession and no longer reversionary, say that that lien is destroyed. In my opinion, that lien is imposed upon the fund which was in the father's hands, and is now in the hands of his representatives. Accordingly there must be an order for payment to the plaintiff of the £1,500 out of the fund, together with interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the purchase, with liberty to apply.

Appeal allowed.

Bankruptcy—Banker—Advance to merchants—Letters of lien on goods bought with advance—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 53)—Bills of Sale Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 35)—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

Where bankers advanced money to traders for the purpose of paying for goods, and the traders gave the bankers letters of lien thereon, it was held, on the bankruptcy of the traders, that the letters were "documents used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods," and so, being within the exceptions of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, need not be registered under the Bills of Sale Acts. It was also held that the Bills of Sale Acts, 1890 and 1891, had no bearing on the case. It was further held that goods covered by the letters of lien and sent by the traders to certain manufacturers before sale by the traders, and which were claimed by the bankers before the bankruptcy, were not "at the commencement of the bankruptcy in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupts" as "the reputed owners thereof" within section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Bigham, J., on a special case stated in bankruptcy.

The facts showed that the debtors were merchants whose course of business was to purchase goods in Manchester for shipment to and sale in Calcutta. The money which paid for the goods was advanced to them by a bank on the security of a letter of lien accompanied by the receipts of a bleaching firm who were to prepare the goods for shipment. The letter was to the following effect: "As security for the advance we hold on your account and under lien to you the undermentioned goods in the hands of ——. . . . These goods when ready will be shipped to Calcutta, and the bills of lading duly indorsed will be handed to you. . . ."

On the 14th of July, 1903, the bank became aware that the borrowers were in difficulties, and thereupon wrote to the bleachers whose receipts were held by them, requesting them to hold the goods specified in the receipts to their order, and they also wrote to the borrowers notifying them of their action. Previously to this date no notice of the letter of lien had been given to the bleachers.

On the 24th of July, 1903, the borrowers sent out letters to their creditors stating their insolvency, and they were adjudicated bankrupt on the 15th of August, 1903.

The questions submitted for the opinion of Bigham, J., were: (1) Whether such of the goods described in the letters of lien as were in the hands of the bleachers on the 24th of July, 1903, were at that time subject to any lien by the bank. (2) Whether the bank on the 24th of July, 1903, was entitled to any lien on any of the goods mentioned in the letters of lien which were not in the bleachers' hands on that date but could be traced as being then in the hands of the borrowers at their warehouses or at the docks. (3) Whether the bank was, on the 24th of July, 1903, entitled to any lien on any of the goods which on that date or later were in the hands of the bleachers or of the borrowers or at the docks, and which were claimed by the bank.

It was held by Bigham, J., that the letters of lien were not bills of sale within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, but were within the exceptions of section 4 thereof, and that therefore they did not require registration, and that the goods were not in possession, order, or disposition of the borrowers with the bank's consent, and he accordingly decided the foregoing questions in the bank's favour.

The trustee in bankruptcy appealed.

They contended that the letters of lien were bills of sale and should have been registered; that they were not within the exceptions of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and that the goods were within the possession, order, or disposition of the borrowers with the consent of the bank within section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

They argued that the transaction was one in the ordinary course of business, and therefore within the exceptions of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

Aug. 11.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., upon a special case, and I think that judgment should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. From the statement in the special case with reference to the practice of Hamilton, Young, & Co. and the bank with respect to the letters of lien, it appears that the whole conduct of the business of preparation and shipping was left in the hands of Hamilton, Young, & Co., and that there was nothing in the shipping documents identifying the goods mentioned in the bleachers' receipts accompanying the letters of lien. The result of the practice detailed in the special case seems to be that in respect of the matter of preparation and shipment of the goods, the management and direction of these goods for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, and shipping, until the bills of lading were handed over, rested entirely with Hamilton, Young, & Co.; and that no property other than by way of lien or charge would pass to the bank until the bills of lading were handed over, but that the bank had in equity a right to an injunction restraining Hamilton, Young, & Co. from doing anything inconsistent with their holding the goods on account of the bank and under lien to the bank. The bank had also such rights as the possession of the bleachers' receipts might give them, but there is nothing in the case to show that the bleachers would have given up the goods to the bank on the production of the receipts. On the 24th of July, 1903, just before the failure of Hamilton, Young, & Co., the goods to which the National Bank now asserts a claim may be, as I understand the case, divided into three categories—(1) goods the subject of letters of lien which were lying at the bleachers, or at the warehouse of Hamilton, Young, & Co.; (2) goods the subject of letters of lien which were not in the hands of the bleachers, but could be traced as being then in the hands of Hamilton, Young, & Co. at their warehouse, or were at the dyers or packers or the docks; (3) goods not the subject of letters of lien which on the 24th of July were in the hands of the bleachers or of Hamilton, Young, & Co., or at the packers or the docks, and which are claimed by the bank. All the three questions in the special case should be answered in favour of the bank. I am of opinion that such of the goods described in the letters of lien as on the 24th of July, 1903, were in the hands of the bleachers were subject to a lien or charge in favour of the bank. In the same manner I think that the bank was entitled to a lien or charge on the goods mentioned in the letters of lien, which on that date could be traced as in the hands of Hamilton, Young, & Co. at their warehouses, or were at the dyers or packers or the docks. I think that questions 1 and 2 should be answered in favour of the bank, because I think that the letters of lien, with the accompanying receipts, are not bills of sale because they come within the exception in section 4 of the Act of 1878, being documents "used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods." That such documents as the letters of lien, with the accompanying receipts of those in actual possession, are documents used in the ordinary course of business I have no doubt; but the question is whether such documents "are used as proof of the possession or control of goods" within the meaning of the exception. I think, however, that these documents were in the ordinary course of business used as proof of possession or control of these goods. The documents are records of a bargain creating a lien or charge in favour of the bank, and declaring that Hamilton, Young, & Co. hold the goods specified in the respective letters on account of the bank and under lien in the hands of the persons therein named, and as such would be bills of sale but for the fact that they fall within the exception. But I think they do fall within the exception, and I think that the documents are not the less intended as proof of control, within the meaning of the exception, because the goods thus held by Hamilton, Young, & Co., or their bailees, the bleachers, packers, and others, were to be dealt with by Hamilton, Young, & Co. at their discretion in the preparation for shipment to the East. The control of the bank, in my opinion, continued all along. The bank would, on the strength of these documents, at any time have been entitled to an injunction restraining Hamilton, Young, & Co., if they had attempted to take the goods out of the control of the bank, by dealing with them for a purpose other than that of preparation for shipment, and shipment to the East. I do not think it makes any difference on this point whether the goods happened to be held by Hamilton, Young, & Co., on account of the bank and under lien to the bank in the warehouse of Hamilton, Young, & Co., or in the hands of the bleachers and others who had given receipts to Hamilton, Young, & Co. Then comes the third question, whether the bank on the 24th of July, 1903, were entitled to any other goods which at the said date were in the hands of bleachers, packers, or others, or of Messrs. Hamilton, Young, & Co.—i.e., goods other than those mentioned in letters of lien with receipts attached. I think that, except in one case, the bank is entitled to these goods, because the title of the bank does not arise under a document void as a bill of sale, and the bleachers to whom notice was sent, in all cases except one, attorned to the bank before the act of bankruptcy of Hamilton, Young, & Co. Our attention has been called by Stirling, L.J., to the Bills of Sale Acts of 1890 and 1891. Our attention was not called to those statutes during the argument. But having regard to their provisions I wish to say something concerning them. In section 4 of the Act of 1878, after the definition of a bill of sale there are certain exceptions, which, I may observe, equally existed in the prior Bills of Sale Act of 1854. Now, amongst those exceptions are these: "Transfers of goods in the ordinary course of business of any trade or calling, bills of sale of goods in foreign parts or at sea." Now, without going in detail into the very few and very short provisions in these two statutes of 1890 and 1891, it may be said generally that the effect of these two statutes was to extend to instruments dealing with imported goods prior to their deposit in a warehouse, factory, or store, with a view to being reshipped for export or delivery to a purchaser not being the person giving or executing the instrument, the exception which already existed in the Act of 1878, "bills of sale of goods in foreign parts or at sea." In the Act of 1854 there were no provisions such as exist in section 4 of the Act of 1878, which, to put it shortly, included in bills of sale documents in respect of which an equitable charge had been given. Under that Act of Parliament the case of Ex parte North-Western Bank, In re Slee was decided, and in that case it was held that under the Act of 1854 a letter of hypothecation, by which a factor and warehouse keeper pledged certain wools in his possession to his bankers to secure an advance, constituted a good equitable charge which did not require registration, the advance and charge having been made in the ordinary course of business. Now, that decision was based upon these documents not being within the definition of a bill of sale at the commencement of the section. Then followed the alteration contained in the Act of 1878, and that retained the exceptions contained in the Act of 1854. Under those circumstances the real question in this case is, What was the effect of the extension by the Act of 1878 of the definition of a bill of sale so as to make it cover an equitable charge. Now, in my judgment one thing at all events is perfectly plain, that, whatever might be the effect of the extension of that definition, it is quite clear that the exception applied as much to the extended definition as it did to the definition as it existed in the Act of 1854. The case of Ex parte North-Western Bank, In re Slee, was dealt with in an Irish case.

Merchant Banking Co. of London v. Spotten in 1877, also before the Act of 1878. But if the judgments in those two cases are looked at, and the expressions of the judges considered, although the documents in question were held not to be bills of sale because they did not fall within the definition, it is plain from the judgments that both courts thought that the scope of the Act of 1854 was not to avoid, as bills of sale, documents used in the ordinary course of business by merchants for the purpose of proof of possession or control of goods. Under those circumstances we have to consider here whether these documents were intended to be proof of possession and control of the goods in question. Now, Bigham, J., has arrived at the conclusion, as appears from his judgment, that these documents described in the letters of lien were intended both as proof of possession and also as proof of control. I am not saying that this is not so, but I prefer to take the simpler case of whether they were used as proof of possession of the goods. I cannot doubt myself that business people in Manchester would all so regard them; but still that will not do, unless according to a proper construction of the words these documents, with the surrounding circumstances, were intended as "proof of possession or control" within the meaning of the exception in the Act of 1878. Now, for one moment I will deal with the case apart from the statements in the special case as to what was the practice of the bank and Hamilton, Young, & Co. with reference to the preparation of the goods by dyeing, bleaching, and otherwise making preparation for shipment; and if one takes the case apart from that practice I am of opinion that these documents were intended as proof of possession or control. Then does it make any difference that the bank allowed Messrs. Hamilton, Young, & Co. to exercise their discretion as to those steps which necessarily had to be taken before the goods could be made ripe for realization by them; goods, it must be remembered, which by the very terms of the letters of lien remained, from the moment of the giving of those letters, goods held by Hamilton, Young, & Co. on behalf of the bank? In my judgment the fact that the bank had this lien, and had these goods held for them by Hamilton, Young, & Co., does not prevent the giving of the letters of lien, coupled with the receipts, being, according to the ordinary practice of bankers, proof of possession or control by these people. Then with regard to the two statutes to which I have referred I see no reason why they in any way interfere with the conclusion which I have already arrived at; and, as I agree with Bigham, J., in his view as to the question of order and disposition, I think that the judgment of Bigham, J., should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—On the first two questions raised by the special case, which relate to goods comprised in letters of lien, I think it right to state that I doubt whether the letters of lien are either "transfers of goods in the ordinary course of business of a trade or calling" or "documents used in the ordinary course of busines as proof of the possession or control of goods" within the meaning of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. That doubt is independent of the two statutes of 1890 and 1891, though it is not lessened by the terms of those statutes. Nevertheless, as my brethren agree in the view taken by Bigham, J., to whose opinion on mercantile documents of such a character as this case deals with, I attach very great weight, I think I ought not to differ from them. I should add that my doubt does not extend to the third question. I think that the attornment, before the commencement of the bankruptcy, of the bleachers and other persons with regard to the goods to which that question relates, created a change in the legal possession of the goods which cannot be referred to any document invalid as a bill of sale, for the simple reason that there is no letter of lien which refers to any of those goods. I also think that, even if there had been a letter of lien in the same terms as those which relate to the other goods, I should have had difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the dealing just before the commencement of the bankruptcy was a performance of, or to be referred to, an agreement contained in such letter. However, there is in fact no such letter, and the question does not arise. Whether the latter transaction is bad as a fraudulent preference I think it is not open to us to consider, because no such question is raised by the special case.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed, and for the reasons assigned by Vaughan Williams, L.J. The general policy of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, was not to interfere with ordinary business transactions. In so far as they might be hit by the general words in the definition of a "bill of sale," they are taken out by the express exception. I think the letter of lien, coupled with the deposit of the bleachers' receipt, was a "document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the control of goods" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1878. It enabled the bank to prevent the bankrupts by injunction from dealing with the goods in any manner inconsistent with the arrangement contemplated by the parties, an arrangement which would result in the handing over of bills of lading when the goods were ready for shipment to Calcutta. It thus gave the bank a "control" of the goods. This disposes of the first and second questions. As to the third question, I think the attornment of the bleachers gets rid of all difficulty. Mr. Hansell sought to argue that the title of the bank could be impeached on the ground of fraudulent preference. But no such question can arise on this special case. And nothing decided by us on this appeal will in any way preclude the raising of the issue of fraudulent preference in proceedings properly directed to that issue.

MACMILLAN & CO. (LIMITED) AND SMITH, ELDER, & CO. v. DENT & CO. (a.)

Copyright—Letters—Publication after death of author—Restraint of publication—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), s. 3.

Under section 3 of the Copyright Act, 1842, the copyright in a book published after the death of the author belongs to the proprietor of the author's manuscript from which such book shall be first published.

Held, that the proprietor of the author's manuscript means the proprietor of the piece of paper that is written upon.

descendant of the person to whom the letters were sent. S. E. & Co. published these letters in a book, and also gave an exclusive licence to M. & Co. to publish them. Subsequently J. M. D. & Co. purchased the actual letters from S. and published them also.

Held, that S. E. & Co. had acquired the copyright in the letters, as they were the assignees of S., who had the right to publish them under section 3 of the Copyright Act, 1842; that S. E. & Co. were the proprietors of the author's manuscript from which their book was first published, and that J. M. D. & Co. accordingly had no right to publish the letters.

Witness action.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing and selling any book which contained sixteen letters written by Charles Lamb to Robert Lloyd between the years 1798-1810, and so infringing the copyright of the plaintiffs Smith, Elder, & Co.

These letters were discovered in an old box, and were in the possession of a Mr. and Mrs. Steed, Mrs. Steed being a descendant of a member of the Lloyd family. Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co., on the 5th of March, 1895, entered into an agreement with Mr. and Mrs. Steed by which they acquired the exclusive right to publish these sixteen letters for £250, and accordingly they had the loan of the letters for that purpose. In 1898 Smith, Elder, & Co. published these sixteen letters in a book called Charles Lamb and the Lloyds, and they were registered as the proprietors of the copyright in these letters.

In 1899, the plaintiffs Macmillan & Co. (Limited), being about to publish a new edition of Canon Ainger's Charles Lamb, obtained from Smith, Elder, & Co. a licence to publish these letters in consideration for £25. At the same time Smith, Elder, & Co. agreed not to give to any other publisher the right to publish these letters.

In 1902 the defendants J. M. Dent & Co. applied to Smith, Elder, & Co. for permission to publish these letters, which permission Smith, Elder, & Co. refused to grant, as they had already granted an exclusive licence to Macmillan & Co.

In 1903 J. M. Dent & Co. having heard of the existence of some original letters of Charles Lamb, entered into negotiation for the purchase of them, when it appeared that they were the letters in question. Dent thereupon purchased from Mr. and Mrs. Steed the sixteen letters, together with some other letters, for £250. Dent was informed by the Steeds of the assignment of the copyright in them to Smith, Elder, & Co., and the receipt given by Mr. Steed was expressed to be given for the letters and also for any rights which he might still have therein.

At the end of 1903 J. M. Dent & Co. published an edition of Charles Lamb's letters which contained these sixteen letters. Macmillan & Co. and Smith, Elder, & Co. thereupon commenced the present proceedings, in which Smith, Elder, & Co. claimed to be the registered proprietors of the copyright in these sixteen letters, and they, and Macmillan & Co. as their licensees, asked for an injunction to restrain the defendants J. M. Dent & Co. from printing, publishing, and selling any book which infringed their rights in the letters in question.

Charles Lamb by his will dated the 9th of October, 1830, devised and bequeathed all his property of every kind whatsoever to Thomas Moor Talfourd, of the Middle Temple, and Charles Ryle, of East India House, in trust to be disposed of in the purchase of an annuity or annuities, or in any manner in their discretion, for the sole benefit and use of his sister Mary Lamb, provided that if from her advanced age or otherwise his trustees should not think fit to dispose of the whole of the property, then after payment of her debts and funeral expenses the trustees should have power to dispose of the residue in any manner she should, if of sound mind, appoint, and in default of appointment to pay the residue to Emma Isola if living, and if dead then to her lawful children.

Charles Lamb died on the 27th of December, 1834, and his will was proved by both of the executors; and Mary Lamb died in 1847 without having exercised the power of appointment.

Emma Isola married Edward Moxon and died intestate on the 2nd of February, 1891, and letters of administration were granted to her son, A. H. Moxon.

On the 31st of January, 1905, A. H. Moxon, at the instigation of the defendants, J. M Dent & Co., took out letters of administration cum testamento annexo de bonis non to the estate of Charles Lamb, and on the 7th of February he assigned all his rights, whatever they were, in the sixteen letters in question to the defendants, J. M. Dent & Co.

The grant of the letters of administration to the estate of Charles Lamb and the assignment by Moxon to J. M. Dent & Co. were subsequent to the commencement of the proceedings in the present action.

The defendants, J. M. Dent & Co., by their defence and notice of objection, denied that the plaintiffs Smith, Elder, & Co. were the proprietors of the copyright in the sixteen letters in question; they alleged that there was no subsisting copyright in the said letters, or that if such copyright was subsisting the proprietor thereof was the legal personal representative of the late Charles Lamb, the writer of the said letters, or the defendants as his assigns.

Section 3 of the Copyright Act, 1842, provides that the copyright in every book which shall after the passing of this Act be published in the lifetime of its author shall endure for the natural life of such author, and for the further term of seven years commencing at the time of his death, and shall be the property of such author and his assigns; provided always that if the said term of seven years shall expire before the end of forty-two years from the first publication of such book the copyright shall in that case endure for such period of forty-two years; and the copyright in every book which shall be published after the death of its author shall endure for the term of forty-two years from the first publication thereof, and shall be the property of the proprietor of the author's manuscript from which such book shall be first published or his assigns.

Scrutton, K.C., and R. A. Wright, for the plaintiffs, Macmillan & Co. (Limited) and Smith, Elder, & Co.—The copyright in these letters belonged to Smith, Elder, & Co. for forty-two years from the time when they were first published. The Copyright Act, 1842, s. 3, made an alteration in the law. Prior to that Act the copyright belonged to the author and his assigns after publication, whether the publication took place during the lifetime of the author or after his death. But the Legislature made a distinction between the two cases and said that if publication took place in the lifetime of the author the copyright belonged to the author and his assigns, but that if publication took place after the death of the author the copyright should belong to a different person, viz., the proprietor of the author's manuscript from which such book was published. In section 11 of the International Copyright Act, 1886, the expression "author" was defined in the case of a posthumous work as meaning "the proprietor of the manuscript of such work and any person claiming through him." Further, in section 16 of the Copyright Act, 1842, a distinction was drawn right through the section between the "author" and the "first publisher" of a book. The case turned upon the meaning of the phrase "proprietor of the author's manuscript" in section 3 of the Act. In Oliver v. Oliver, 10 W. R. 18, 11 C. B. N. S. 139, it was held that the receiver of a letter who had handed it back to the sender had sufficient property in the paper upon which it was written to entitle him to maintain an action for detinue against the sender for it. It was true that the author of the letter had the personal right to stop any publication of the letters during his lifetime, but notwithstanding that right and subject to it the receiver of the letter was the proprietor of the manuscript of the letter. There could not be a joint property in both the author and the receiver in the manuscript, otherwise the receiver would not have the right, which he had, to destroy the letters. If "proprietor of the author's manuscript" meant the proprietor of the right of publishing there would have been no necessity for the second part of section 3 of the Act, which was inserted to show that after the author's death the person entitled to the copyright was the owner of the actual piece of paper upon which the letter or book was written, and it was to be the "author's manuscript" to prevent any possibility of several copies being in existence of the same work, the owners of which might claim the right. By this means a lengthy inquiry as to who was the legal personal representative of the deceased author in order to ascertain who had the right to publish was obviated. It was decided in Maclean v. Watson, 20 Sc. Ses. Ca., 2nd ser., 1154, that the owner of an unpublished manuscript, although not the author of it, acquired copyright in it by first publishing it: see also Walter v. Lane, 48 W. R. 218, [1899] 2 Ch., at p. 770, 49 W. R. 95, [1900] A. C., at p. 548. In Hopkinson v. Lord Burghley, 15 W. R. 543, 2 Ch. App. 447, where the question was whether the defendant could refuse to produce letters from a stranger, Turner, L.J., put it, "The writer of a letter trusts the receiver with the letter, and he must take the consequences of its being in his possession. . . . If the sender of a letter wishes to restrain the receiver from showing it to any other person he must file a bill for that purpose. Unless that is done the property is in the receiver." [KEKEWICH, J.—Lord Cairns puts it much more accurately.] Smith, Elder, & Co. having bought the right of publishing from the owner of the manuscript of the letters, they have acquired the copyright in the letters.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Sebastian, for the defendants, J. M. Dent & Co.—The right of publishing these letters remained in the personal representative of Charles Lamb; it ought to have passed under the residuary bequest to Emma Isola, but it never did pass, and therefore the plaintiffs could not have any rights through the Steeds. [KEKEWICH, J.—Must I not assume at this distance of time that the executors of Lamb assented to the bequest, and that therefore this right did pass in the residuary bequest, and that the letters must be held to have passed into the rightful possession of the Steeds.] What the defendant acquired from the Steeds was only the actual pieces of paper, as the copyright remained in the personal representative. The writer of a letter retained such a right in it that he could prevent it being printed and published, and it was a well-settled principle of law that the manuscript remained the property of the writer and not of the receiver. In Pope v. Curl, 2 Atk. 342, Lord Hardwicke said that the receiver had only a special property possibly in the paper, but that that did not give a licence to any person whatsoever to publish letters to the world, for at most the receiver had only a joint property with the receiver. In Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 402, Lord Eldon held that the jurisdiction to restrain the right of publication was founded in a right of property in the writer. He laid down the proposition that by sending the letter the writer had given for the purpose of reading, and in some cases of keeping it, a property to the person to whom it was addressed, yet that the gift was so restrained that ultrà the purposes for which the letter was sent the property was in the sender; and in Thompson v. Stanhope, Amb. 737, Lord Apsley, L.C., held that the widow of Lord Chesterfield's son had no right to print the letters which Lord Chesterfield wrote to his son without the consent of Lord Chesterfield or his executors: see also Duke of Queensberry v. Shebbeare, 2 Eden. 329. It has been recognized that there was a right of property in the sender of letters since the time of Lord Hardwicke. In Oliver v. Oliver the right of property recognized in the receiver was only a limited one, so that he could recover the actual paper. In Earl Lytton v. Devey, 54 L. J. Ch. 293, 33 W. R. Dig. 106, Bacon, V.C., laid down that the property in the letters remained in the person to whom they were sent. The right to retain them remained in the person to whom they were sent; but the sender of the letters had still that kind of interest if not property in the letters that he had a right to restrain any use being made of the communication which he had made in the letters so sent by him. North, J., in Labouchere v. Hess, 77 L. T. 559, 46 W. R. Dig. 68, expressed a doubt as to the person in whom the property in the paper was vested. [KEKEWICH, J.—Could the writer of the letter publish it against the wish of the receiver?] Upon principle he could. It was within the right of the author to say whether there should be publication or not. In Caird v. Sime, 36 W. R. 199, 12 App. Cas. 326, where the question arose as to the publication of oral lectures without the consent of the lecturer, Lord Halsbury, L.C., laid stress upon the fact that an author had a proprietary right in his unpublished literary productions. It was to this right that the section referred and not to the ownership of the piece of paper. The paper itself had no value in itself, only the literary composition that was upon it had any value, and the whole point in the case was in whom was the proprietary right in the literary composition of these letters. All the judges when they spoke of the property being in the sender were referring to the proprietorship in the literary composition. The statute applied equally to letters as to other compositions. "Proprietor of the author's manuscript from which the book was first published" must mean more than the proprietor of the paper. It must refer to the proprietor of the composition in whom the right of publishing was vested, and that upon the cases must be some one other than the receiver. In all the meanings of "manuscript" which were given in the dictionaries the emphasis was laid on that which was written on the paper rather than on the paper itself. The first part of the section gave the copyright to the author in respect of a work published in his lifetime. The object of the second part of the section was to protect the proprietary right in the literary composition after the death of the author, and there was no reason why such right should not go to the personal representative of the author. It was quite immaterial, so far as the section was concerned, by whom the publication in fact was made. The unlawful publication of letters could not give any right at all as against those persons who had the right. The receiver of a letter could not publish it without the consent of the writer, and after his death without the consent of his personal representative, and the statute had not made any difference to the common law in this respect. The Steeds, although they possessed the letters, in so far as they were the owners of the pieces of paper, had not the right to publish them, because they were not the proprietors of the author's manuscript. The plaintiffs at the time they published the letters were not the proprietors of the pieces of paper, and therefore the Act could not have been complied with.

Scrutton, K.C., in reply.—The question was not, who had the common law right, but to whom the Legislature has given the right, and the words of the section could have but one meaning—directly a work was published the common law right was gone. It was clear from the definition given to "assigns" in section 2 that the assignment might be both before and also after publication. What could be assigned, therefore, was the interest to be derived from the publication which might have already taken place. The Legislature, in deciding that the copyright in a book published after the death of the author should be the property of the proprietor of the author's manuscript from which such book should first be published, must have meant the physical thing, and could not have referred merely to the right. Legislature intended to give the copyright to a different person under the second part of the section from the person who took under the first part. The defendants' contention would give the right to the same person.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is an extremely difficult question, and perhaps a satisfactory solution of it can only be obtained by a decision of the ultimate Court of Appeal, but having carefully considered it and looked at the cases to which I was referred, I see no reason for thinking that my opinion would be any better for being postponed. I therefore purpose to say what conclusion I have arrived at, in the hope that my remarks may assist the parties in obtaining elsewhere a complete solution of the question which is raised.

The plaintiffs claim the right of publication in certain letters of Charles Lamb which are many years old, and they say that they have purchased that right from a gentleman and lady named Steed, who were in possession of the letters up to some ten years ago. It seems to me that as there is no suggestion that those persons obtained those letters by theft or otherwise improperly, I must assume at this distance of time from the date of the writing of the letters that they were in rightful possession of the letters. What that implies is really the question to be decided, but I begin with tracing the letters to rightful possession. There is no doubt that the Steeds assigned their rights, whatever those rights were, as regards the publication, to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have vested in them any right of publication which Mr. and Mrs. Steed could pass. If they are entitled to publication—if they have a right of publication—then, of course, they are entitled to restrain every person who is not entitled to publish, and that raises the question whether the defendants are entitled to publish. The defendants claim also through the Steeds, and in addition through the administrator of Charles Lamb. Now as regards their title through the Steeds it is obviously a defective one, because the Steeds had already assigned everything that they could assign to the plaintiffs, and nothing was left for them to assign to the defendants, and they were perfectly conscious of that, since they only purported to confer on the defendants such rights, if any, as remained in them.

As regards their other title I confess I do not understand how the administrator of Charles Lamb, at the present day, can have any property whatsoever in these letters of any kind or description, even on the assumption that a right of property did vest in Charles Lamb at the date of his death and could pass by his will. It is not competent for me to decide on the present occasion what the meaning of Charles Lamb's will is, or whether such property as he had in the letters passed by that will. But whatever property passed it cannot, it seems to me, now be vested in the defendants, as it could not have vested in the administrator of Charles Lamb when these letters of administration were granted only the other day. But I thought it right to say that, because it may be that a question of that kind will arise.

The defendants decline to prove their title. They say: "All we have to do is to show that the plaintiffs have no title, and if we satisfy the court that the plaintiffs have no title, then, of course, they cannot restrain us. It matters not to us or the court whether we have a title or not." That is a perfectly proper view for the defendants to take, if they are so advised to take it. It is the view they do take, and therefore I will not pursue that subject any further. All I have to consider is the bare question, not whether the right publication is vested in the plaintiffs as between them and the defendants, but whether it is vested in the plaintiffs abstractedly, so that they have a good title. That question depends entirely on the proper construction to be placed on a few lines, indeed a few words, in the third section of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45). It is not easy to understand, but in order to understand it one must, of course, have in one's mind, and present before one's eye, the common law as it stood at the date of the Act of Parliament.

Now about the common law; up to a certain point there is no doubt whatever on that. I have been referred to a large number of cases beginning with, I believe, the first—it is always quoted as the first—Pope v. Curl, 2 Atk. 342, decided by Lord Hardwicke. Probably one or two would have sufficed, and, indeed, I venture to say, as the observation which I made to Mr. Scrutton in opening the case indicated, that no reference to any case at all was really necessary. But I certainly shall not refer to many of them.

I have said that the common law is perfectly clear up to a certain point, and I use that expression advisedly, because I think the point is a limited one, and there is a great deal of doubt about the common law beyond that. Mr. Danckwerts referred me, among other cases, to Caird v. Sime, 36 W. R. 199, 12 App. Cas. 326, which is an important case in the House of Lords arising out of the publication—touching the right of publication—of lectures on Moral Philosophy delivered by Dr. Caird. The case is very much concerned with the peculiar circumstances connected with the delivery of lectures, and all the judges who took part in the decision go into those circumstances, and the dissenting judgment of Lord Fitzgerald is extremely instructive as regards lectures delivered as those were, as distinct from letters or books or other manuscripts. Mr. Danckwerts quoted largely from the judgment of the present Lord Chancellor, but to my mind, the precise position is more accurately stated as regards language by Lord Watson on p. 343. He says: "The author of a lecture on Moral Philosophy or on any other original composition retains the right of property in his work which entitles him to prevent its publication by others until it has by consent been communicated to the public." He calls it "a right of property in his work." The Lord Chancellor in his judgment calls it a "proprietary right in his unpublished literary productions." In many of the other cases the presiding judge has used the expression "the rights of property." I think the phrase "proprietary right" is peculiar to the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in Caird v. Sime. But some other judges have used a different expression and called it a joint property, that is, a right in the author of the letter—I am talking of a letter—jointly with the sender. Bacon, V.C., so late as 1884 in the case of Earl of Lytton v. Devey, 54 L. J. Ch. 293, said "the property in the letters remains in the person to whom they are sent." But it is obvious from his judgment that he perfectly understood there was a right of property in the sender, and he no doubt was speaking there of the property in the letters as the property in the paper with the writing upon it—the actual physical thing and nothing more—and that no doubt is in the person to whom the letter is sent. It has been decided that he can maintain an action of detinue for it by reason of the right of property in the physical thing. To that point, it seems to me, the law is perfectly clear. Beyond it, I will not say it is obscure, but I think there is very little light. What the right of property is and how it ought to be defined, none of the judges seem to me to tell us. To read again Lord Watson's words, "it is a right of property in his work which entitles him to prevent its publication by others." That is the right of property. What other privileges it gives him, how otherwise you can spell out the right of property, I am unaware. I do not think there is any judgment anywhere which helps at all; even the numerous judgments—numerous according to the manner of the particular judge—in Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 402, which are extremely instructive, do not, as far as I have studied them, really give us any guide to determine what the right of property is beyond this, that it entitles the author or the composer to prevent its publication by others. I need not go beyond that on the present case. It is sufficient for me to say that according to the common law the writer of a letter, notwithstanding that he has sent it to somebody else, and that that somebody else has a right to the physical thing, retains a peculiar right of property in it which entitles him to prevent its publication by others.

Now, that being the common law, what does the statute mean? The section is divided into two parts, and the division into two parts is to my mind the origin of the puzzle. The first part of the section deals with a book which is published in the lifetime of its author, and a book includes a letter. I need not go back to the authority on the point, because it is assumed all through this argument and it is common ground that "book" does includes a letter. It was contested in one case, but held at once without hesitation that a book must include a letter. "The copyright in every book or letter which after the passing of this Act is published in the lifetime of its author shall endure for a certain time and shall be the property of such author or his assigns." Then, having enacted that, the Legislature goes on to deal with the case of a copyright in a book which has been published after the death of its author, and it does not say what it would have been extremely easy to say in plain language, that the copyright in that book shall remain in the author or his assigns or his legal personal representatives. I am not professing to frame the words in which it could have been enacted, but no difficulty would have been entertained by any reasonably experienced draughtsman in saying in plain and unmistakeable language that the copyright belongs to those who claim through the author, whether by assignment—which would include, of course, a bequest—or as legal personal representative, if that had been the intention of the Legislature. I think it is fair to conclude that the Legislature did not intend that. But what does it intend? That it shall be the property of the proprietor of the author's manuscript. I will not go further for the moment. I do not think it necessary to consult dictionaries to understand what the meaning of the word "manuscript" is. Manuscript, of course, means that which is written by the hand, that in the case of a letter would be the actual letter written by the writer with his own pen or pencil. I have no doubt that in these days the court would have no difficulty in extending that to a typewritten letter. It might even, I think, without difficulty extend it to a printed letter if the writer had himself used a private printing press. I have no doubt, also, that if the writer of the letter, instead of using his own hand, used that of an amanuensis to whom he dictated the letter, that would be a manuscript within the meaning of this Act. I go further and say that if the writer wrote out the letter with his own hand and then had a copy made of it in order to send it away, and made that really the original letter though in truth it was more a copy than an original, that that might be a manuscript. But it seems to me it must be that which proceeds from the writer as his own work in the first instance, and that must be, I think, the author's manuscript. It is not the manuscript made by somebody else for the author for the purpose of really constructing an original letter, Also "manuscript" must mean, I think, that which filled the place of the manuscript in the ordinary sense, that is to say, the letter written by the author's own hand. If it was the one original letter which he intended to be the original, then that is the author's manuscript. Take the case of a man sending a letter and keeping a copy of it. I do not know that it is necessary to decide it, but I should think the letter sent, and not the copy kept, would be the author's manuscript. So far there seems to be little difficulty in understanding what the Legislature meant. But then comes the question of who is the "proprietor of the author's manuscript." If we can ascertain who the proprietor of the author's manuscript is, then there is no difficulty in determining what the statute means, because it says it shall be the property of the proprietor, not that the proprietor shall have a qualified proprietary right—it is not qualified in any way, it is not that he shall have the property jointly with anyone else, but it shall be his property, and the Legislature being, of course, cognizant with all the decisions of the common law, must be taken to have meant the property as being the exclusive property of the proprietor. Now who is the proprietor of the author's manuscript? According to the common law, as I have already said, there are two proprietors of the letter who can bring detinue for it—that is, he who is entitled to the physical thing, and the writer of the letter, who has that peculiar right of property which entitles him to prevent publication by others. Did the Legislature here intend to perpetuate any notion of that kind in the proprietor of the author's manuscript? It seems to me, having regard to the division of the section into two parts, which I have already called attention to, and to the care of the Legislature not to repeat in the second part, as it might have done in slightly different language, the first part, it must be that the proprietor of the author's manuscript means the proprietor of the physical thing, that the manuscript here is the thing written—the actual paper on which the writing is, and the writing on it. That seems to me to be the only legitimate construction which I can place upon the words "the proprietor of the manuscript." I will leave out "author's manuscript" now because I have said enough about that. That seems to me to be what the Legislature said, and the result, then, is that that belongs to the person to whom it is sent, and as I have said already, I have no reason to doubt in this case, and I think I ought to assume, that Mr. Steed and his wife were the proprietors of those letters—that is, of the manuscript. There can be no question of the fact that it was from that manuscript the book was first published. The letters were sent to Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co. in order that they might be published, and the publication was from those original letters, and by the assigns of Mr. and Mrs. Steed. I put to Mr. Scrutton, when replying, a question about the meaning of "assigns" there, and he endeavoured to convince me that the right interpretation of the section was that the assigns had the right of publication. I do not think that is the strict construction of the section. "The proprietor of the author's manuscript from which such book shall be first published," which is put parenthetically, "and his assigns," must, I think, mean the assigns of the author's manuscript; but the point is not essential to my decision. Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co. were the assigns of the author's manuscript, and in my view they fill that position. The result is, it seems to me, that I must come to the conclusion that the Legislature intended that the persons in that position, Mr. and Mrs. Steed, having these letters rightfully in their possession, were entitled to publish them themselves, or to hand them over, or otherwise, to Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co., and to give them the right of publication, and that that having been done, nothing remained in Mr. and Mrs. Steed which they could have passed to anyone, except, of course, the right to the letters themselves. That they retained, and that they can part with. The right of publication, it seems to me, was gone. There will be a declaration that the right of publication of these particular letters is vested in the plaintiffs Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co.

In re POLLOCK.
POLLOCK v. POLLOCK. (a.)

Settled land—Tenant for life—Devise to widow until re-marriage for maintenance of widow and children—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2 and 58.

A testator gave real estate to trustees upon trust for his wife during widowhood for the benefit and maintenance of herself and her children.

Held, that the widow had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 58.

In re Theaker's Settled Estates (quoted in Wolstenholme's Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts, 9th ed., p. 332) followed.

Adjourned summons.

A testator, William Pollock, by his will dated the 30th of March, 1886, devised a piece of copyhold land and a fully-licensed public-house thereon as well as other property to his trustees upon trust for his widow "during her widowhood for the benefit and maintenance of herself and our dear children and the proper bringing up of the latter."

There was a further provision that the trustees should permit the widow to carry on the business of the public-house personally.

The widow carried on the business personally from 1886 to 1901, when it was leased by the trustees for a term now expiring. It was now desired to sell the public-house, and this summons was taken out by the eldest son of the testator to determine whether the testator's widow, under the terms of the will, was a tenant for life of his real estate under the Settled Land Acts, or whether she, together with her children (to whom also the remainder was limited subject to the interest of the widow), made up the tenant for life under the Acts.

Stuart Deacon, for the plaintiff.

W. H. Cochran, for the widow, contended that in so far as there was a charge in favour of such of the children as required maintenance she was in the position of a tenant for life with an incumbered estate and had the powers given by the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, sub-section 7. As to her interest ceasing on re-marriage, a widow who had an interest during widowhood had the powers of a tenant for life under section 58, sub-section 1 (vi.), of the Act. The only authority for this, however, was the unreported case of In re Theaker's Settled Estates (1898), decided in chambers, mentioned in Wolstenholme's Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts (9th ed.), p. 332.

W. D. Rotch, for other defendants.

SWINFEN EADY, J., said: I will follow the decision In In re Theaker's Settled Estates. There will be a declaration that the widow has the powers of a tenant for life under section 58, sub-section 1 (vi.), of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and I direct a sale as asked by the summons.

In re GORRINGE, DECEASED.
GORRINGE v. GORRINGE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift to issue of deceased children—Son dead at date of will leaving children—Substitutional gift.

A testator by his will, after giving certain legacies to the children of a deceased son, A. W., gave the residue of his estate upon trust "for all or any of my children (except one son R.) who shall be living at my death." This clause was immediately followed by a proviso that in case "any one or more of my children (other than R.) shall predecease me, leaving any child or children living at my death, then such child or children of my deceased child (other than R.) shall take, and if more than one in equal shares, the share which his, her, or their parent would have taken if such were living and over the age of twenty-one at my death."

Held, that the words "shall predecease me" must be read in their strict grammatical sense, and that the children of A. W., who was dead at the date of the will, did not take under the proviso.

Originating summons raising questions on the construction of the will of Richard Gorringe.

By his will dated the 27th of July, 1898, the testator bequeathed the following pecuniary legacies among others: "To Mary Ann Mahlstedt (formerly Gorringe), the wife of — Mahlstedt, of Melbourne, Australia, £300; to Flory Gorringe, £300; to Kirk Gorringe, £300; to Alfred Gorringe £400. And in case any of the four last mentioned legatees (children of my deceased son Alfred William Gorringe) shall at the time when his or her legacy would otherwise become payable be under the age of twenty-four, and in the case of a female unmarried, I direct that his or her legacy shall be invested by my trustees in any investment hereinafter authorized and that the whole or any part of the income shall during such time as such legatee shall be under the age of twenty-four and in the case of a female unmarried be applied by my trustees at their absolute discretion for or towards the maintenance, education, advancement, or benefit of such legatee either directly or by paying the same to his or her parent or guardians or guardian without seeing to the application thereof, and that any surplus income shall be accumulated by the investment thereof and the resulting income as an addition to the capital of such legacy, but with power to my trustees to apply any such accumulations in any subsequent year or years for the maintenance, education, advancement, or benefit of the legatee."

The testator also bequeathed to his son Richard Pown Gorringe a legacy of £200 and also an annuity of £50 a year during his life with this proviso, "And whereas I am ignorant of the residence or whereabouts of my said son Richard Pown Gorringe, I expressly declare and direct that in case no communication either personally or by letter shall be received from my said son by my executors within three years after my death the legacy of £200 and the annuity of £50 hereinbefore respectively bequeathed shall both lapse as if my said son had predeceased me and shall fall into my residuary estate."

The testator bequeathed all the residue of his estate and effects both real and personal unto his trustees upon trust that they should sell and convert and should stand possessed of the same "in trust for all or any of my children or child (other than and except the said Richard Pown Gorringe) who shall be living at my death, and being a son or sons attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters attain that age or marry under that age, and if more than one in equal shares. Provided that in case any one or more of my children (other than the said Richard Pown Gorringe) shall predecease me leaving any child or children living at my death then such child or children of my deceased child (other than the said Richard Pown Gorringe) shall take, and if more than one in equal shares, the share which his, her, or their parent would have taken if such parent were living and over the age of twenty-one at my death."

The testator died on the 9th of April, 1905, having had nine children, three by his first wife—viz., Mary Ann Twigg; Alfred William, who died in 1887, before the date of the will; and Richard Pown Gorringe, who took no interest in the residue. The testator also had six children by his second wife—viz., Thomas James Hamilton, Charles Richard, Isabel Walmisley, Ellen Matilda Gallagher, Elizabeth, and Caroline Tatty.

The testator's will was duly proved by the executors thereof.

Alfred William Gorringe, who died in 1887, left five children, four by his first wife, who were each left a pecuniary legacy by testator's will, and a child by his second wife.

This summons was taken out by the executors and trustees of the testator to determine whether the children of Alfred William Gorringe were entitled to participate in the testator's residuary estate and to what extent having regard to the fact that the said Alfred William Gorringe not only predeceased the testator, but was also dead at the date of the will.

Younger, K.C., and Ryland, for the trustees of the testator's will, stated the facts.

Waggett, for Thomas James Hamilton Gorringe, a son of the testator.—The children of a deceased child who is dead at the date of the will can not come in and take under this residuary bequest. In all the cases the distinction is drawn that where there is an intention that the gift should be substitutional, the issue of a child dead at the date of the will do not take under such a direction; but where there is a gift to a class with a direction that if any shall die in the testator's lifetime the issue of such child shall take the share their parents would have taken if living, such gift amounts to an independent gift to the issue, and the children of a deceased child who is dead at the date of the will, will be admitted to take. In Loring v. Thomas, 9 W. R. 919, 1 Dr. & Sm. 497, the whole stress was laid on the intention. In the present case the testator gave legacies to four children of Alfred, and the will also contains a recital of the death of Alfred. Therefore when in the bequest of the residue he uses the expression "in case one or more of my children shall predecease me" he must mean those children who were then living at the time when he made the will. The testator is dealing with his own children, about whom he knows all the facts.

Hughes, K.C., and A. Adams, for Mrs. Gallagher, Miss Elizabeth Gorringe, and Miss Caroline Gorringe, daughters of the testator, who had obtained leave to attend the proceedings.—The gift of the residue is "to all or any of my children who shall be living at my decease," and the words in the proviso refer to exactly the same class; the words in the proviso really mean the same thing as if they had been "my said children." [JOYCE, J.—The testator has said Alfred is dead, and then he refers to "any child who shall predecease me"; can it be said, therefore, that he is referring to Alfred in the proviso?] The case is governed by Christopherson v. Naylor, 1 Mer. 320, the rule in which is stated in Hawkins on Wills. There the bequest was to the children of A. living at the testator's decease, but if any children of A. should die in the testator's lifetime the legacy thereby intended for such child or children so dying was given to their issue, and it was held that the issue took only in the way of substitution and that the issue of a child dead at the date of the will could show no object of substitution and were therefore excluded. There the substitution takes place before the members of the primary class are ascertained, but it takes place only as regards those who at the date of the will had the capacity of becoming members of the class. What is said in Loring v. Thomas as to the words "shall die" cannot apply to the present case, because the words "shall predecease me" cannot refer to a child who is already dead when the words are used. If the expression had been "my said children" the children of a deceased child dead at the date of the will would clearly be excluded.

Waugh v. Waugh, 2 My. & K. 41, and In re Musther, Groves v. Musther, 43 Ch. D. 569, 38 W. R. Dig. 212, were also cited.

Petersen, for Mrs. Twigg, a daughter of the testator who had also obtained leave to attend the proceedings, adopted the previous arguments and cited In re Offiler, Offiler v. Offiler, 83 L. T. 758, 49 W. R. Dig. 204, where Buckley, J., held that the words "brothers and sisters" in the second gift must have the same meaning as in the first gift—viz., "the brothers and sisters living at my death." This decision governs the present case. In Loring v. Thomas the only substitutional gift was to the grandchildren of a child who was living at the date of the will. In this case there can be little doubt that the testator intended to benefit the children of a child who could take under the will.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C., and G. F. Hart, for Mrs. Walmisley, a daughter of the testator.—It is clear that the testator intended to make a different provision for the children of Alfred than for the rest, as he gave legacies to them, but made no such provision for any of the other children. The words "children who shall predecease me" cannot include a child who was dead at the date of the will.

Badcock, K.C., and L. F. V. Fildes, for Mrs. Mahlstedt, a daughter of the testator's son Alfred William Gorringe, who was dead at the date of the will.—The present case falls within the decision of Loring v. Thomas and the gift to "the children of a child who shall predecease me" is an independent gift and not a substitutional gift as in Christopherson v. Naylor. The children "who shall be living at my death" in the gift of residue are quite a different class from the children who shall predecease me in the proviso. The words "shall predecease me" do not denote futurity but they refer simply to the fact of death and must be read in the sense of shall be dead at the date of the testator's death. No words can be pointed to in the will which denote that the testator intended to exclude the children of a deceased child. The gift of a small legacy to a few of the children of a deceased child is no reason why all the children of a deceased child should be deprived of their parent's share in the residue. The gift to the children of a deceased child is wide enough to include the children of Alfred, and therefore they ought to be included, especially as the testator knew how to cut a child out altogether as he did in the case of Richard. In Hannam v. Sims, 2 De G. & J. 151, Knight-Bruce, L.J., held that the words "shall happen to die" included the case of a brother named in the will, but dead at the date of it and that his children took under the will the same interest as they would have done if their father had died in the interval between the deaths of the testator and the testator's wife—a conclusion, he added, consonant in his opinion with principle alike and numerous precedents. In the case of In re Chapman's Will, 32 Beav. 382, where there was a proviso that in case any nephew or niece shall die in my lifetime leaving children living at my decease such children should be entitled to the share which their deceased parent would be entitled to, Sir J. Romilly, M.R., held that the expression was vague and was often used in the sense of shall be dead at the time of my death, and admitted the child of a deceased niece who was dead at the date of the will to stand in her mother's place. In In re Woolrich, Deceased, Harris v. Harris, 27 W. R. 49, 11 Ch. D. 663, where the gift was original and not substitutional, it was held the words "shall die" must be read and construed as equivalent to "shall have died" or "shall be then dead," and they were not limited to death after the date of the will. Christopherson v. Naylor, 1 Mer. 320, is distinguished on the ground that there the gifts to the children of deceased nephews and nieces were substitutional gifts, and that if the nephews and nieces could not have taken neither could their children, but in the present case the gift in the proviso is not a substitutional gift, but an independent one, the objects under the proviso taking not by way of substitution for their parents in the bequest of the residue, but under a substantive gift to themselves: Hawkins on Wills, p. 249. In Tytherleigh v. Harbin, 6 Simon 329, the children of a predeceased child were held entitled to take. [JOYCE, J.—The words in that case were "as shall be then dead," not "shall predecease me," as here, therefore that case has nothing to do with the present case.] In Coulthurst v. Goddard, 18 Beav. 421, the gift was to the children of A. A (deceased) then living, and the issue then living of any child of A. A. dying in the lifetime of the niece, such issue to take the parent's share, and the Master of the Rolls held that the issue of a child of A. A. who died before the date of the will were entitled. [Etches v. Etches, 3 Dr. 447, was also referred to.] In Loring v. Thomas, 1 Dr. & Sm. 497, the Vice-Chancellor puts the very case as here of a recital in the will that a certain child is dead, and the words in that case on p. 499, "who shall be living at my decease and who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years" are exactly the same as in the present case. There was a gift to a class, and then a separate gift to the children of those who shall die in the lifetime of the testator, and it was held that must be read as "shall have died." The Vice-Chancellor points out that "it is a question of intention whether the testator intended to include or exclude the issue of the predeceased children, and the solution of the question depends on the language the testator has used in directing such representation or substitution. He may use language of such restricted import as to be inapplicable to any children but such as were living at the date of the will. But if he uses language so wide and general as to be no less applicable to a predeceased child than to a child living at the date of the will, then the direction as to such representation or substitution must be held to embrace both." And he goes on to illustrate the point by referring to circumstances which are exactly in point in the present case. [JOYCE, J.—That circumstance does not apply, and therefore the argument drawn from it, and upon which the Vice-Chancellor based his decision, does not apply.] Where words are used which are wide and general enough to admit a certain class they ought to be admitted to share. The only case that conflicts with this view is Waugh v. Waugh, 2 My. & K. 41, but Kindersley, V.C., in Loring v. Thomas, considered that case was overruled. It is not referred to at all in Hawkins on Wills, and only cited as a doubtful authority in Jarman on Wills and Theobald on Wills.

Waggett, in reply.—If a class is to be admitted owing to the wide and general language which has been used the intention must be gathered from the language of the whole will, and not of a particular clause. The children in the proviso must mean the same as in the gift of the residue—viz., those living at the date of the will with the exception of Richard. There are not in the present will the words which Kindersley, V.C., in Loring v. Thomas, uses in his hypothesis on p. 512. The testator does in the proviso recite that Alfred is already dead, and therefore the argument based on that hypothesis does not apply. Another argument upon which Kindersley, V.C., based his decision was that the words "shall die in my lifetime" must be construed to refer to the fact of death without regard to the question whether the death occurred before or after the date of the will, otherwise the words "shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years" must be equally construed to refer only to a future attainment of twenty-one years, so as to exclude a child of a deceased child who had attained twenty-one before the date of the will. But such an argument would not apply to the present case, where the circumstances are different. The question, as Kindersley, V.C., said on p. 523, is really one of intention, whether the testator intended to make the gift by way of substitution of the issue only of those who were living at the date of the will or to include the issue of any predeceased child; and, of course, this intention can only be taken from the language of the will.

JOYCE, J.—In my opinion no case has been cited to me in which the terms of the will were identical or even very similar to those in the present case. Now, if we look at the will, the testator begins by providing for all the children of his son Alfred, and he particularly mentions that his son Alfred is dead, so that the death of Alfred is present to his mind and there is no reason for saying that he was forgetful or ignorant of it. He then goes on to deal in rather a peculiar manner with his son Richard, the reason being, no doubt, that he was ignorant of his son's whereabouts, having had no communication with him for some time, and so the gift is not to take effect unless his son communicates with his executors; and then there is a gift of the residue upon trust "for all or any of my children (other than and except the said Richard Pown Gorringe) who shall be living at my death and being a son or sons attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters attain that age or marry under that age, and if more than one in equal shares." Of course the testator did not intend Alfred or Alfred's family to take anything under that gift at all events. He then goes on to say: "In case any one or more of my children (other than the said Richard Pown Gorringe) shall predecease me, leaving any child or children living at my death, then such child or children of my deceased child (other than the said Richard Pown Gorringe) shall take, and if more than one in equal shares, the share which his, her, or their parent would have taken if such parent were living and over twenty-one at my decease." Now, as it has been pointed out, he is dealing with his own children, about whom he knows the facts. It is quite true that the words, taken by themselves, might include the children of Alfred if we are to read the words "shall predecease me" not in their strict grammatical meaning, but in a looser or more general way as "shall be dead." That would be a very peculiar way of providing for them, and, in my opinion, upon reading the whole of the will, the testator intended what he said according to the strict meaning of the words. The case of Loring v. Thomas, 1 Dr. & Sm. 497, which was relied upon on behalf of the children of Alfred, shows that words which in strictness are words denoting futurity may be construed as applying to the past, but it does not say that there is a rule that they shall be so construed, but as Kinderaley, V.C., says, it is always a question of intention which is to be gathered from the words of the will. The Vice-Chancellor said, at p. 510: "When a testator directs that issue shall represent or stand in the place of or be substituted for a deceased child and take the share that their parent would have taken if living, he may intend such representation or substitution to apply only to the case of a child dying subsequently to the date of his will and before the time of his own death; or he may mean it to extend also to the case of a child who was already dead at the date of the will." What I have to ask myself is whether the testator in this provision intended to include the children of Alfred who was dead at the date of the will, and who he knew was dead, and for whose children he had provided; or whether he intended to include only the children of a child who should die after the date of the will but before the death of the testator. I am clearly of opinion that he did not intend to include the children of Alfred who was already dead, but that he intended what the will says if construed strictly. I should add that the considerations which determined the decision of Kinderaley, V.C., in Loring v. Thomas are entirely wanting in the present case.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. D. (Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J., and Barnes, P.) — Dec. 21.

LOGAN v. BANK OF SCOTLAND AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice — Stay of proceedings — Parties resident in Scotland — Cause of action arising in Scotland — Vexatious and oppressive and abuse of process of court to bring action in England.

The plaintiff in an action to recover damages for misrepresentation was a person domiciled and resident in Scotland. The defendants were a bank incorporated in Scotland, the treasurer of the bank, who was domiciled and resident in Scotland, another person resident in Scotland, and a person resident in England. All the transactions which gave rise to the alleged cause of action took place in Scotland, all the witnesses resided in Scotland, and all the documents relating to the matters in question were in Scotland. The defendant who resided in England was a merely nominal defendant, and did not enter an appearance to the action.

Held, that it was vexatious and oppressive and an abuse of the process of the court to bring the action in England rather than in Scotland, and that the action ought to be stayed.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J.

The plaintiff was a schoolmaster who resided at Inverary, in the county of Argyll, and was a domiciled Scotsman.

The defendants were the Bank of Scotland, Sir George Anderson, who was the treasurer of the bank, Robert Young and James Scott.

The action was brought to recover £50 damages for alleged misrepresentations in a prospectus of a company called James Young & Son (Limited). The company was incorporated in Scotland to take over the business of the firm of James Young & Son in Scotland.

The Bank of Scotland were the bankers to the company, and their name appeared as such on the prospectus.

The plaintiff had subscribed and paid for five £10 preference shares in the company.

The Bank of Scotland was a Scottish corporation, incorporated in 1695 by an Act of the Parliament of Scotland, with its head office in Edinburgh, and it had a large number of branches in Scotland, and only one in England—namely, in London.

The defendant Sir George Anderson resided in Scotland. The defendant Young appeared also to reside in Scotland. The defendant Scott resided in London.

Service of the writ of summons on the Bank of Scotland was effected by serving it in London on the manager of the London branch of the bank.

The bank applied to have the service set aside, but the court refused the application: see 53 W. R. 39, [1904] 2 K. B. 495.

Neither Young nor Scott appeared to the action.

The bank and Sir George Anderson, having appeared, applied at chambers for an order to stay the action, on the ground that it was vexatious and oppressive and an abuse of the process of the court to bring the action in England instead of in Scotland.

The master stayed the action, but Phillimore, J., reversed the order.

The bank and Sir George Anderson appealed.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. (A. M. Bremner and S. C.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Agnew with him), for the appellants.—The action is brought by a domiciled Scotsman in respect of matters which arose entirely in Scotland. The real substantial defendants are the Bank of Scotland, which is a Scottish corporation, and the treasurer of the bank. The defendant Scott is merely a nominal defendant. Every fact in connection with the case arose in Scotland, all the witnesses are there, and the books of the bank are there. The object of bringing the action here rather than in Scotland must be to vex and embarrass the bank and to put pressure upon them to pay something to get rid of the claim. At any rate the balance of convenience is against allowing the action to proceed here. The court has inherent jurisdiction to stay an action in this country which it is vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court to bring here. It has been expressly laid down in the Scottish courts that the balance of convenience is a matter to be taken into consideration in such cases: Williamson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 11 Rettie, 596; Longworth v. Hope, 3 Macpherson 1049. The principle which underlies the Scottish decisions is the same principle as governs the English authorities: Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, 10 App. Cas. 210; Haggard v Pélicier Frères, [1892] A. C. 61, 40 W. R. Dig. 137; McHenry v. Lewis, 31 W. R. 305, 22 Ch. D. 397; Stephenson v. Garnett, 46 W. R. 410, [1898] 1 Q. B. 677; Watkins v. North American Land and Timber Co. (Limited), 20 Times Law Reports, 534; Cookney v. Anderson, 11 W. R. 628, 31 Beav. 452.

He also cited the American case of Collard v. Beach, 81 Hun. App. Div. N.Y. 582, 93 Hun. App. Div. N.Y. 339.

Colam (Eric Dunbar with him), for the respondent.—It is not a sufficient argument for staying this action to show that there is a balance of convenience in favour of the plaintiff proceeding in the Scottish court. This is not like a case where the court has to consider the balance of convenience as between two places of trial both of which are within the jurisdiction. The plaintiff alleges a good cause of action, and that cause of action is not itself frivolous or vexatious. Foreigners are allowed to sue foreigners in our courts on causes of action arising outside the jurisdiction. As the plaintiff chooses to bring his action in this country, the court will not decline to entertain it. In the cases of Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley and Haggard v. Pélicier Frères it was clear that there was no cause of action whatever other than a frivolous cause of action. In Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt, 31 W. R. 851, 23 Ch. D. 225, it was laid down that the test is not the balance of convenience, but whether injustice, which means irreparable injustice, would be caused by allowing the action to proceed. The Scottish cases cited by the other side were not in accordance with the English law.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—BARNES, P., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., rescinding an order of Master Macdonell staying all proceedings in the action against the defendant bank and Sir George Anderson, on the ground that the same is vexatious and oppressive and an abuse of the process of the court.

The action is brought against the defendant bank and Sir George Anderson as treasurer of the bank, and Robert Young and James Scott, in respect of certain alleged misrepresentations in a prospectus of a Scottish company, issued on the 1st of March, 1899, on which the name of the defendant bank appeared as the company's bankers. The bank and Sir George Anderson say that they took no part in the promotion of the company and were not in any way concerned in the preparation or issue of the prospectus except that the bank acted as the bankers of the company, and that they had no reason to believe, and did not, and do not now believe that the prospectus contained any false or misleading statement. The action is purely a Scottish action, and all the transactions which give rise to the alleged cause of action took place exclusively in Scotland; all the parties to the action reside in Scotland, with the exception of the defendant Scott, who appears to reside in London. The plaintiff is a schoolmaster, who resides at Inverary, in Argyllshire, and is a domiciled Scotsman. The bank is a Scottish corporation incorporated under an Act of Parliament in Scotland in the year 1695, and they have their head office in Edinburgh and numerous branches at various places in Scotland. The only branch of the bank outside Scotland is in London, and the writ of summons in this action was served on the bank there. But the London branch appears to have taken no part and was not concerned in any of the matters in question in this action. Sir George Anderson resides in Scotland and is a domiciled Scotsman. He states that he has appeared without objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, because of his official connection with the bank. The defendant Young, who appears to reside in Scotland and to be a Scotsman, was made bankrupt in the Court of Session in Scotland about the 11th of August, 1899, but appears to have obtained his discharge in March, 1904, and to have been again made bankrupt in the said court about the 16th of May, 1905, and is still undischarged. He has not entered an appearance in this action. The defendant Scott was adjudicated bankrupt in the London Bankruptcy Court on or about the 14th of June, 1902. His discharge was subsequently suspended for two years from the 19th of November, 1902, and he is still undischarged, and it appears to be clear that he is not a substantial defendant in this action. He appears to have been appointed a director of James Young & Sons (Limited), as representing the interests of a sister, who was the widow of James Young, a former partner in the firm of Young & Sons; he was resident in Scotland, but he seems now to be a clerk in some office in the City. He has not appeared to the action.

The cause of action alleged in the statement of claim appears to arise out of the fact that the plaintiff, as he alleges, in March, 1899, applied for and was allotted five preference shares of £10 each in a company registered in Scotland, called James Young & Sons (Limited). That application was made and was received in Scotland. It is clear from the affidavits in this case that all the circumstances upon which the plaintiff relies in the statement of claim took place in Scotland and not elsewhere, and that all the evidence with reference thereto will have to be obtained from Scotland. The company was registered in Scotland in the early part of 1899, having been formed to acquire, as it afterwards did the business of a Scottish firm of contractors, Messrs. James Young & Sons, Edinburgh. The business of that firm was carried on exclusively in Scotland, and, as appears from the prospectus of the company, the whole of the assets acquired from the firm were situated in Scotland, and all contracts to be taken over by them were for works to be executed in Scotland. The firm had been for many years customers of the defendant bank, and the banking accounts of the firm, and afterwards of the company, were kept at the head office of the bank in Edinburgh. The company went into voluntary liquidation in September, 1899, and an order was made directing the company to be wound up under the supervision of the court on the 25th of October, 1899. All the books and documents of the company are in the hands of the liquidator in Edinburgh. If this action be fought out, it is obvious that it will involve calling a large number of witnesses, all of whom reside in Scotland, and none in England, and the production of numerous books, documents, and papers relating to the matters in question in Scotland, about the production of which there might be considerable difficulty having regard to what is stated in the affidavit of Sir George Anderson, and also probably a consideration of Scottish law as affecting the rights and liabilities of the respective parties, and it is perfectly clear that a case of this kind ought, if possible, to be tried in Scotland, and that the inconvenience and difficulty placed upon the defendants in conducting the case in England would be so great as to put a great oppression upon them if they were obliged to produce and keep their witnesses and documents, &c., in London during the time such a trial as that which would take place would last. In fact, the inconvenience would be so great and the expenses so heavy as to be utterly out of proportion to the insignificant sum involved in this action. The action appears to be brought by the plaintiff alone nearly five years after the winding-up order, and, although it is suggested in the affidavit of Mr. Campbell, the plaintiff's solicitor, that he is law agent for a large number of shareholders in James Young & Sons (Limited), he does not venture to suggest that any one of those shareholders is assisting the plaintiff in this action or ready to be bound by its results, or that in any way the present is a test action brought on behalf of a number of shareholders.

The defendants make this motion practically upon the grounds stated in Sir George Anderson's affidavit, where he urges that no legitimate advantage can accrue to the plaintiff from prosecuting this action in England while there is an appropriate tribunal in Scotland, and that he believes that the plaintiff has not brought the action in England bonâ fide for the purpose of obtaining justice, but vexatiously and solely for the purpose of harassing the defendant bank under cover of asking justice, and in the hope that the bank rather than incur the trouble and expense of trying the action in England, may be induced to pay something in order to get rid of an unfounded claim. This suggestion is denied by the plaintiff, who, according to his affidavit, puts forward this suggestion, that the defendant Scott is in England, and that the plaintiff desires to have the matters in dispute settled in one action in England, where he can make Scott and the other defendants all parties, and that Scott is not a mere nominal defendant. With regard to this last point it is to be noticed that Scott is, as I have already observed, an undischarged bankrupt and has not appeared, and has stated that he does not intend to deliver any defence in the action although the statement of claim has been delivered to him, and the bank say that Scott is not a substantial defendant at all.

Now first, with regard to the law applicable to the case, there seems, after a discussion of the case in court by counsel, to be substantially little dispute between them as to the state of the law in this country. An American and certain Scottish cases were cited which seem to carry the law further in those countries than can be found in any reported case in this country. In the first of those cases, Collard v. Beach, where an action had been brought in the State of New York by a resident of the State of Connecticut against another resident of that State, the court declined to exercise its jurisdiction and to try the case unless there were special circumstances shown. The court appears principally to have decided the case upon the ground that the court would not allow its time to be taken up with the burden and expense of trying actions in that court which ought to be brought in other jurisdictions where the home courts of the litigants were open; in other words, they appear to have declined jurisdiction because of the inconvenience to an already overworked court which the case would cause. In the Scottish cases of Longworth v. Hope and Williamson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., it is stated that the courts in Scotland will allow the plea of forum non conveniens, and at first sight those cases seem to suggest that a mere question of inconvenience would be sufficient to cause the court of Scotland to decline to exercise its jurisdiction, but, having regard to the judgment of Lord Deas in the first of those cases, it would seem that the inconvenience which the courts would consider would be an inconvenience which would give the party endeavouring to avail himself of the court's jurisdiction an unfair advantage over his opponent; for he says, "It is a valuable discretion which is vested in every court not to exercise its jurisdiction if there are grounds for holding that by an exercise of that jurisdiction the defender who objects to it will be put to unfair advantages which he would not be subjected to in another accessible and competent court." And I should gather that the Scottish courts would scarcely object to allow a case to be tried unless they felt satisfied that injustice would be done by allowing it to proceed in their own court. In some cases in England the doctrine of forum conveniens is to be met with, as in cases of administration of estates and trusts, of which an instance is to be found in the case of Ewing v. Orr Ewing, 10 App. Cas. 453; but in that case I notice Lord Selborne, at p. 506, stated that "It appears also that the doctrine of forum conveniens, which in England seldom comes into consideration when jurisdiction exists apart from service of process abroad, unless there is an actual competition of suits, is in Scotland carried further, and may prevent the exercise of jurisdiction when the court is satisfied that the suit might have been brought and effectively prosecuted in a more convenient forum, although this may not actually have been done." These remarks were made in a case which is of a class in which it may be necessary to invoke the above doctrine, but no case was cited to this court in which that doctrine has been held to apply to actions of a transitory character such as that in the present case. It may, however, be that there is not really any very substantial difference between the practice in Scotland and that of our courts as expressed by various judges—viz., that the court will interfere to prevent vexatious proceedings which would have the effect of preventing the due administration of justice. Thus Lord Bowen in McHenry v. Lewis speaks of "the general principle that the court can and will interfere whenever there is vexation and oppression to prevent the administration of justice being perverted for an unjust end." For instance, in this country, where two actions are brought by the same person against the same person in different courts governed by the same procedure, and where the judgments are followed by the same remedies, it is primâ facie vexatious to bring two actions where one will lie; and, where two actions are brought, one in this country and one in a foreign country, by the same plaintiff against the same defendant, the bringing of such two actions may be vexatious though not necessarily so; and other cases may be put, for which see the judgments in McHenry v. Lewis and Hyman v. Helm, 32 W. R. 258, 24 Ch. D. 531. In my opinion, however, the jurisdiction of the court to stay proceedings on the ground of vexation should be exercised with great care; indeed, I find that Cotton, L.J., in McHenry v. Lewis, said: "In the first place, it is a jurisdiction which one ought to exercise with extreme caution. Stopping in the middle of a suit a plaintiff from going on, when he has a right of action as against the defendant, is a jurisdiction which has to be exercised with very considerable caution."

The English courts are freely open to persons foreign to this country seeking to enforce their rights against our corporations, companies, and citizens, in cases in which the courts can properly exercise jurisdiction, but, while I think we ought to be careful not to check this freedom, I am of opinion that we ought not to allow this hospitality to be abused. The difficulties which arise in the exercise of this power of the court do not appear to be so much difficulties in stating the law as difficulties in administering or applying it. The court should, on the one hand, see clearly that in stopping an action it does not do injustice, and, on the other hand, I think the court ought to interfere whenever there is such vexation and oppression that the defendant who objects to the exercise of the jurisdiction would be subjected to such injustice that he ought not to be sued in the court in which the action is brought, and to which he would not be subjected if the action were brought in another accessible and competent court. There are various grounds on which an action may be vexatious. It may be so frivolous that it is obvious that it cannot succeed, and it will be stayed. The facts then show that it is only brought to annoy the defendant, and, in my view, this would not necessarily be answered by the plaintiff stating that he bonâ fide believed in his rights, because he might be possessed of a mind which held a distorted view about the matter such as no reasonable man ought to entertain. In other words, it does not appear to me that the question ought to be settled by a mere consideration of what the plaintiff considers his intention, but the court is at liberty to treat him as intending what his act shows. Again, as Sir George Jessel points out in Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt, "The plaintiff not intending to annoy or harass the defendant, but thinking he would get some fanciful advantage, sues him in two courts at the same time under the same jurisdiction . . . that is vexatious, because whatever the intention of the plaintiff may be he cannot get any benefit in that way, and the defendant is harassed by two suits." The case may also be the same, though not necessarily so, where one suit is brought in one country and a second in another by the same plaintiff against the same defendant. There may also be other cases, but all the cases appear to be covered by Lord Bowen's language in the case last mentioned where he says: "Therefore, when that which he"—the plaintiff—"is asking for is frivolous, or sometimes when he is asking for it in a way which necessarily involves injustice, the courts have interfered."
